This system of one tenth part sell^d, and the other nine parts giving the public lands, has a force and operation in it that has wholly escaped me heretofore. I know that, last session, there was something about the business that I could not see through. Whether it was want of vision in me, or whether the whole subject was a muddy stream, impenetrable to the human eye, I did not know. But, though muddy then, it is now as clear to me as the mountain limestone water—the pure limpid fountain, transparent as the air.

It is no longer a muddy pool to me. No, sir, I can now see a pin's head and point in ten feet water. I now see we shall not get the tariff down, we shall not materially reduce the revenue. I am willing (said Mr. B.) to let the compromise part of the tariff stand. I am willing to take off all the impost duties; I am willing to stop the sale of the public lands; I am willing all or any part of these things to bring down the revenue, but come down it must for me. I am willing to suspend all the rules, and set out this minute and spend all the balance of the time we have in doing it in a manner the best for all concerned. But it must come down, and that immediately, (said Mr. B.,) or I will vote to send any part, or all, back to the people. If I cannot get all, I will send what I can get. I will put it into the right pockets in every instance, if I can; I will come as near as I can.

Mr. B. said he knew it was unconstitutional thus to take it from the people in this way, and would be so to do the like again, and so it would be to keep it; and so long as we thus continue to take, I will continue to give back; and if I cannot do it unconditionally, I will lend it, deposite it. Strange thing, this—take the people's money away from them, and then lend it to them. But if I can do no better, I must do that.

We cannot stop taxing the people. How absurd! Why tax them? Why sell their property? Do you need money to carry on any necessary work? No. Any debts to pay? Surely none. Well, why not take off the duties? We are answered by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] whose intelligence is well known, and whose equanimity of manner and temper is admirable; the even current of whose feelings has never been rippled, as far as I have seen, until there was a report made proposing to take off some of the burdens of the people—take off a portion of the taxes. The gentleman immediately was horror-struck at such a proposition. And why not do it? His answer is, that it will ruin our manufactures. I did not know I had any manufactures, (said Mr. B.) If they are ours, I will ask to draw my share, as a partner, of the annual profits and proceeds. Were I to put this to the gentleman, he would be struck with wonder again that I should want to draw a portion of the profits arising from his manufactures. When you are taxing, they are our manufactures; when you go for part of the profits, they are my manufactures.

That gentleman was kind enough to offer a word of advice to our constituents, telling them a thing we never would tell them: how much better it was for them to pay high prices and taxes than low ones and no taxes, and how much money was made by it. I will return that part of the obligation that rests on me as a slaveholder and tobacco planter, and whose constituents are generally so, by sending a word of advice to his constituents. I will advise them never to mind our manufactures, so far as to pay high prices or taxes for their sake, until they are allowed to draw some share as owners or partners. This word our manufactures has hookwinked many a one; as many in the North as in the South. My life (said Mr. B.) to a ninepence, if a man in the neighborhood of our manufactures, and not a partner, will offer his services, and publicly explain to the people their profit and loss in our manufactures, and stand to their interest with integrity and faith, at the next elections our manufactures would represent the interest of themselves at home, and the people would have a representative here to represent their interests in this hall.

Sir, (said Mr. B.,) there are some rich men interested deeply in keeping up the duties and taxes; but the great mass of society in the North have no more interest in them than I have. But, since we cannot take off the duties, let us stop selling the land. Ruinous, says the squatter, to me. Well, go and settle on it till 1842, and I will charge nothing for improvement, and give you pre-emption. This will ruin me, says the speculator in lands; I can never sell out my purchases, if you do this. It will break me up, says the half-sell half-buy system interest.

Sir, (said Mr. B.,) there can be more patronage exerted by this mode of using the public lands than can be by means of all the honors and legitimate revenues put together. See, sir; sell a thousand dollars worth of land at reduced prices—this carries but one thousand dollars into the Treasury. Yet there may be favoritism in it, and the land may purchase as much patronage, as much power, as much corruption, as much, in short, of any thing, as a million of dollars; for the land may be worth that sum, and often is. Yet this does not strike the eye like an outfit to France.

If we sell the people's land for the best price we can, it is a thing that is no way mysterious. If we offer to give it away to the States and Territories, it is easily understood. But if we offer to sell for less than we can get for it, it is hard to be understood. How much is gift, and how much is sale? Who is it given to, and in what proportions? I should like to know this. I know it is not given to the people generally.

If a man have a thing, he has the undoubted, indisputable right to give it away, but seldom does so. He has certainly the right to take less, when he sells a thing of his own, from one man than from another. But this must be to a favorite. He has a right to a favorite, and to benefit him if he wish. If an agent or trustee hold property for sale for the benefit of his principal, to save the balance or enhance its value he might give a part away. He might even give away the whole, to save the owner himself. Yet, in both these cases, the owner would likely wish to know to whom it has been given, and how much was given.

But suppose your agent or trustee were to offer to sell your property for less than he knew he could get, would you, Mr. Speaker, keep him or dismiss him?

Mr. B. said he would close by reiterating that he had no hope of ever getting out of the claws of these two systems—the half-sell half-buy system, and the protecting-duty system—unless he could break up the alliance between them; and perhaps distribution or deposite might do that. If not, the case is hopeless, and he would send as much home to the people as he could, as being the best hope in a hopeless case.

On the motion of Mr. MANN, of New York, to amend,

Mr. BOULDIN said he should vote against this amendment, for the same reason that had induced him to sustain the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee—simply because that, he was now sure, was the best we could get, if we got that; not that either was right, or even tolerable, but as a hard case of dire necessity.

Mr. LANE said that, as soon as the committee should become composed, so that he could be heard, he would proceed to address them with that brevity suited to the close of a protracted sitting of ten hours. He was not ambitious to address a wearied and impatient audience. That his apology must be found in the injustice of the proposition upon which he is called upon to vote—a proposition so manifestly oppressive to that portion of the people he had the honor to represent, that to give a silent vote would be reckless to his own duty, and regardless of their interests.

The proposition now to be determined, and the only one in order for debate, is to distribute the surplus revenue among the several States, agreeably to the representation in this branch of Congress. To distribute, (said Mr. L.,) because no one believed a cent of it will ever be called for, or returned by the States.

The money proposed to be divided has been collected, not from the old States, not agreeably to the representation in this House, but from the whole people; and, whether regarded as arising from the sales of the public lands or upon duties upon merchandise, it has been paid according to population, not representation, in direct proportion to the amount paid for land and the consumption of imported articles. That if any disproportion in the collection of the amount proposed to be returned to the people exists, it is because the people of the new States have purchased more of the public lands than those of the old.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON] has informed the committee that he will sustain the proposition, in order that his constituents may participate in the benefits arising from the sales of the public lands, and prevent them from being taken by force or fraud.

Distribution Question.

[H. OF R.]

Sir, (said Mr. L.,) the people of the new States ask for nothing unequal or unjust; nor would they take from the people of the old States that to which they are not entitled, either by force or fraud, nor will they silently submit to be plundered by the old States upon this floor.

Sir, while the honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON] is so liberal in attributing force and fraud to the new States, is he aware that he is advocating a proposition that would take the money from the pockets of the people of the new States, and place it in the pockets of his own constituents? That would place millions of dollars in the hands of the people of the old States, which had been drawn from the pockets of the people of the new, not by force, not by fraud, but by votes upon this floor, by unjust, unequal, and unconstitutional legislation?

The white population of Indiana is greater than that of Virginia or Kentucky. As proof of this fact, it is only necessary to refer the committee to the votes polled at the late presidential election. Indiana gave several thousand more than Kentucky, and the State of Ohio many thousand more than Pennsylvania; yet, sir, this proposition would give to Virginia three times as much as to Indiana, the former having twenty-one members on this floor, the latter but seven. The State of Kentucky would receive double the amount paid to Indiana, the one having fourteen, the other seven members in this House. At the same time, no gentlemen would risk his reputation for veracity by saying the population of Indiana did not exceed Kentucky, or that the people of Indiana had not contributed more to the sum to be divided than the people of Kentucky. So with Ohio; she would receive one third less than Pennsylvania. This disproportion, in a greater or less degree, would hold good with all the new States, compared with the old.

Sir, the injustice of the proposition is palpable at first blush, and ought not to receive the countenance of any honorable man on this floor. Mr. L. said he put it to honorable gentlemen from the old States to say if such a proceeding would be generous or magnanimous. What is the principle proposed and urged upon the committee? No more or less unjust or oppressive than to impose taxes upon the people of the new States, according to their numbers, per capita, beyond the wants of the Government, and then return to the people of the old States, not only what had been taken from them, but one half of the amount taken from the new. In other words, to return to the people of the new one half the sum to which they were entitled, and the other half to the old States, over and above the amount to which they are in justice entitled.

To call this force, to call it fraud, would be terms too mild; it would be oppression in the exaction, and plunder in the division.

[Here Mr. ROBERTSON explained.]

Mr. L. said he was aware that, by the provisions of the constitution, all direct taxation for the wants of the Government had to be made according to the representation upon this floor; and that, if the money had been drawn from the States in that manner, such a division, such a return, would be just, because equal. That, however, is not the case; the money to be divided has not been drawn from the States in that proportion, but according to population, regardless of representation, here or elsewhere.

Sir, what has produced such an extraordinary change in the opinions of honorable members? A few years since it was proposed to divide among the States the money arising from the sales of the public lands, by the land bill, originating with a distinguished Senator in another part of this House. It passed the Senate and this House by an overwhelming majority. By the provisions of this bill, each of the new States in which the public lands were located received large donations of land, and twelve and a half per cent. out of the proceeds of the sales within the State; and the balance was divided equally among the States, based upon the census of 1830, which is the basis of the present proposition. This was intended to make up in some degree for the increased and increasing population of the new over the old States.

In this there was something generous; magnanimous, on the part of the advocates of the bill, towards the people of the new States, compared with the present proposition. The same gentlemen in this House who were the advocates of that bill are now the advocates of this proposition. Are honorable gentlemen prepared to give the reason and the cause for such a sudden change having passed over the vision of their political dreams? Is it to be found in the action of the people of the new States, in relation to recent and former elections of an important character? Surely not; no gentleman will admit this, though any one would be at a loss to find any other reason for such a change.

Mr. L. said the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] had, with an air of confidence, given the committee his reasons for supporting the proposition: that the money in the hands of the deposit banks increased the executive influence of the General Government; that it was not only improperly deposited, but used for political purposes to influence public opinion; that his honorable friend desired its removal from the pet banks, (as he is pleased to call them,) because these banks, or those who manage them, are the friends of the administration, and use the money for their own benefit.

Mr. L. said he was equally desirous for the removal of the money of the people from the possession and control of the banks, because they are, so far as his part of the country is concerned, most decidedly opposed to the administration and all those who sustain it; that they use the power that the public deposits give them for political purposes, and not for the public good; not to accommodate the people, whose money it is, but to advance the interest of the favored few; in short, to shave and oppress the people with the money of the people.

One word in reply to the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMSON.] He urges, with his wonted zeal and eloquence, the adoption of the amendment, because it will take the possession of the money from the Federal and place it in the hands of the State Governments; that if left in the power of the Executive it will be used to corrupt the people; that in the hands of the State authorities it cannot be employed for any such purpose: the people of the States are incorruptible. Sir, (said Mr. L.,) if the people of the States of this Union are incorruptible, he would like to have the gentleman inform the committee who it is he apprehends would be corrupted by the Executive of the Federal Government. To conclude, Mr. L. said he had too much confidence in the justice of the members of the committee to suppose they would for a moment entertain such a proposition. He would, therefore, not detain the committee at so late an hour.

Mr. CAMBRELENG obtained the floor, and said he would willingly waive all opportunity to speak, but made an earnest appeal to the committee to take the question.

The amendment of Mr. MANN was then rejected, without a division.

The question on the amendment of Mr. BELL was taken by tellers, and also disagreed to: Yeas 71, nays 75.

Mr. CUSHMAN intimated his intention of submitting an amendment.

[FEB. 25, 1837.]

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the committee then rose and reported the army and fortification bills, as amended, to the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved an adjournment; which prevailed: Yeas 70, nays 51. And so

The House adjourned, at 9 o'clock P. M.

RELATIONS WITH MEXICO.

The unfinished business of the morning hour was the report, with the accompanying resolutions, reported yesterday by Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, on the subject of the relations between the United States and Mexico.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he did not see the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs in his place, and he would, therefore, move that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. MCKIM said he would state, for the information of the House, that his colleague [Mr. HOWARD] was very unwell, and not able to attend to his duties here.

Mr. ADAMS hoped that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. CAMBRELENG] would name some other day than Monday; Tuesday, if he pleased. He hoped that, as so many weeks had passed over without an opportunity having been given to present petitions, and as Monday was the last day on which they could be presented during the present session, another day would be fixed on.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then moved Tuesday; which motion was agreed to.

And so the further consideration of the subject was postponed until Tuesday next.

CULTIVATION OF SILK.

Mr. ADAMS, from the Committee on Manufactures, to whom had been referred a resolution of the House, instructing them to inquire into the expediency of promoting the culture and manufacture of silk in the United States, reported thereon at length.

Mr. A. said that this report had been made at the present session, though, probably, it was not perfectly in order. The resolution referring this subject to the Committee on Manufactures had been adopted at the last session of Congress; and the committee, at that time, charged one of its members, (Mr. Judson, a Representative from the State of Connecticut,) who had offered the resolution, with the duty of collecting the information alluded to. That gentleman had been subsequently transferred to another department of the Government, and had resigned his seat in this House. He had not ceased, however, to prosecute his inquiries; and, at a late period of the present session of Congress, the chairman of the Committee on Manufactures [Mr. ADAMS] had received a letter from him, (Mr. Judson,) containing the substance of the information which had been collected, and which was very valuable. Mr. A., therefore, as the chairman of the committee, reported that letter as a part of his report, and asked that it might be received as such. The letter was short, and he asked that it might be read.

The same having been read, Mr. A. moved that the report, together with the letter, be laid on the table, and printed; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. A. moved that 5,000 extra copies be printed.

The House consented to consider the motion at this time, and the same was agreed to.

POST OFFICE BILLS.

Mr. CONNOR, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the House will go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on Monday, immediately after the reading of the journal, for the space of one hour and a half, for the purpose of considering two bills reported by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, for the erection of a building for the Post Office Department, and a bill to provide for additional clerks in the Post Office Department and Auditor's office, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER said the resolution would require a vote of two thirds for its adoption.

Mr. STORER moved to amend the resolution by adding "and all the bills reported from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions;" which amendment was rejected.

Mr. JARVIS suggested to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CONNOR] to modify his resolution so as to name "Monday, immediately after the reading of the journal," and then to say, "and all other bills which the committee may see fit to take up."

The SPEAKER said that this resolution having been reported from a committee, it would not be competent for the gentleman from North Carolina to modify it.

Mr. CONNOR said he would adopt the first suggestion of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. JARVIS,] and moved to amend the resolution by striking out the hour of eleven, and inserting "immediately after the reading of the journal."

Mr. ADAMS hoped that no other business would be allowed to interfere with the presentation of petitions on Monday.

And the question on the amendment of Mr. CONNOR was taken, and decided in the affirmative. So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JARVIS moved to amend the resolution by adding, at the end thereof, "and all such other bills as the committee may see fit to take up for consideration;" which amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, moved to amend the resolution by including the bill in relation to the extension of the pension system; which amendment was rejected.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to lay the whole subject on the table; which motion was rejected.

Mr. LANE moved to amend the resolution by including the bill granting a right of way through the public lands to the Maumee Branch Railroad Company; which amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BOON asked if it was in order to restrict the committee, by specifying in the resolution the time which should be allotted to them for the consideration of these bills.

The CHAIR said the matter was within the power of the House.

Mr. ADAMS called for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution; which were refused.

And the question on the adoption of the resolution was then taken, and decided in the negative: Yeas 88, nays 57—two thirds not voting in the affirmative. So the resolution was rejected.

UNITED STATES BANK.

Mr. GALBRAITH, from the select committee upon the subject of the United States Bank, reported the following joint resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That until the notes of the late Bank of the United States, which may have been returned since the 3d day of March last, redeemed from the funds of the said bank, shall cease to be reissued by its officers, directors, trustee or trustees, and until the amount due to the Government from said bank shall be settled to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury, the notes of said bank, and the notes of any bank to which its funds and estate may be transferred in trust for the payment of its debts and discharge of its obligations, shall not be received in payment of any debts due to the Government of the United States, or taken in exchange or deposit in any of the banks selected as depositories of the public money; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to adopt such measures as he may deem necessary to carry this provision into effect.

The resolution having been read the first time, and the question being on the second reading,

Mr. LINCOLN said he was somewhat surprised that a report should have been made from a committee of which he was a member, without his having had either the honor or the opportunity of being present when it was agreed to. It was one of the most extraordinary propositions he had ever heard. It proposed that no bank, which should receive the outstanding bills of the late United States Bank, should have its own money receivable in payment of debts of any kind due to the Government; it was, in short, to discredit the notes of any bank in the Union which should receive such bills. But, before he entered into a consideration of the character of the resolution, he begged leave to put one or two interrogatories to the chairman of the select committee. And, in order that that gentleman might see the pertinency of the interrogatories, he (Mr. L.) would state what had been his own observation of the course of proceeding in relation to this resolution.

Immediately after the constitution of this committee, a notification was made to its members to meet, for the purpose of considering the various propositions committed to it for examination, discussion, and action. At that meeting, he believed, all the members but one were present. No distinct action was had, but there had been a general sentiment, so far as he had understood the remarks of the different members of the committee, unfavorable to any definite action at that time; but there had also been a distinct understanding that, whenever the chairman of the committee should think it advisable that the committee should again be assembled, a meeting should take place on notice given by him. The committee voted no adjournment, but left it to the discretion of the chairman, [Mr. GALBRAITH,] enlightened as he (Mr. L.) had hoped that gentleman would show himself to be, to reassemble the committee at such time as he might elect. Accordingly, some time afterwards, Mr. L. received a notice to meet the committee in one of the rooms of the House. Within fifteen minutes of the time appointed for the meeting of the committee, coming up, he met the chairman of the committee going down from the Capitol, who informed him that the committee had not assembled; that he had been at the room, but that no one was there. Soon afterwards, he (Mr. L.) was again notified to meet the committee. He came up, looked into the room in which the committee was to assemble, and in every other committee room on the first and second floor. He then came into the House. He beat up messenger-boys and doorkeepers, to inquire for the chairman; but he could neither see nor hear of him; and, after wandering about the purlieus of the palace for some time, he gave up the search as fruitless. He found neither the chairman nor any member of the committee; and when he did at last chance to meet him, he (Mr. L.) told him he must return a non est inventus against him. He (Mr. L.) was then notified to meet on another occasion. He came the third time. In the committee room he met the chairman and two other members of the committee; and, after discussing the subject, (not a word of a report was said,) and after inquiring what it was proposed to do, he was informed that this resolution was one thing which he wished to bring forward. But there were only four members present; three at first, one coming in afterwards; and he was notified that a meeting would be held at the private chambers of the committee on that evening. But he heard nothing about a report, nothing about a bill.

[It is necessary here to explain that Mr. L. alludes to the report and bill which were presented by Mr. GALBRAITH a few days since, from the same select committee; the latter of which provides for the infliction of pecuniary penalties for reissues of the notes of the late Bank of the United States.]

On the evening referred to, Mr. L. said it was impracticable for him to attend, in consequence of other duties. The next evening he understood that a report had been made, not one word of which had been submitted to him; and that a short bill of a single section had also accompanied the report. Of this, no notice had been given to him; nor had he been notified of any other meeting on the subject, save that in the private chamber alluded to.

He now wished to inquire from the chairman of the committee whether a majority of the committee were present when the report and bill were agreed to; whether the report was read before a majority; and whether a majority agreed that the report and resolutions both should be reported to the House. And, if so, why the resolutions were not reported at the same time as the report accompanied by the bill.

Mr. GALBRAITH said it was true there had been two or three ineffectual attempts to get the committee together in the Capitol, but he was not aware that this was in consequence of any neglect on his part. He certainly had given due notice to all the members of the committee who were in the city, and it was no fault of his that they did not attend. At the second meeting of the committee, it was suggested that it would be proper to address a communication to the officers of the United States Bank, and the gentleman from Massachusetts was present at that time, and he himself objected to this communication being sent. Nothing was then done in this matter, but it was decided that he (Mr. G.) should call another meeting of the committee, for the purpose of having a more full attendance, before they proceeded to the adoption of any measure; and he again notified the members of the committee to attend on a particular day at the room of the District Committee in the Capitol; and at that meeting there were but four present, and it was then mentioned that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LINCOLN] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. MANX] were members of a select committee, and could not attend in the morning hour, their engagements on the other select committee preventing them from so doing. It was then proposed to call a meeting in the evening; and, as there might be some difficulty in getting into the Capitol at night, they agreed the meeting should be at the rooms of one of the members of the committee. He notified the members of the committee to attend this meeting, and there were five members present at that meeting, who, being a quorum, considered the report, bill, and joint resolution, and unanimously concurred in the same, and directed him to report them to the House. In reply to the inquiry why he had not reported the joint resolution to the House at the same time he made the report, he had only to say, that when he rose to make the report, he held in his hand the report, bill, and resolution, and intended then to report them to the House; but immediately after the report and bill were disposed of, the hour for reports having expired, and a motion being made to proceed to the orders of the day, he was thereby excluded from reporting the joint resolution at that time. Mr. G. then, for the life of him, could not see why the gentleman complained of this proceeding. He had given all the members notice; and if they did not choose to attend the meetings of the committee, it was their own fault.

H. OF R.]

Memorial of the U. S. Bank.

[FEB. 25, 1837.]

Mr. LINCOLN said this resolution involved grave considerations, and should have had the most serious attention of a committee, instead of being brought thus hastily and secretly before the House. Mr. L. was proceeding in his remarks, when

Mr. CAMBRELENG called for the orders of the day.

MEMORIAL OF THE U. S. BANK.

Mr. INGERSOLL rose and stated that he learned from the Speaker that he had in his possession a memorial from the president, directors, and company of the Bank of the United States, which might obviate the necessity, in the mind of every gentleman, of further proceedings upon the resolution offered from the select committee. He therefore asked leave of the House for the Speaker to present the memorial, and requested the Speaker to do so.

Leave being granted, the Speaker presented the following memorial; which was read:

To the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The memorial of the president, directors, and company of the Bank of the United States, respectfully represents: That having recently seen, among the documents printed by Congress, a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in which he laments that he has not been able to settle with the bank, and invokes the aid of Congress, they deem it proper to state that they are now, as they always have been, ready and anxious to settle; and that not the slightest delay, nor the least obstacle of any kind, can justly be ascribed to them. This they propose to render obvious in a few words.

In a settlement between the Government and the bank, one of two courses was necessary. The first was to wind up the whole business of the institution, and divide the proceeds; a mode inevitable, had the bank ceased its operations on the 4th of March. But, as the institution continued, with no change except the retirement of a single partner, it was deemed a process equally harsh and useless to force the country to pay sixty millions of debts at a moment of general embarrassment, merely to balance the books of the bank; and the second mode was therefore preferred—that of estimating the value of the stock on the 4th of March, and paying the Government its proportion. This was the easiest, and simplest, and fairest mode of adjustment. It was obviously the mode contemplated by Congress, who, on the 23d of June, 1836, authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to receive payment “in such instalments, and payable at such times, and with such rates of interest, as he shall see fit to agree to.” To estimate the value of the stock was, therefore, the first step towards the settlement. Accordingly, soon after the Secretary received his authority from Congress, a report was made by a joint committee of three members of the late bank, three of the new, and three impartial umpires, connected with neither, stating the value of the stock. This valuation on the part of the bank was transmitted to the Secretary, with an offer “that all the materials upon which it is founded will, of course, be submitted to any examination which you may desire to make;” and that the bank “would be equally ready to adopt any mode which may be deemed expedient for making such a division of the assets of the bank as may assure to the Government its just and ample proportion.” To this communication the Secretary answered on the 19th and 20th September, as follows: “I have cheerfully accepted your offer to permit an examination to be made of the materials upon which that report is founded;” and will appoint three gentlemen “to investigate those materials, and report to me their views upon them, and also the proper basis of a settlement.” These commissioners accordingly visited the bank, and, after nearly four months, reported. It was naturally presumed that, when they made their report, the Secretary would inform the board of directors whether their valuation accorded with that of the bank, or in what respect it differed; so as to enable the board to accept the terms or to offer others, or in some mode advance the settlement. It is much to be regretted that such a course was not pursued. But, since the month of September, when the Secretary apprized the board of the coming of the commissioners, who were to report their estimate to him, no communication of any kind whatsoever was made to them by the Secretary; but while they were waiting to know whether their valuation was acceptable to him, or in what it was deemed deficient, they were surprised by a communication, not to them, but to Congress, stating the failure of his negotiation. They regret this, because, if the board had been made acquainted with the wishes of the Government, as explained in the report now made to Congress, they would have instantly and cheerfully acceded to them. That regret is deepened by another measure of the Secretary, which seems alike unauthorized and unfortunate.

The act of Congress of the 23d June, 1836, directed the Secretary to “receive the capital stock belonging to the United States in the late Bank of the United States, in such instalments, and payable at such times, and with such rates of interest, as he shall see fit to agree to, and also to settle and adjust the claim for surplus profits accruing on said capital stock, on such terms as he may think proper.”

When this act passed it was perfectly well known to every member of Congress that, for nearly four years preceding, there had been a disputed question of law between the Government and the bank, in regard to damages on a bill of exchange, which the bank had in vain urged the Executive to pursue before the judicial tribunals. The subject had been often before Congress—before the Committee of Ways and Means in 1833, who proposed no measure in regard to it—before the Committee on Finance of the Senate, who, in their report of the 18th of December, 1834, declared that the right of the bank was “founded in strict law;” that “the retainer was avowedly made to procure a submission to the courts and juries of the country;” and that, “if the Government thinks itself wronged by such proceedings, the law prescribes the manner in which it shall seek redress.” With the full knowledge of these facts, when Congress authorized the Secretary to settle with the bank for the capital stock and the surplus profits, they certainly could not have intended to refuse the receipt of this capital stock and surplus profits, unless the bank should surrender, unconditionally, its right to a judicial trial of the question which one of their own standing committees had decided in favor of the bank. Yet, without any the slightest authority from Congress, the Secretary, as appears by the public documents, has determined that he will never settle with the bank without a previous surrender of its rights—declaring that, “preliminary to a final adjustment of this interest, the Treasury Department would require that the bank should pay that portion of the dividend on the stock of the United States which had been withheld for damages on the draft upon the French Government.” Now, it is manifest that this is a proceeding which Congress did not authorize, and can scarcely sanction. It cannot be that the Congress of the United States, after passing a law declaring the mode in which questions between the Government and the citizens are to be adjudicated, and after seeing the bank pursue exactly that mode, will now endeavor to force the institution out of the path of law, by refusing to adjust other interests, which have no connexion whatever with that controversy.

Army Appropriation Bill.

[H. OF R.]

The original claim of damages was a necessary act of duty by the bank, in favor of the Government, who, if there was any right to draw the bill, had an equal right to the damages. The pecuniary interest involved was and is a matter of indifference. It was only the tone assumed in regard to it, and the evident design of forcing the bank to abandon its rights, which gave importance to the claim, and forbade the surrender of it. The board of directors would deem themselves faithless, not merely to the institution, but to the cause of constitutional freedom, if they could be thus driven from the courts of justice by any menace from an executive officer. They have accordingly decided the question deliberately and irrevocably. If the proffer of a judicial decision is accepted by the Government, the bank will cheerfully abide the result. But until then there should not be, and there cannot be, any surrender, or concession, or compromise.

The board of directors will now make one final offer to settle, and they make it directly to your honorable bodies, so as to avert the hazard of any further mediation. They learn, from the printed report of the Secretary, that the commissioners would have recommended the following terms of settlement:

To value each share of the stock at $115 58, and receive payment for it by equal instalments, payable in September, 1837, 1838, 1839, and 1840, with six per cent. interest until paid.

The board of directors agree at once to those terms, and are ready to carry them into execution.

They do not stop to inquire whether this be not too much. They prefer that it should be too much. They will never differ with Congress about mere sums of money, and are specially anxious to terminate their connexion with the Government in a manner satisfactory to all parties.

By order of the board:

N. BIDDLE, President.

Mr. INGERSOLL then proceeded to state that the memorial went the whole length of adopting the terms of settlement which the Secretary of the Treasury was understood to desire. The stock held by the Government has been valued by the commissioners appointed by the Department at $115 58; and they propose that payment shall be made, by equal instalments, in September, 1837, 1838, 1839, and 1840, with six per cent. interest till paid. To this the bank distinctly accedes. What more can be desired? He therefore moved that the memorial be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and that it be printed; which was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House then proceeded to the orders of the day.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then took up the amendments of the Senate to the "bill making appropriations for the support of the army and navy for the year 1837," which had been reported to the House from the Committee of the Whole, with sundry amendments made thereto.

The first amendment of the committee to the Senate's amendment, making an appropriation for equipping the militia, was concurred in.

Mr. TOUCEY then renewed the amendment made by him in Committee of the Whole, as follows:

"Appropriating $100,000 for the payment of the Connecticut militia called into the service during the last war, in the following cases: First, those called out to repel actual invasion. Secondly, those called out under State authority, and afterwards received into the service of the United States. And thirdly, where they were called out under the requisition of the President of the United States, or any other officer of the United States."

Mr. TOUCEY explained that this amendment was in conformity with the law paying the Massachusetts militia in like cases. The principle was well established, and he could not see on what grounds gentlemen could object to this amendment. The Government had admitted this principle in the case of the Massachusetts militia as much as seven years ago, and he appealed to gentlemen to grant the same justice to the militia of Connecticut.

Mr. LINCOLN said, at the last session of Congress, a committee of the House had reported in favor of this claim, and hoped it might be adopted. He then intimated an intention of moving an amendment to this amendment when it should be in order to do so.

Mr. HARDIN opposed this claim, on the ground that Connecticut had received larger amounts of the money of the Government for fortifications and internal improvements, in proportion to her population, than perhaps any other State in the Union.

Mr. INGHAM said that, although that was a question of more than ordinary interest to the people of Connecticut, as involving a claim of that State upon the General Government of nearly one hundred thousand dollars, it was, in his judgment, quite as important to know whether Congress would constantly refuse to pay a demand against which no serious objection could be raised. The claims of Massachusetts, resting on precisely analogous grounds, had been recognised and paid, but no disposition had been shown to meet those of Connecticut; and he was desirous of having the question settled, whether Connecticut was entitled to the same justice which had been dispensed to Massachusetts and other States. The claim was for services rendered by the militia, and disbursements made, during the late war with Great Britain. By a resolution of the last session it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, which reported a bill for its liquidation and payment; and the amendment, which was proposed and lost in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and which was then under consideration, was a literal transcript of the substantial parts of that bill.

But, said Mr. I., it was asserted by the honorable gentleman from Tennessee that this amendment could not be incorporated into this bill. That, indeed, was a new discovery; for there was no rule of the House opposed to it; and, in point of fact, that very bill had been so amended, both in the Senate and in the House, as to make provision for the payment of the Tennessee volunteers in 1836, or, in other words, to pay the militia of Tennessee. The two cases were, in principle, perfectly analogous; and the only tangible difference between them was, that the demand of Tennessee originated within the last twelve months, while that of Connecticut had been of twenty-two years' standing. The bill appeared to be competent for meeting the claims of the Tennessee volunteers; and, when the amendment for that purpose was offered, no such objections were heard from the gentleman; but, when it was proposed to satisfy other claims by a similar amendment, the gentleman immediately discovered that such a proceeding was not in order. They had been told that it was proper to provide in that bill for the claim of Tennessee, because it had been subjected to the examination of the Committee of Claims. True, and the claim of Connecticut had been subjected to the examination of the Committee on Military Affairs. They were both standing committees of that House, and equally entitled to its confidence and respect. The objection, at best, was a mere matter of form; and, if it was intended to act upon the subject at all, a more suitable opportunity could not be presented.

Gentlemen have said that they were ready to meet this claim whenever the bill reported by the Committee on Military Affairs should come up in its order. But wherefore not meet it at once? The claims of other States had been transferred to, and incorporated in, the bill under consideration, instead of being suffered to remain on the calendar, and come up in their order; and where could exist the validity of the objection against the claim of Connecticut taking the same course? It was well understood by every member there, that unless the amendment should be incorporated into the bill, the subject could not possibly receive the action of that Congress. Mr. I. hoped, therefore, that he should hear no more said about taking up this claim in its order, and especially by gentlemen who proposed to be friendly to it.

It was said by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. HARDIN,] that about $200,000 were appropriated at the last session of Congress to improve the harbors within the State of Connecticut, and that she was "a favored State." It would be difficult to see the precise bearing of this fact, even if it were correctly stated, upon the question before the House. It was true that Congress did, at the last session, so far open its eyes to the neglected condition and just claims of Connecticut as to appropriate about $55,000, not $200,000, as stated by the gentleman, to advance the interests of commerce in that State. What was meant by the declaration that she was "a favored State," Mr. I. knew not, unless it was an act of favor to refuse payment of her honest claims upon the General Government, which had been due more than twenty years.

But the gentleman did not stop there. He had asserted that the Executives of some of the New England States, during the late war, withheld the command of their militia, when in the service of the United States, from the officers of the United States; and that he would never consent to pay for the services of militia under such circumstances; and the gentleman said he wished to know if this claim was not obnoxious to that objection. Sir, (said Mr. I.,) I will advert to the history of that claim; and, when I shall have done so, I greatly mistake the character of the honorable gentleman if he himself would not be willing to vote for its payment.

During the first year of the war, but little expense had been incurred for the defence of that State; but, in June, 1813, the frigate "United States," and her prize, "the Macedonian," were driven into her waters for protection, by a superior naval force of the enemy. They were removed a short distance from the Sound to a place of greater security, where they remained until the close of the war. The coast, throughout its whole extent, was immediately laid under a strict blockade, which was rigidly enforced until the peace of 1815. There was imminent danger that the enemy would debark in the vicinity of New London, pass over land to the ships in the river, and destroy them. To prevent such an occurrence, the militia were immediately called out in sufficient force, placed under the command of a brigadier general in the service of the United States, and posted on both sides of the river, between the British squadron and the ships. In consequence of this movement, these vessels were preserved; but the enemy soon commenced the pillage and destruction of private property. Numerous vessels were taken in Long Island Sound; and in April, 1814, a great amount of shipping was destroyed in Connecticut river. In August, of the same year, an attack was made upon the village of Stonington. The skill and gallantry with which the place was defended were matters of history, and required no commendation. The commerce of the State was suspended, and almost entirely prostrated, from June, 1813, to the close of the war. It was one of the most gloomy periods of their political history. Differences of opinion as to men, and the course of policy pursued by those in power, greatly embarrassed the administration of the General Government. The militia, however, with the most patriotic motives, rallied for the preservation of the public property—the ships of war. They did preserve them. They were saved from recapture and destruction by the enemy through their patriotic efforts. They devoted their time, they expended their money, and they hazarded their lives, for the protection of the property and honor of the nation. The enemy were compelled to recede, and the ships remained in security until the close of the war. The great and wanton destruction of private property, during that period, was justly attributable to the fact that the national vessels occupied the waters of that State, and were defended by her militia; yet (said Mr. I.) they asked no compensation for the vast amount of individual loss and suffering, but simply remuneration for services rendered, and disbursements actually made, in defending our ships of war, when they were unable to defend themselves. A more meritorious claim could not, in his opinion, be imagined. It had subsequently, in 1816, been presented to the Government for allowance, with all the vouchers and evidences in its support; but was rejected, for the reasons stated by the gentleman from Kentucky, and which he (Mr. I.) would now briefly consider.

The militia in question had been called into service under a requisition of the National Executive, and commanded by an officer of the National Government, until the 12th of September, 1814, when the command was assumed by a major general of militia, under the Executive of the State.

No change, however, occurred in the plan of operations, but the campaign was properly and successfully conducted.

It was (he said) well known that a difference of opinion existed between the chief Executive of the Union and the Executives of several of the New England States, in reference to the true construction of the 3d section of the 1st article, and the 2d section of the 2d article, of the constitution of the United States, relating to the militia of the several States when called into the actual service of the United States. An opinion was entertained, by many of the distinguished jurists in New England, that the militia of the States, when in the service of the United States, should continue to be commanded by their own officers, and not by those of the General Government. This opinion was embraced both by the Executive of Massachusetts, and by the supreme court of that State, to which the question had been submitted. Assuming such to be the true construction of the constitution, the Governor of Massachusetts refused to submit the militia of that State to the command of the officers of the General Government. The Governor of Connecticut, having also adopted similar views, accordingly, on the 12th of September, as already stated, transferred the command of the militia near New London to a major general of that body. The Executive of the United States properly resisted such a forced construction of the constitution, and refused to allow any claim for the services of militia rendered under circumstances of that character. At a subsequent date, however, when the asperity of party contests had, in some measure, subsided, Mr. Monroe, at that time President of the United States, was induced, by the solicitations of the State of Massachusetts, then urging her claim, to review the subject; and though he strictly adhered to his former construction of the constitution, under which the claims of Massachusetts and Connecticut had been disallowed, yet in view of the modified tone of public sentiment, and the disclaimer by the then Executive of the former State of the principle maintained by his predecessor, he thought it advisable to waive the objection. In a special message upon this subject, communicated to Congress on the 23d of February, 1824, he says:

Army Appropriation Bill.

"I have been led to conclude, on great consideration, that the principles of justice, as well as a due regard for the great interests of our Union, require that this claim, in the extent proposed, should be acceded to. Essential service was rendered, in the late war, by the militia of Massachusetts, and with the most patriotic motives. It seems just, therefore, that they should be compensated for such service in like manner with the militia of the other States. The constitutional difficulty did not originate with them, and has now been removed. It comports with our system to look to the service rendered, and to the intention with which it was rendered, and to award the compensation accordingly, especially as it may now be done without the sacrifice of principle. The motive, in this instance, is the stronger, because well satisfied I am that, by so doing, we shall give the most effectual support to our republican institutions. No latent cause of discontent will be left behind. The great body of the people will be gratified, and even those who now survive, who were then in error, cannot fail to see, with interest and satisfaction, this distressing occurrence thus happily terminated. I therefore consider it my duty to recommend to Congress to make provision for the settlement of the claim of Massachusetts, for services rendered in the late war by the militia of the State, in conformity with the rules which have governed in the settlement of the claims for services rendered by the militia of the other States."

Upon the communication of that message, and also upon a memorial from Massachusetts, Congress proceeded to the consideration of the subject, and, after the most mature deliberation, adopted the views of the President, determined to allow the claims, and an act was accordingly passed providing for their settlement. Under that act a great proportion of them had already been paid; and it only remained for Congress, in the present instance, to follow the same course of proceeding, and leave no further sources of jealousy or complaint. The two cases were, in all respects, precisely parallel, and the objections to them the same. Massachusetts and Connecticut had proceeded together in their difficulties with the General Government, and were, nearly at the same time, found to entertain different political sentiments. He was not (he said) and never had been one of those who approved the peculiar opinions that had given rise to those difficulties, but he believed that no consideration of that nature ought to influence him, or any other member of the House, in determining the merits of this claim. Adverting once more to the character of the claim, he would no longer detain the House. The Connecticut militia were not called into service by State authority, but under a requisition of the President; and the motives with which that call was responded to, the nature of the services rendered, their importance in securing the national property from destruction, were all facts which could not fail to commend their claim to the most favorable attention of Congress. It had never been met by any legislative enactment, but was rejected by the President, rather on the ground of expediency than positive law. The only objection ever offered to their validity had been waived by him who was principally instrumental in raising it. It had been abandoned by the President, and the payment of similar claims to the State of Massachusetts had been directed by Congress. After some further remarks, Mr. I. concluded by expressing a hope that, in the room of any further delay, the amendment under consideration would be adopted.

Mr. MANN, of New York, remarked that the State of Connecticut was not asking a favor at the hands of the General Government, but a mere simple act of justice. She was fairly entitled to the claims she now set up, and similar claims had been heretofore paid. It was not long since that a claim of the same general character, at least, had been paid to the State of Georgia, due from the time of the Revolution, amounting to between two and three hundred thousand dollars. Massachusetts, however, had been paid her claims under precisely similar circumstances, and based on the identical principles, to that of Connecticut. He was at a loss to perceive the justice of refusing this appropriation.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Connecticut, gave a history of the claim, and referred to the action of the Legislature of the State as an evidence of the feeling among the people on the subject. He also insisted that there was no incongruity in ingrafting it upon the present bill, for the separate bill would not be reached this session. It had been demonstrated by his colleague that Connecticut had received a very small pittance, compared with others, and in reference to her geographical position on the seaboard, of the appropriations of the General Government; and all he would then add was, that the history of the country showed that Connecticut had poured out her blood as freely, during the hour of peril, as any other State of the confederacy.

Mr. UNDERWOOD inquired if the proposed payment was intended to include those who fought and those who refused to muster under the authority of the United States, because he wished a distinction to be drawn.

Mr. TOUCEY replied, and showed the precise analogy between the cases of Connecticut and Massachusetts.

Mr. McKAY would vote for it, not only because he believed the claim to be a well-founded one, and just in itself, but because it was identical with the precedent set in the case of Massachusetts.

The amendment of Mr. TOUCEY was then agreed to, without a division.

Mr. McKAY then renewed his amendment to pay the claims of North Carolina for the services of her militia during the late war with Great Britain, in the cases enumerated in the act approved the 31st of May, 1830, entitled "An act to authorize the payment of the claims of the State of Massachusetts, for the services of her militia during the late war, and also the claims of said State for disbursements, &c., on account of the war," the sum of $30,000.

Mr. McKAY briefly advocated the claim, on the ground of its being strictly analogous to that of Massachusetts.

Mr. MERCER was not satisfied that the analogy had been clearly made out.

Mr. OWENS inquired if it had undergone investigation by any committee of the House.

Mr. McKAY replied that it had been submitted to the Committee of Claims during the last session, but no report had been made.

Mr. PARKER objected to this mode, which had too much prevailed in the Senate, of ingrafting amendments upon bills with which they had no necessary connexion. It was a practice he had always disapproved of, and which he would never sanction.

The amendment of Mr. McKAY was then agreed to: Yeas 86, nays not counted.

Mr. DUNLAP offered the following amendment, originally submitted by him in Committee of the Whole:

"And be it further enacted, That the volunteers in the State of Tennessee, who equipped themselves, and marched to the place of rendezvous, and tendered their services, according to the proclamation of the Governor of said State, in the year 1836, and were not received into the service of the United States, be paid the same, by the paymaster general, that is allowed by this act to be paid to those volunteers who were received into the service of the United States, and immediately discharged, on the commandants of the companies thus refused returning, on oath, to the Secretary of War, complete returns of the number of officers and men in their respective companies, to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. D. said if the members of the House would but examine the claims of those intended to be provided for by the amendment he had just offered, he had no doubt they would with equal liberality vote for his amendment. The facts are these. The Governor of Tennessee was called on by General Gaines and the Secretary of War, during the year eighteen hundred and thirty-six, for volunteers, at different periods; and the Governor issued a proclamation, calling on the citizens of Tennessee to volunteer their services, and rendezvous at Fayetteville, in West Tennessee, and Athens, in East Tennessee, mounted and equipped, to perform a six or twelve months' campaign. There rendezvoused at those places of rendezvous more volunteers than were called for by the Secretary of War, and only a portion of them were received and mustered into service; the remainder of them, that had marched from one to two hundred miles at their own expense, who were at all the expense of purchasing horses and clothing, for a campaign of six and twelve months, had to return home at their own expense, without ever having received one cent for their expenses or services. Now, sir, the class provided for in the bill are those who marched to the place of rendezvous under the call of General Gaines, and were mustered into the service of the United States, and immediately discharged. They receive by this bill pay for six months' clothing, amounting to about thirty-four dollars each. There has not been the first voice heard on this floor against paying this last class of volunteers; and I would like any gentleman to show why one of this class of volunteers should be paid, and the others not: they were alike meritorious and patriotic, and they were at the like expense of purchasing horses and clothing. The expenses of those who were received into service were paid, and those who were not received had to pay their own expenses. If there ever was a claim that ought to be paid, Mr. Speaker, this is one. The patriotism of the citizens of Tennessee was called on by the Executive of the State, and if Congress refuses to remunerate the patriot citizens who thus marched to the standard of their country, you may call in vain for their services hereafter. They will not know whether they would be received; and if they should not, they must be at the expense of equipping and supporting themselves, without the least prospect of receiving any compensation from their Government for all the expense they would necessarily incur. Sir, if this Government wishes the services of her citizens in time of war, they must act with justness towards them, and let them know that if more of them tender their services than are required, those who are not received shall be paid all their expenses.

Mr. HUNTSMAN then addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Speaker: I solicit the attention of the House to the amendment proposed by my colleague, [Mr. DUNLAP,] which contemplates the payment of those Tennessee volunteers who marched to the place of rendezvous, and were not received into the service of the United States. These troops promptly assembled at their country's call; they incurred considerable expense in procuring such horses, rifles, clothing, and equipments essential for the Florida campaign, and marched, some of them, upwards of two hundred miles to the place of rendezvous at Fayetteville, in Tennessee, with an intent to do battle against the enemies of their country. They had no constitutional scruples in regard to passing boundary lines; all they desired to know was, where were the enemies of their country; for with the enemy the business was to settle. They were some of the same men who marched to Florida, Pensacola, and to Orleans, during the last war. And as to those hardy sons of the West, all they ever want to know, on such occasions, is, that the Government needs their services, and, one thing more, where its enemies are to be found. Be it in the East or the West, the North or the South, be it by land or water, they are, and always have been, ready to march at a moment's warning to meet the enemy. This is a spirit of chivalry that ought to be encouraged instead of being repressed. What is the case before us? These troops, with the most patriotic motives, repaired to the place assigned; but some arrived in the morning, some at mid-day, and some at night.

The patriotism which burns in the bosom of every Tennessean brought more to the place of rendezvous than the number required by the Government; and those who happened to arrive at the ground first in the morning were received into the service, and discharged; those who arrived in the evening were not received. I will ask the members of this House, and every man in the United States, what difference is there in the merit of these two classes? They both volunteered for their country's service; they both incurred considerable expense; left their homes, their families, to the injury of their private affairs, with the same object; travelled to the same point. One class was immediately received, mustered into service, and discharged, fed at the public expense. The other class, although at the same spot, for the same purpose, and at the same time, after marching upwards of two hundred miles, are not only rejected, but disallowed even one day's provision for themselves, or forage for their horses; those who were received and discharged performed not one jot or tittle more service than those who were rejected; they deserved as much precisely as they who were accepted. I invoke the justice and the magnanimity of Congress to allow the second class the same compensation you do the first; for their losses will be great enough then in buying horses, clothes, arms, and equipage, they would not have purchased but for the prospect of serving their country; many of them, in addition to this, lost the business or employment in which they were engaged, and suffered serious injury thereby. Neither the justice of the country nor the policy of the Government requires at our hands that we should refuse payment to these meritorious men.

After some remarks by Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, in opposition to the amendment, it was disagreed to, without a division.

Mr. BELL (in the unavoidable absence of his colleague, [Mr. PEXTON,] whose attendance was required, by order of the House, on one of the select committees) renewed the amendment offered by Mr. PEXTON in Committee of the Whole, as follows:

"For the pay of the Tennessee volunteers who were called out and mustered into the service the 10th of December, 1812, dismissed provisionally in April, 1813, called again into the service in September, 1813, and discharged finally on the 10th of December, 1813, five months' full pay, which they have never heretofore received."

The amendment was disagreed to, without a division. Mr. LAWLER moved to amend the amendment by adding an appropriation of $15,000, as one month's pay to the volunteers of the State of Alabama, who marched to the place of rendezvous at Vernon, but who were not mustered into the service of the United States, in consequence of the neglect of the officer of the Government to whom the duty had been assigned.

Mr. DENNY wished to inquire from the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. LAWLER] to what officer allusion was made in this charge of neglect. He (Mr. D.) would like to know whether there was any foundation for the charge. He was not disposed to pass censure, even by implication, without knowing why, and of what nature the charge might be.

Fortification Bill—Distribution Question.

Mr. LAWLER said that the evidence in this case had been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and it was not in his power at this moment to turn to it. He would, however, state the facts as they were known to exist. He was not prepared to give the name of the officer alluded to. The troops had been called on to rendezvous at Vernon, in Alabama; they had marched a hundred miles for that purpose, and the Government officer failed to attend to muster them. They remained some days, and then were compelled to disband.

Mr. DENNY said he had no objection to pay these volunteers, if they had performed any service which entitled them to be paid. But he objected to any member's getting up in his place here and charging an officer of the United States Government with neglect of his duty. This was not doing justice to an officer of the army; let him be arraigned before the proper tribunal. The gentleman from Alabama got up here, and, for the purpose probably of making his claim in this case stronger than it really was of itself, made an indirect charge against an officer of the United States. He (Mr. D.) thought this proceeding was gratuitous.

It might be, as the gentleman had stated, that they assembled at the place alluded to, and were not mustered into service; and, if so, he (Mr. D.) would say, let them be paid, if the case came within the provisions adopted for the regulation of the claims of volunteers. But it was improper thus indirectly to make a charge of neglect, when no evidence of the kind appeared. There were not facts before the House to justify it in sanctioning such a charge; and why should the words of the amendment be at war with the facts? If the gentleman was in possession of any facts, let him make them known in the proper place.

Mr. LAWLER said that, in proposing this amendment in its present shape, he had no intention of wounding the sensibilities of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. DENNY], or of making a charge against the conduct of any officer of the Government. He had simply intended, in justification of the rightful claim of these volunteers on the justice of Congress, to state what the fact was, without any purpose of arraigning this officer before the country for the neglect of his duty.

But if this was the true and only objection of the gentleman to this amendment, he (Mr. L.) would obviate all cause for objection, by modifying the language in that particular; and he would then see whether any other objection would be raised against one of the plainest and most just propositions that had ever been presented to the House.

Mr. L. then modified his amendment, so as to leave out the words "because of the neglect of the United States officer to whom the service was assigned."

After some remarks from Messrs. MERCER, CRAIG, LAWLER, CAMBRELENG, MARTIN, CHAPMAN, and CAVE JOHNSON,

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. OWENS renewed his motion, made in Committee of the Whole, to amend the amendment by adding the following:

"That the sum of twenty thousand dollars be appropriated to reimburse the State of Georgia for money expended, or to be expended, by said State, in payment for the services of volunteers in the Creek and Seminole wars, for losses sustained by them, and medical attendance furnished them, during said service, or in going to or returning from the place of rendezvous; the said volunteers not having been regularly mustered into the army of the United States, and, under the existing laws, not entitled to pay, but authorized to be paid by an act of the Legislature of the State of Georgia, passed 26th December, 1836, provided that good and sufficient evidence be furnished the War Department that the said volunteers, in said act designated, have been paid by said State, in conformity with its provisions."

And, without debate, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FORESTER moved to amend the amendment by inserting after the words which relate to the payment of the volunteers "of Kentucky, Tennessee," &c., the words "including the companies in the State of Mississippi mustered into the service." Agreed to.

The question then recurring on concurring with the Senate in its amendment, as amended by the House,

Mr. HARDIN asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

And, after some remarks from Messrs. MASON of Ohio, LINCOLN, CRAIG, TOUCHEY, and GRAVES,

The question was taken, and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 123, nays 56.

So the amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

And the question recurring on concurring with the Senate in their several amendments, as amended by the House, it was decided in the affirmative.

So the several amendments, as amended, were agreed to.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

The House took up the "bill making appropriations for certain fortifications of the United States for the year 1837," reported from the Committee of the Whole with amendments.

The amendments of the Committee of the Whole having been concurred in,

Mr. BUNCH then moved an amendment to the Senate's amendment, to insert after the word "Mississippi," the words "including the companies in Mississippi mustered into the service;" which was agreed to.

Mr. CLAIBORNE, of Mississippi, said that on two previous occasions he had expressed his views at length upon the proposition under consideration. He now merely rose to state that he could not be induced to acquiesce in the amendment, but for the fact that no returns or muster rolls had been sent on from Mississippi, except for two companies. He made this statement for himself and colleague. If the muster rolls could be found at the War Office, he would insist, and he knew this House would allow, a full and fair compensation to every Mississippi volunteer. Under present circumstances, (there being no muster rolls, no papers upon which the Committee of Claims could make an estimate or report,) he could only regret that those who had sacrificed so much to obey the summons of their country must remain unpaid until the next session.

The amendment making an appropriation of $50,000 for fortifications at New London having been read,

Mr. McKAY moved a proviso, that this sum should be expended on Fort Griswold, or a new fortification to take its place; which was agreed to.

Mr. PARKS then renewed his amendment appropriating $80,000 for fortifications at the mouth of Penobscot river; which was agreed to.

DISTRIBUTION QUESTION.

Mr. BELL then renewed his amendment, offered last evening to the bill, as follows: That the money which should be in the Treasury of the United States on the 1st of January, 1838, reserving the sum of five millions of dollars, should be deposited with the several States, according to the 13th, 14th, and 15th sections of the "act to regulate the deposit of the public moneys," approved 23d of June, 1836.

Mr. GRAVES addressed the House in favor of the amendment.

Mr. REYNOLDS, of Illinois, said he was utterly astonished that a subject so palpably plain and easy to comprehend, and so manifestly just and right within itself, should meet with such opposition as it did in this House.

If I were turned out into the wide world in search of plain and simple propositions, (said Mr. R.,) I would at once settle down on the one before the House. Its latitude and longitude, and all its various bearings, can be marked with mathematical precision. No one can misunderstand it, "if he has an eye to see or an ear to hear." To give back to the people their own money, which is not wanted for the expenses of Government, seems to me to require no argument to support it.

This is the proposition now before the House. Any argument to sustain such a self-evident truth will obscure it, and add nothing to its standing in the mind of any individual.

My astonishment is greatly increased to see my personal and political friends oppose the measure. For the good sense and honesty of those friends I have the most profound respect and veneration. I am proud that I am honored with their confidence. This friendship has made a lasting impression on my heart, so that I am the more aggrieved to know that we may separate on this subject. I hope we will not disagree on such a proposition, which is so conducive, in my opinion, to the best interests of our country.

I cannot see any necessity for a party action on this subject. My political friends, with whom I have had the honor to act, cannot discover any grounds on which to separate. I have been found "working in the harness" with them on all occasions, and will continue to observe the same course, let the fate of this proposition be decided one way or the other. I am not one of those individuals to condemn my political friends if they do not act in every particular as I do. On this occasion, they may possess some powerful reason of which I am ignorant. I am one of the militia in our household. I do not aspire to be a violent partisan, so as to follow party, with my eyes shut, against common sense and the good of my country.

This being my situation, it may be the cause I cannot see the reasons by which some of my political friends are influenced on this subject. It is not unreasonable to see parties organized in every country. They are in this republic, and it would not require the talents of a philosopher to see that they exist in this House. In order to advance the best interests of the country, certain measures must be pursued. These measures ought to be founded on principle, to advance the common welfare of the country. To prosecute these measures parties must be formed and organized. I have always understood that this was the object of the great democratic party in the United States. To advance the best interests of my country was, and is still, my object in acting with this party. I have been with it "time immemorial." "The memory of man runneth not to the contrary." Being in this situation of mind and body, I appeal to my compeers, my political friends, to unite and act together on this subject, which to my mind is so eminently calculated to advance the welfare of the country. The militia of our party at the last session of Congress achieved a victory on this self-same subject, and thereby restored to the people their own money, after deducting from it all the appropriations which the public good required. These troops, without their file leaders, captains, or sergeants, associated together, and, with the good of their country stronger impressed on their hearts than any party discipline, achieved the victory above alluded to. I hope I will have the pleasure to see the same men act in the same manner on the same subject, this year, as they did the last. There is nothing in the nature of the subject to change the principle on which we acted at the last session of Congress. The people, to my knowledge, have not remonstrated against the act of the last session on this subject. In the name of God, can we expect that the people will be displeased to have returned to themselves their own money, which the public expenditures do not need? The militia, I may term them the national guard, will again assemble around the national standard, and, without the interference of their drilled and drilling officers, sustain this proposition, which will, in my opinion, be hailed by our countrymen as one of the best acts of this or any other session of Congress.

Mr. Speaker, this proposition standing pre-eminently above the necessity of argument to sustain it, I will consider some of the objections which are urged against it. It is contrary to the rules of this House to consider arguments which have been made in the Committee of the Whole. Although these arguments were used with no doubt powerful effect in the committee last night, yet we are not at liberty to speak of them in this House. This is, in my opinion, like many other rules, positively against common sense, and against the advancement of the public business. The members composing the Committee of the Whole are the same who constitute this House, have the same faculties and reasoning powers in one case as in the other, and, I presume, have the same sentiments concerning this proposition in this House at this time as they expressed last night in the Committee of the Whole; yet we cannot combat these arguments here, and show their fallacy. The general and common-place objection is, that there will be no surplus revenue in the Treasury to distribute. This argument was suggested to me by my friends who sit near me before I had the honor to address the Chair. It is to my mind an objection that is not even blessed with a relationship to good sense. It is an orphan in the world, without a godfather. Most objections, even if they are without foundation, can employ some sort of arguments to sustain them; but it is not the case with the one before us. Even the simplest statement of the case ought to put it to rest forever; that, if no surplus, no distribution. If there is no surplus revenue, the act of Congress will remain a dead letter in our statute books, and will be, in that respect, similar to a thousand other inoperative paragraphs in these books. I cannot see why a provision cannot be enacted, to be perpetual, and lasting forever, in relation to this policy. If it be right in one year, it will be proper and right at any other and at all other times. It would be a singular provision for a miller to have a wastegate to let the surplus water off his mill-dam for one year alone, and let the accumulation of water at other times break his dam. This may be considered a very humble comparison; but it is one known to every body, and is, in my opinion, applicable to the case before the House.

Mr. Speaker, I can compare our situation to that of people in a steamboat, in danger of exploding from an excess of steam. What is to be done in such a case? Do you think, sir, that any man of common sense on board the boat would deliberately keep up the steam, and endanger the vessel and all on board, by inevitable explosion? The prompt remedy would be to let off the steam. So with the surplus. Let it off. Yet I have no fears of the United States exploding if the surplus revenue remain in the banks, or in the pockets of the people.

The conspicuous figure an honorable gentleman recently exhibited on this occasion has made a lasting impression on my mind, and such as I hope the House will indulge me in noticing. The gentleman, with all that sage solemnity with which he is so eminently gifted, attempted to raise the curtain of futurity, and permit us, the uninitiated, to take a glimpse at the awful things which would take place, if the proposition to distribute succeeded. The dissolution of the Government was approaching to probability, and he himself was laboring under the awful responsibility of warning the world "to flee from the wrath to come." Moreover, if I recollect correctly, he advanced an idea that he then considered the Government of the United States as resting on his back. This speech brought forcibly to my mind the fable of Colonel Atlas, of ancient times, "sustaining the heavens on his shoulders." One story had in it about as much truth as the other. The locus in quo of these Government dissolutions has been changed from the South to the North.

Distribution Question.

Mr. Speaker, another objection urged against this measure is, that the proposition is not attached to its "yokefellow;" the amendment is not made to a proper and appropriate bill. I would appeal to the good sense of the members, who are now honoring me so much with their attention on this occasion, if it be not a singular time now, at the close of a short session, to make this objection. If we had time to devote to etiquette, and nice and strict ceremony, then the argument might be considered. These secundum artem gentlemen must have more time than we now have, to urge these objections with any hopes of success. I am not at all acquainted with nice dandyism; but I am told, by their rules and regulations, a person is the most genteel to wear a suit of clothes all of the same color; yet I see around me gentlemen clad in different colors, and still appear to a great advantage. So it will be with the amendment to the bill before the House. The proper officers of the Government will both find it and execute it, if we pass it.

Mr. Speaker, another objection is, that it is improper, and even some say it is unconstitutional, to raise a surplus fund for distribution. It would be extremely unwise to collect money and distribute it to the people again. I have no hesitation in saying that such an idea never once entered the heads of the framers of the constitution. It would be not only unwise, but absurd, to suppose the people would permit such an idle ceremony to go on, without either honor or profit to themselves. This proposition does not impose the necessity on Congress to raise a revenue to distribute it. It only provides, if there exist a surplus in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1838, then, and in that event, to distribute it among the States in the proportion mentioned in the amendment. Such surplus existing in the Treasury is a misfortune; but it is one from which we can be relieved with the greatest ease. In Governments, as in other things, we cannot expect perfection. The object of Government, in this respect, is to raise a revenue proportionate to the wants of the Government; but it is not in the power of the human mind, it is not in the compass of human wisdom, on all occasions, to make the revenue correspond with the expenditures of the Government. The means by which we raise our revenue are such that we cannot expect to make the one equal to the other on all occasions. When we have not enough revenue, we borrow to make up the deficit. When we have too much, why not send it back to the people in their State Legislatures?

I have, on all occasions, voted for every proposition to reduce the tariff duties, and to abridge the sales of the public lands in such manner as for the revenue to meet the wants of the Government. I think Congress has the power to remodel what is called "the compromise act." The sales of the public lands should be confined to actual settlers, and that at reduced prices, for lands which have been in market for a number of years. If this course had been pursued, and the proper reductions made, we would have had no trouble on the subject of the surplus revenue. I make no charges against the chairman of the committees having these subjects in their charge, of neglecting their duties; but I do not see why both the subjects of the sale of the public lands and the reduction of the tariff duties might not have been acted on at the present session. I was at all times ready to act on them, with or without speeches.

It is agreed on all sides that money is a dangerous neighbor, and has a corrupting influence. It is like Satan in the garden of Eden. Gentlemen who contend against this amendment say that this money will corrupt and injure the people and their State Legislatures by distributing it.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot discover the force of the argument that induces them to arrive at this conclusion. It may impose on the State Legislatures more business and responsibilities in the discharge of their duties; but it cannot have a necessary tendency to corrupt the people.

If this proposition be rejected, and the money deposited in the pet banks, what will be the consequences? There is, to say the least of it, more danger of corruption in the latter case than in the former. These banks are private corporations, and responsible to nobody, further than they are bound by dollars and cents. They have the power, and will act to the best advantage to make money, and to retain the money that may be deposited with them. They are sharp and shaving and skinning in their operations, and will move in very acute angles to make money.

I will present to the House another view of these banks, as to their solvency. It was in former days very fashionable for banks to break and become insolvent to a vast amount of money. This is a matter of history known to every body, legislative, judicial, or otherwise. The country may again be visited with such a calamity as heretofore, and the banks, from one end of the confederation to the other, may either become insolvent or collapsed to such extent as to be unable to pay the governmental deposits. The Government has already lost vast sums by banks. The surplus funds being deposited in these banks, thus situated, and liable to insolvency, I would ask any candid man to say in which situation would the money be the most secure—in the banks, or in the hands of the people, managed by their State Legislatures? It seems to me that no man can lay his hand on his breast and say that the money is as secure in the banks as with the people themselves. If the public money be intended for deposit only, in the possession of the States it is safe. If it never is to be returned, then it is also safe in the people's own pockets.

Mr. Speaker, it seems unreasonable to me that the banks should use this public money, with all their liabilities to insolvency and their natural tendency to skin, and that, too, without profit to the Government, when the same money may be safe in the hands of the people, and used to their own advantage.

[At this time the hour (three o'clock) had arrived, when the House took a recess.]

EVENING SESSION.

The House met at half past four o'clock. The pending question was on the amendment to the amendment proposed by Mr. BELL, and which was under discussion when the House took a recess.

Mr. HARDIN moved a call of the House.

Mr. E. WHITTLESEY suggested that the House should take up, with a view to reference, the bills on the Speaker's table, passing over such as would create debate.

Mr. YELL objected. The bill first on the list was the land bill, and he would not consent, under any circumstances, that that should be passed over.

Mr. E. WHITTLESEY said he would then withdraw his motion. If the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. YELL] was willing to sacrifice the whole business of the country to that one bill, so be it.

Mr. McCARTY said there was a Senate bill on the table, to the reference of which his friend from Arkansas would, he was sure, not object; and that was the bill making appropriation for the Cumberland road. Mr. McC. moved that it be taken up and referred.

Mr. YELL objected. He had himself two or three bills on the table, which he was very anxious to have referred; but he would rather that they should all go down together, than that the land bill should be put aside.

And, the question on the motion of Mr. HARDIN having been taken, a call of the House was ordered.

And, the roll having been called, one hundred and one members answered to their names.

Mr. ANTHONY moved a suspension of the proceedings on the call; which motion was rejected.

The Clerk proceeded to call the names of the absentees.

When Mr. GRENNELL again moved a suspension; which motion was rejected.

The roll of absentees was gone over, and there appeared one hundred and sixty-two members present.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, all further proceedings on the call were suspended.

The amendment to the amendment having, on motion of Mr. MERCER, been read,

Mr. HARDIN called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. BOON inquired if it was in order now to offer another amendment.

The SPEAKER said it was not in order to offer an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. C. ALLAN said that, as the question before the House was extremely important, and as there was not a large number of members present, he would move a call of the House; and on that motion he asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and, being taken, were: Yeas 72, nays 121.

So the call was rejected.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the amendment to the amendment, and it was decided in the affirmative: Yeas 114, nays 92, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, Chilton Allan, Heman Allen, Anthony, Bailey, Bell, Bond, Boon, Bouldin, Briggs, Buchanan, Bunch, John Calhoun, William B. Whittlesey, Yell—92.

So the amendment to the amendment was adopted.

Mr. MANN, of New York, moved to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "States" the following: "in proportion to the ratio of the representation of such States in the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States."

Mr. M. wished merely to say that, in offering this amendment, he asked for nothing more than the vote of the House besides the principle contained in it, which presented the question whether the principles of the constitution of the United States were to be adhered to or not.

Mr. YELL said that, before the vote was taken on this important subject, he wished to say but a few words; and he would be as brief as possible, because at this late day he was not disposed to detain the House; and thus obstruct the general course of business. He deemed it proper to avail himself of the occasion to briefly and freely express the reasons which had governed his course in relation to the proposed amendment to the bill; and this he was bound to do, in justice to himself and the young and flourishing State he had the honor to represent. I voted, Mr. Speaker, (continued Mr. Y.,) against the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] because I am of opinion that this bill, if passed, and sanctioned by the President, (and I trust that it never will receive the countenance of that distinguished man and illustrious statesman,) will at once establish a system demoralizing and corrupting in its influences, and tend to the destruction of the sovereignty of the States, and render them dependent suppliants on the General Government. The power and patronage of this Government should not thus be perverted for the base purpose of degrading and withering the independence of the States; that glorious independence, Mr. Speaker, which, sneer at it as gentlemen may who come from particular sections of the Union—sections, sir, where aristocracy is getting the mastery of our democratic and federative principles—must be the last bulwark of liberty. But, sir, I am opposed to this measure on other and not less tangible grounds. Sir, I behold in this plan of distribution, what every enlightened mind can readily discover, a deep and a matured plan, conceived and nurtured by the high tariff party, to continue and consolidate their odious scheme of injustice and oppression. And, strange as it may appear, it is now advocated, and probably will receive the votes of gentlemen from the Middle and Southern States, once the uncompromising opponents of the tariff principle, but who now are ready to fall at the foot of Baal, and sacrifice former principles and professions for the purpose of filling their State treasuries at the expense of the people—by recognising and establishing a system of taxation as oppressive as it is unconstitutional. And, sir, the brave and hardy people of the young and vigorous State which I have the honor to represent are called on to subscribe to such heresies and denationalizing dogmas. The man who expects any thing of the kind from the people of Arkansas knows but little of their character; or, knowing it, would basely misrepresent them, and bow at the temple of Mammon.

Distribution Question.

This measure of distribution, since it has been a hobby horse for gentlemen to ride on, has presented an anomalous spectacle. The time yet belongs to the history of this Congress, when honorable gentlemen from the South and the West were daily found arraying themselves against every species of unnecessary taxation, boldly avowing that they were opposed to any and all tariff systems which would yield a revenue beyond the actual wants and demands of the Government. Such was their language but a few weeks or months ago; and, in proclaiming it, they struggled hard to excel each other in zeal and violence. And now, sir, what is the spectacle we behold? A system of distribution, another and a specious name for a system of bribery, has been started; the hounds are in full cry; and the same honorable and patriotic gentlemen now step forward, and, at the watchword of "put money in thy purse; ay, put money in thy purse," vote for the distribution or bribery measure, the effect of which is to entail on this country a system of taxation and oppression which has had no parallel since the days of the tea and ten-penny tax—two frightful measures of discord, which roused enfeebled colonies to rebellion, and led to the foundation of this mighty republic. But we are told, Mr. Speaker, that this proposed distribution is only for momentary duration; that it is necessary to relieve the Treasury of a redundant income, and that it will speedily be discontinued! Indeed, sir! What evidence have we of the fact? What evidence do we require to disprove the assertion? This scheme was commenced the last session; it has been introduced to this; and let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, it never will be abandoned so long as the high tariff party can wheedle the people with a siren lullaby, and cheat them out of their rights by dazzling the vision with gold, and deluding the fancy by the attributes of sophistry. Depend upon it, sir, if this baleful system of distribution be not nipped in the bud, it will betray the people into submission by a species of taxation which no nation on earth should endure.

Mr. Speaker, I will not wantonly impugn any man's motives, nor will I speak to wound any man's sensibility; but I must be permitted to speak plainly and with candor, and I trust no one will deem me discourteous if I frankly remark that the conduct of certain Southern gentlemen, in relation to this subject, has been, to say the least of it, equivocal, and has almost tempted me to doubt the evidence of my own senses. Are they sincere and disinterested? It is not my province to doubt them; but let me say, sir, that they appear to demonstrate by their acts a degree of insincerity, if their former professions can be relied on; for, though once loudly clamorous against the tariff, they are now found engaged, by means not decidedly indirect, opposing any measure that has a tendency to reduce taxation. They assail the land bill, because it would reduce the tariff some $15,000,000 or $20,000,000; and show most clearly and conclusively, by their votes, that they will not go for those measures of reduction for which the South has so long contended. Their only object now appears to be the creation of a redundant Treasury, for the miserable purpose of distribution.

Mr. Speaker, this scheme of accumulation and distribution presents to the world a spectacle equally to be deplored and ridiculed. To combat it with argument would be to waste the time of the House and the country in discussing an absurdity. The whole system is not only wrong, but it is contemptible. What is it, sir? Ay, sir, what is it? It is a scheme to tax the South and West, to protect the manufactures of the North—of New England—that section of the country which is now engaged in generating agitation and strife, for the openly-avowed purpose of sapping the institutions of every State south and west of the Potomac, and rendering them mere colonial dependencies, the servile hacks and serfs of New England. It is a scheme to tax you and me, sir, and the Sergeant-at-arms, if you please, by the way of analogy, for the purpose of putting into our pockets ten cents out of every dollar that the hand of oppression took out of our pockets. The scheme, sir, to say nothing of its injustice, is contemptible; it is unworthy of the enlightened age in which we live; it sets all the principles of political economy at defiance, laughs Adam Smith, Say, Ricardo, and Bentham, to scorn; and where, let me ask, was the world ever before regaled with the spectacle of a people's taxing themselves to the tune of millions, for the purpose of paying the surplusage back again, at a discount of ninety per centum; taking from the citizen a dollar, for the purpose of giving him ten cents? But, sir, I will not discuss a proposition so monstrous.

Mr. Speaker, I appeal to gentlemen to say if they are prepared to oppose a proposition to reduce the revenue to the wants of the Government, by reducing the tariff on imports, or by the passage of a land bill, if they were certain that the surplus was to remain in the Treasury. I am satisfied that no gentleman would vote for a system which would tend to fill the Treasury, without a certainty of their receiving a portion of the plunder; and yet we find those very men, by their votes, filling your public coffers so as to enable them to receive their portion of the spoils.

Sir, (continued Mr. Y.) I enter my protest against a system of bargain and corruption, which is to be executed by parties of different political complexions, for the purpose of dividing the spoils which they have plundered from the people. If the sales of the public lands are to be continued for the benefit of the speculators who go to the West in multitudes for the purpose of legally stealing the lands and improvements of the people of the new States, I hope my constituents may know who it is that thus imposes upon them a system of legalized fraud and oppression. If, sir, my constituents are to be sacrificed by the maintenance of a system of persecution, got up and carried on for the purpose of filling the pockets of others to their ruin, I wish them to know who is the author of the enormity. I had hoped, Mr. Speaker, and that hope has not yet been abandoned, that, if ever this branch of the Government is bent on the destruction of the rights of the people and a violation of the constitution, there is yet one ordeal for it to pass, where it may be shorn of its baneful aspect. And, Mr. Speaker, I trust in God that, in its passage through that ordeal, it will find a quietus.

Mr. Speaker, I was perfectly astonished to see such a proposition as the one before us emanating from the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MANN;] and, sir, I would like to know if it is to be considered a "premonitory symptom" of the coming administration. If it is to be considered in such a light, I, for one, wish to know it, though a warm supporter of the President elect; for if it be his policy to plunder one portion of the country to fill the pockets of the other, I shall withdraw my support from that distinguished man; but where I should go, sir, would be a matter of doubt and uncertainty. Sir, I hope that Mr. Van Buren contemplates no such policy; and the gentleman from New York, in starting this monstrous measure, has, I hope, acted on his individual responsibility. But if this scheme should succeed, Mr. Speaker, my constituents are to be sold to the manufacturers of the North; they are to be plundered of half they are worth by this unholy scheme or combination; and, when I contemplate these facts, I am astonished to see the proposition of the gentleman from New York, which proposes to take two thirds of the spoils, which the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] would give them, and divide it among the large States.

H. or R.]

Distribution Question.

[FEB. 25, 1837.]

Mr. Speaker, before I resume my seat, let me say that if a firm effort had been made to reduce the tariff to the wants of the Government, and it had failed, if the land bill now on your table had been taken up and negatived, and all attempts to get rid of a redundant Treasury had proved unavailing, in that event I should not have interposed an objection to a distribution, for the best of reasons. It would then have been the duty of the National Legislature to distribute or loan to the States such surplusage as might be on hand, after defraying all the expenses of the Government. Then, sir, in such an event, I should not have hesitated to vote for the distribution, because I should consider the money more safe in the hands of the people than in any Government bank, subjected to the temptations of the speculator, and to frauds and failures. But, sir, if this distribution must take place, if the people must "touch the coin, though it do blast them," I hope that something like honor will be manifested in the manner of disposal; and, let me add, sir, if the plunder must come to us, I hope that my constituents, unlike him of old, who accepted the thirty pieces of silver, may be accused, not indeed of betraying the Saviour of mankind, or of betraying their country, a kindred enormity, but of having been forced to participate in a revel among the spoils of the people, contrary to their own wishes, better opinions, and sounder judgment.

I have deemed myself called upon to say thus much on this subject. I entertain no fears for the issue. I represent the wishes and opinions of the people of Arkansas—a people, sir, who, though they have just sprung into political existence, are too pure to be corrupted by your gold, too enlightened to be deceived, too brave to shrink from danger, and too patriotic, too noble, and too independent, to be sold like sheep in shambles. To them, sir, I hold myself responsible for all my public acts; and I have studied them to little purpose if my conduct on this occasion does not meet their approbation.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, said, though he himself was in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from New York, yet he submitted the question of order to the Chair, whether an amendment could be moved to one already adopted, which went to change its principle.

The CHAIR ruled the amendment to be in order, because it might come in as a second branch of the proposition. It would not be in order to move to strike out any part of the adopted amendment, but it would be in order to add a paragraph or a prov so to it.

Mr. BOON said that if the proposition then under consideration, to distribute any portion of the surplus revenue among the States, that may be in the Treasury on the 1st day of January, 1838, should become a law, he sincerely hoped that the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MANN] would be rejected by the House. Sir, (said Mr. B.,) a more unjust proposition toward the new States could not have entered into the mind of man than the one proposed by the honorable member from New York; and, more especially, the State which Mr. B. had the honor in part to represent on the floor of Congress. Sir, (said Mr. B.,) if a distribution of the surplus revenue (if any there be) shall be made upon the basis of representation in the House of Representatives, manifest injustice would be done to all the new States.

Under the census of 1830, the State of Indiana is entitled to seven Representatives upon this floor; whereas, at this time, from the increase of population since the year 1830, Indiana would be entitled to at least twelve, if not thirteen, Representatives in Congress under the present ratio of representation among the several States; whereas, in most of the old States, the increase of population since the year 1830 has not been such as to increase the number of their Representatives in Congress under the present ratio, apportioning the number of Representatives in Congress among the several States of the Union. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask if, under this view of the subject, manifest injustice would not be done to the new States, should the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York be adopted by the House.

Mr. B. said that he had voted for the distribution bill of the last session of Congress, and he had just voted for the same principle by way of amendment to the bill now under consideration; but he would take the opportunity then afforded him to say that, in both instances, he regretted most sincerely that circumstances should have compelled him to vote for or against the measure. Mr. B. said that he had, on all proper occasions, opposed the policy of taxing the people for the purpose of raising a surplus revenue, to be distributed among the several States, as such a system would be to tax the many for the benefit of the few. Gentlemen might endeavor to make the system popular, by pretending to return to the dear people that which they have been instrumental in wresting from the pockets of the people, by an unholy system of taxation not demanded by the wants of the Government.

Mr. B. said that he had not yet given up to despair. He yet felt encouragement in the firm conviction that the day was not far distant when the freemen of this country would indignantly throw off the shackles that have already too long enslaved them, and would not longer be humbugged by false pretences of having returned to them the money which has been wrested from their pockets by a system of over-taxing the many for the benefit of the few. The people are now told by a certain class of politicians that there is remaining in the Treasury a considerable amount of money over and above the wants of the Government, which ought to be returned to, and distributed among, the dear people of the several States. And how, I ask, is it to be effected with advantage to the great body of the tax-paying community? Why, sir, after an odious and unjust system of taxation has been fastened and riveted upon the people, by which a large surplus revenue is produced, and after deducting about twenty-five per cent. for collecting the same, it is then most graciously proposed to distribute the remainder thereof among the several States, in order that it may again return to the dear people, whose interest and future welfare are always so near the heart of the political demagogue.

The tax-paying people of this country first earn the money that pays their taxes under the authority of law, by the sweat of their brow, and by the sweat of their brow they will have to re-earn their respective portions of the surplus revenue when it shall have been deposited in the State treasuries. The true question to be decided by the people of this country is, shall there be a new and novel policy introduced in this Government, which has for its object the raising of a surplus revenue for distribution among the States; or shall the taxes of the people be reduced to the legitimate wants of the Government? This is the only true issue to be made before the people; and to this question the public mind should be particularly drawn by all those who stand opposed to monopolies, and all privileged orders of every character whatever.

The people will be fully satisfied in a short time, that the depositing of the surplus revenue in the several State treasuries will not have the effect of again returning to the people their respective portions of the money that has been unnecessarily and unrighteously drawn from their pockets by an unjust system of taxation by the General Government. Mr. B. said that, in looking into this subject of creating a surplus revenue to be distributed among the States, he could view it in no other light than having a direct tendency to destroy the independence of the State Governments; and if possible to do so, to corrupt the people themselves with their own money. The question of every wise legislator in Congress should be as to the best mode of reducing the taxes already imposed on the people so as to raise a sufficient amount only of revenue to supply the legitimate wants of the General Government, and not as to what shall be done with the surplus revenue. Reduce the burdens of taxation now imposed upon the people to the wants of the Government, and leave the surplus where it should be—in the pockets of its rightful owners.

Distribution Question.

Mr. McKEON said he was satisfied, from the course the debate had taken, that a general impression existed that something ought to be done, and without delay, to remedy the difficulty in which the country was now placed by its overflowing Treasury. He, in common with many who had addressed the House on this subject, believed that a reduction of the revenue ought to be attempted; and he thought that a favorable opportunity was now presented to gentlemen who were anxious to reduce our receipts, to exhibit the evidence of their zeal. The tariff bill offered a fair opportunity. He inquired of the Chair if it would be in order to offer, as an amendment, the bill of his colleague, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] or the bill from the Senate in relation to a reduction of the tariff. [The CHAIR said it would not.] Sir, if it is not in order, I must submit. I am disposed to believe that if distribution is now before us, the measures which would reduce your revenue might not be out of place. On every side it is admitted that your income far exceeds the wants of the Government; and yet, it appears, we are called upon to continue legislation calculated to keep up this strange system. I was one of that small minority which, at the last session of Congress, voted against your deposit bill, as it was called, but a distribution bill in fact. I have seen that minority more than doubled on the vote just taken. I have not regretted, as yet, the opposition which I gave to the system of distribution: I saw in the scheme the means of fastening upon the country a high tariff. Opposed, as I am, to raising unnecessary revenue from the people; educated in the school of politics which insists that the Government should be administered economically; that the industry of the people should not be taxed beyond what is absolutely required for the wants (and those wants limited) of the Government, I could never assent to the doctrine which sanctioned unnecessary taxation, and plundered the poor for the base purpose of enriching the public coffers. Gentlemen say this is returning the money to the people. I am aware it is by this plausible argument they wish to deceive the people into a support of this new principle. All I ask is, that gentlemen will not take the money from the people. It never can be returned to the individuals from whom it is taken. It is taken from every human being who consumes an article of food or raiment. You tax the bread the poor man eats, the coal that warms him, the blanket that covers him. You plunder him in various ways, and proclaim, at the same time, the fact of an overflowing Treasury. Why, sir, is not this the purest form of oppression? Is not this exercise of power of taxation not for the purposes for which the Government was formed, but for other purposes, sufficient to arouse the people? Who will insist that, by any process, the same amount of money collected, which is abstracted, can be returned to the same individual?

I am astonished to find upon this floor the strange association which is presented of those who have been distinguished as the opponents of a high tariff united with those who have been its inflexible and warmest supporters. I am more astonished to find gentlemen who are known to belong to that sect in this country characterized by devotion to a strict construction of the constitution, advocating a doctrine which, some years since, was denounced by a Senator of the highest standing as unconstitutional, dangerous, absurd, and inexpedient, and would convert the Government into an office of collection and distribution. I refer to one who has been looked up to as the head of that ultra strict construction school. And yet we find those who profess to follow these lights, and to be guided by this wisdom, proclaiming their attachment to this same principle of distribution. Not a man of them who would not denounce any plan to interfere with the domestic arrangements of the several States; and, nevertheless, are promoting, indirectly, the very measures they are opposed to. What must be the result of your distribution? The States will rely upon the General Government; they will turn their eyes towards this Capitol as the point from which golden streams are to be poured forth upon them to carry on their internal improvements; you will make the States dependent upon the General Government, instead of this Government dependent upon the States: in a word, you will change the whole form of your Government, you will destroy its nature, and, instead of having it simple and economical, you will transform it into one complicated and extravagant. The gentleman from Arkansas says that New York is willing to go into the robbery.

[Mr. YELL here explained by saying that New York objected to the measure; but, if there was to be a robbery, that they had no objection to rob the small States of the most they could get.]

Mr. McK. continued. New York asked, in this or any other matter, nothing more than justice. Her members on that floor were divided on the question last year: amongst them an honest difference of opinion existed. His colleague's [Mr. MANN'S] amendment was intended to remedy some of the injustice of the last act. It proposed to distribute according to the manner in which the money was raised. New York, from her vast population, was entitled to a large amount under any ratio of distribution. Under the last act, she was deprived of a very large amount to which she was, by every principle of equity, entitled; and no objection ought to be made to inserting the amendment. As for himself, (Mr. McK. said,) with or without the amendment, he should not sustain the proposition. He could not consent to add another link to the chain which would manacle those who were anxious to relieve the people from oppressive taxation—taxation which never would be submitted to by the American people when discovered to be without reason; that people would, from this very discussion, see the question of distribution on the one side, and reduction on the other, and he had no doubt what directions would be given by them to their representatives. The people would soon be heard, demanding legislation of a different character from that now before us. They would soon insist that measures should be taken to check the revenues derived not only from your customs, but from your public lands. To the members on that floor who were desirous of having any action on either of those great topics, he made an appeal whether they could hope for success so long as this policy of distribution should be maintained. To those who were anxious to preserve the commercial community from agitation by disturbing and driving into unnatural channels the capital raised by the revenues of the Government, he appealed whether they were willing to entail upon the country, by a second division, a system which must necessarily agitate the mercantile operations of the nation. We had the experience of the past year, and it ought not to be lost upon us. For himself, he hoped that, although the session was drawing rapidly to a close, still that some movement should be made to bring down the receipts to the economical wants of the Government. In such reduction he saw safety and prosperity for the country; in the distribution he saw danger and difficulties.

Mr. MANN modified his amendment, so as to put it in the form of a proviso.

Mr. TURRILL then demanded the previous question, but the House refused to second it: Yeas 75, nays 110.

The debate was then resumed.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said he would vote for the amendment of his colleague, [Mr. MANN,] though he had voted against the bill of the last session—a vote of which he was rendered prouder and prouder by every additional day. He would vote for the amendment of his colleague, not because he favored the principle of distribution, for it was a principle so obnoxious to him, that, do what you please, he could not vote for or compromise it; but if we must have distribution, let us, at least, have such a ratio as shall possess something like the semblance of justice. The amendment of his colleague provided that the surplus should be distributed according to the same rule by which the money was raised by taxation from the people. The rule for distribution adopted by the act of last session was wholly indefensible.

Mr. V. said he had very attentively noticed the yeas and nays upon the proposition for this new distribution, which had just been carried; and though he had often heard of Yankee acuteness and sagacity, though he had often, while he had been connected with the deliberations of this House, seen them most strikingly exemplified, he had never seen them more signally illustrated than on this occasion. Gentlemen from the tariff districts of the East, and many gentlemen from the South, in relation to the subject now before us, were going hand in hand, and sailing in the same boat; but, without much disparaging the sagacity of gentlemen from the South, he must be permitted to use an old and homely adage, and say that the Yankees "best knew on which side their bread was buttered." He had, as he had observed, often had occasion to admire the cold, keen, and calculating sagacity of the sons of the East, especially when contrasted with the more impetuous temperament which characterized another quarter; and the vote which had just been taken afforded a new subject for such admiration. Look over the yeas and nays just taken and recorded, and see whether you can find a single gentleman representing a high tariff manufacturing district who has voted against this second and most mischievous plan of distribution. While one Southern gentleman here and another there drops off and goes for distribution, opposed as it is to the principle of reduction, the tariff representatives of New England march off in solid phalanx, in support of this scheme. Sir, they know well what they are about. Their keen sagacity has told and disclosed to them what their policy is tending to. They know that the policy of distribution is opposed to the policy of reduction, and therefore they go to a man for the former. He (Mr. V.) was surprised to see gentlemen from the South drawn into a scheme for the support of the high tariff policy.

[Mr. Mason, of Ohio, here called Mr. V. to order for making personal reflections; and the CHAIR decided that Mr. V. was not out of order.]

Mr. V. said he had not made, nor did he intend to make, any personal reflections. Gentlemen were, no doubt, pure and patriotic in the course they were taking; but he surely had a right to say that the gentlemen who represented high tariff districts knew best what they were about; that this miserable and demoralizing scheme of distribution would serve long and copiously to oil their spindles, and give new impetus to their shuttles, whilst its effect would be any thing but benignant upon the Southern planting States. He had a right to say, and he would say, that this plan of distribution number two exhibited an amalgamation of differing parties, and that some opposed to a tariff, and others in favor of a high tariff, were here now found in a most unnatural union. Year after year had the high ultra-tariff party in former years addressed to you the horse-leech cry of "Give, give us more protection." The general sentiment of the country now is, that they had been most inordinate and unreasonable in their demands for protection. Their cupidity had well nigh dissolved the Union. Their own laws and their own measures had swelled your revenues much beyond the wants of the Government; and now they found themselves in a position of much peril. He could not say that he was destitute of all sympathy for them, as the manufacturing interest in his district was a very important one. It embraced many gentlemen for whom he had a high regard. Still he must and would repeat what he had said shortly after the commencement of this session, that if the alternative were presented to him, "Bring down your revenue at once to the wants of the Government, or perpetuate this policy of distribution," he would not hesitate to go for reduction. If gentlemen would not pass the land bill, if they would not do any thing to terminate the evil of a plethoric Treasury, and avert the evils inseparable from perpetual distribution, they leave us, who deprecate those evils, no option; we must go at the tariff, and strive to bring it down to the wants of the Government. Was there any gentleman here of such superficial vision as not to be able to see that the present movement was an effort to fix permanently on the country, by the seductive feature of distribution, a rate of taxation far beyond the necessary wants of the Government?

Though he (Mr. V.) came, as he had said, from a district which embraced many manufacturers, yet he could not, and would not, on that account, support measures, however favorable to them, which went to inflict unnecessary and oppressive taxation on the great body of the people. Did he speak in the hearing of men who knew something of the human heart? And would they not assent to the doctrine, that if you give the State Legislatures, year after year, a lick or a taste of the money which you unnecessarily draw from the pockets of the people, a reduction of duties will never take place? He must repeat, that he most profoundly regretted the course which several gentlemen from the South were taking, who, for the pitiful sum of money which might directly come to their States, were willing to run the hazard, the awful hazard, of fixing for a long series of years an onerous system of unnecessary taxation upon themselves and their constituents. Let me (said Mr. V.) wash my hands of all participation in such a policy. He would endeavor to ascertain, by a proposition which he would offer when it was in order, who were the gentlemen who preferred reduction to distribution. He would, before this subject was disposed of, by way of testing the sense of gentlemen, bring forward an amendment, which was the substance of the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, to bring down the revenue to the wants of the Government. He would then see how many gentlemen here were on better terms with distribution than with reduction.

Mr. MCOMAS rose and addressed the Speaker. He said that heretofore he had remained silent in this debate, and thought it was better to act upon the question than to waste the precious time of the House in fruitless discussion. But from the gratuitous remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. VANDERPOEL] he felt himself compelled, in defence of himself and those whom he acted with upon this question, to make a few remarks.

Distribution Question.

[H. OF R.]

The gentleman seems to feel a deep concern for the interest of our constituents. He thinks they are misrepresented upon this floor. Mr. McC. said he had no doubt but that his constituents would feel under lasting obligations to that honorable gentleman for his kind interposition, for his able and manly defence of their interest on this floor. If they did not, he should think it base ingratitude, as the honorable member was, out of the superabundance of his kindness to them, compelled, as a matter of necessity, to misrepresent his own constituents. He said this generous disinterestedness could not fail to meet its reward in the approbation of a grateful and generous people. Mr. McC. said he would assure the gentleman that that was the character of the people he had the honor to represent here.

The honorable gentleman seemed to be struck with horror at the idea of Southern gentlemen voting for this bill. He has exhibited the tariff, in its most frightful form, to their imaginations, and gravely inquires if it is the policy of Southern gentlemen to rivet a protecting tariff on the South. Mr. McC. said this scarecrow had been too recently dug from its grave to inspire him with any terror. He thought the veil of the gentleman was too thin to conceal his true course from the gaze of the Southern people. The South was not so completely harnessed in party shackles as to be rallied by this war-whoop, to make a common cause against the passage of this bill. They have been too long fed by empty professions. They look upon this question in a sober light; they say to these friendly gentlemen of the North, whose burden of song is free trade and a reduction of duties, why is this measure not effected? What prevents the passage of a law to that effect? Has not the administration a majority in both Houses of Congress? Is it not in their power at any moment to take up that subject in preference to all others? Sir, it is too plain; this pulse-feeler, or tub to the whale, will not do.

Mr. McC. said the bill for reduction had been introduced at an early period of the session, and had been quietly sleeping on the table to the present time; the people in the South all this time anxiously waiting to see the action of Congress upon the subject. Where was the zeal of the gentleman for the South all this time? Sir, it slept upon the table with the bill. How can we account for the new-born zeal of the gentleman, at this late hour of the night, to wish to have appended to that bill a bill ripping up and changing the whole tariff laws of the country? Does that gentleman think that a question so complex in its nature, and combining such a variety of interests as the subject of the tariff, can be adjusted in fifteen minutes? Mr. McC. said that this subject might be plain to the mind of that gentleman, yet he confessed it was one of great difficulty to him, and he was not prepared to vote upon a bill making such radical changes in the settled policy of the country, without hearing it amply discussed, in all its bearings. And no man could believe that a measure of such magnitude could be properly matured at this late period of the session; nor did he believe that it was ever intended to be discussed or passed this session.

[Here Mr. CAMBRELENG interrupted Mr. McCOMAS, and said that, from the extraordinary course of the present Congress, he had not been able to have the appropriation bills acted on.]

Mr. McCOMAS replied that the administration held the destinies of all these matters in their own hands, and could give them any direction they pleased. The Southern people would be amused when they came to learn that their zealous advocate for State rights and a strict construction of the constitution, and for a reduction of the tariff, avowed himself, at the same time, a representative of a tariff district. It seems to me the honorable gentleman has over-cropped himself. He will find it a difficult matter to look both ways at the same time. To use a homely figure, he reminds me of the Indian who complained that he often suffered from cold because his blanket was too short. When he covered his head his feet were naked, and when he covered his feet his head was naked. So, sir, upon the whole, I think the honorable member had better attend strictly to the interest of his own constituents, and leave the interests of other people to their representatives.

The honorable gentleman expresses great alarm for the public morals of the people. He says, if you deposit the public revenue with the States, it will corrupt the people. Does that gentleman think that the honest yeomanry of the land, the salt of the earth, are more easily corrupted than the agents of this Government? The gentleman underrates the intelligence of the American people, if he thinks they will believe such logic. The honorable gentleman is not aware of the consequences of the position he assumes. He affirms it boldly, that the Government has taken this money unjustly from the people's pockets, and yet they have no power to give it back to them. Sir, this is a monstrous proposition; because the Government has unjustly taken the people's money, they have the right to keep it!

The gentleman apprehends great danger for fear the people will become corrupted if they receive back their money; yet he is not at all alarmed for this pure and incorruptible Government to receive it. He sees no danger from the alarming influence of executive patronage. He fears no danger that it will corrupt the office-holders of the country, or that it may be wielded, in the hands of the agents of the deposit banks, to effect political purposes, by being lent out to favorites, or used as banking capital of the country, and give rise to wild and reckless speculation. All he seems to fear is, if the poor fellows who dug it out of the earth should even receive one dollar apiece, that they will immediately become rascals. Sir, I think the gentleman will have some difficulty to convince his own people of that fact.

The honorable member complains of Yankee shrewdness, and supposes by their calculating coolness they have overreached Southern gentlemen; that they were voting for the bill with a view to keep up the tariff; that they well knew upon which side of their bread the butter was. Mr. McC. said he, like the gentleman, had a very exalted opinion of the political sagacity of his Northern brethren, and that they would be very apt to find upon which side of the bread the butter was. But he said he had heretofore thought the gentlemen from New York had discovered more political sagacity than the delegations of other States. While some of them could see so clearly as to tell upon which side of their bread the butter was, the delegation from New York had no difficulty on that subject, as they generally had butter on both sides of their bread. That they collected much the largest portion of impost duties at that port, and that it contributed in no small degree to aid their banking operations. Another honorable gentleman from that State [Mr. MANN] thinks the country cannot stand another distribution; that it would dissolve like flax in the fire. Mr. McC. said that he had seen the Union dissolved so often, since he had been in Congress, that his mind had become familiarized with the catastrophe. He was of the opinion that the gentleman was mistaken; instead of a dissolution of the Union, it was a dissolution of some of his safety fund banks.

The gentleman has said that we are taxing the people for distribution. This appears to be a talismanic word with those gentlemen who wish to keep the money. Mr. McC. denied that one dollar of the surplus money was raised by taxation. It was from the sale of property. It was from the sale of public lands, the common property of the people of all the States. He said it had not occurred, he supposed, to those wise lecturers, that the customs for the last three years had not paid the expenses of the Government, or any thing like it; and but for the extraordinary sales of the public lands, we should not have one surplus dollar in the Treasury, but, on the contrary, we should have been bankrupt. And yet we are continually told, if we divide out the sales of the public lands among the people, it is levying a tax upon them. Sir, if putting money in the people's pockets is taxing them, then they will not be apt to complain of the burdens of taxation. The fund accruing from the sales of public lands has, in my judgment, been improperly put into the national Treasury. Mr. McC. said he believed it was a direct violation of the deed of cession, made by Virginia to the Federal Government. By that deed, it will be seen that all the land that remained unsold, after the objects of the grant had been complied with, was to be the common property of all the States, Virginia inclusive.

It must be admitted by all that, under the articles of confederation, Congress could not have given any other direction to this fund, as it will be recollected that at that time we had no common treasury but in the event of foreign war, and that treasury was made by a direct tax on real estate, with the improvements thereon, in the several States; and, as to the common burdens of the Government, each State paid its own delegates. It is admitted that Congress could not, under the articles of confederation, have put the sales of the public land in the common treasury; but I am told that we are not under the articles of confederation, but under the constitution. Here I might rest the argument, and call upon gentlemen to show me the grant in the constitution that confers such a power upon Congress. The Federal Government is a Government of limited powers—all powers not delegated are reserved to the States, respectively. This Government must be confined in its action to the specific grants of power, and all powers necessary and proper to carry into effect those grants. Men may differ about incidental powers—about the means necessary and proper to carry into effect the granted powers; but I imagine there can be no difference of opinion when there is no such power conferred or granted in the constitution.

But, to place the question beyond doubt, I will refer the House to a part of the 3d section of the 4th article of the constitution, and also the 1st section of the 6th article: "The Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory and other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or any particular State." Again: "All debts contracted, and engagements entered into, before the adoption of this constitution, shall be as valid against the United States, under this constitution, as under the confederation." If the compact between the United States and the Federal Government was binding under the articles of confederation, all the rights they held are secured to them under the constitution. Congress has no power over that part of the public domain ceded by Virginia to the Federal Government, but to make needful rules and regulations to carry the compact into effect agreeably to the deed of cession. The Federal Government is only an agent for the States. And what would you think of an agent, to whom you had committed the management of your slaves and farm, if he was to contend that making needful rules and regulations for farming operations meant that he was to put all the income into his pocket?

Let me give the House the opinion of General Jackson upon the subject:

"The constitution of the United States did not delegate to Congress the power to abrogate these compacts.

On the contrary, by declaring that nothing in it 'shall be construed so as to prejudice any claim of the United States, or of any particular State,' it virtually provides that these compacts and the rights they secure shall remain untouched by the legislative power, which shall only make needful rules and regulations for carrying them into effect. All beyond this would seem to be an assumption of the undelegated power."

Mr. McC. said he supposed that General Jackson ought to be regarded as good authority for the prevailing party in the present and coming administration. If Congress have usurped the land fund, let them give it back to the States, that the State Governments may be strengthened to resist the action of this Government. Let no man say that he is a State-rights man who votes against returning to the States the surplus fund arising from the sale of the public domain. Let no man say that he is opposed to the Federal Government making internal improvement, as long as he votes to keep a vast surplus unemployed in the Treasury, tempting Congress to make extravagant and wasteful expenditures of the public money. Let no man say that he is a friend to internal improvement by the States, as long as he votes to deprive them of the only available means of doing so. Sir, this is too plain a question; the people well understand it. The administration has attempted to reduce the sales of the public lands to actual settlers, by a bill that few members of the new States themselves can swallow. It is not my purpose to discuss the land bill at this time. I mean to call the attention of Western gentlemen to this question in its true light. Suppose you reduce the tariff seven millions, and in 1842, or before that time, the amount of revenue collected will not support the Government: from what source will the deficit be made up? Three alternatives are presented to the country: first, to increase the price of public land, and increase the revenue from that source; to increase the tariff upon imports; or to call for the surplus money deposited with the States. Is the country prepared for either event?

To call upon the States for the money deposited with them would be a ruinous policy. Many States have already embarked in extensive works of internal improvement upon the faith and credit of that money—improvements that are opening a thousand avenues to wealth and prosperity, and will enable these local communities to develop their full resources; and to call for that money now would be political madness, and few men would like to take the responsibility of such a measure. Gentlemen make long and labored arguments to prove, what nobody denies, that Congress may repeal the compromise act. Sir, I am not in favor of collecting more revenue than is wanted for an economical administration of the Government; yet, in bringing the Government to that standard, some respect should be paid to the great and leading interests of the country; to the time and manner this thing should be done; and, sir, without a more urgent necessity than now exists, we should await the operation of the compromise bill. Sir, the foundation of this Government was laid deep in the principles of compromise. The same elements of discord existed at the formation of the Federal Government that exist now. The constitution was formed by mutual concession of all parties; and, to be administered fairly, it must be done in the same spirit. Sir, it cannot be forgotten that this Government, in the course of its administration, called Northern capital from the ocean, and compelled its owners to employ it upon land; and by a series of legislation, whether right or wrong, in some measure plighted the faith of the Government to that policy. Sir, the painful controversy between the North and the South upon this question is fresh in the recollection of this House—a controversy that shook this confederacy to its centre; yes, sir, a controversy that threatened a dissolution of this Union, and the arraying brother against brother in deadly and mortal combat—an event that every trembling patriot must have regarded as the funeral knell of departing liberty.

Distribution Question.

Sir, I have not forgotten the feeling that inspired the community at the passage of the compromise act. It was like the rays of the morning sun dispelling the gloom of night. The countenance of every man, woman, and child, beamed with joy. Scarcely had the smile left their countenances before the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means presented a bill breaking up that arrangement, and again opening that vexed question; and with it reviving all the angry feelings of party strife and political warfare. Sir, we of the South should indulge in no unkind feelings toward our Northern brethren; they belong to the great political family with ourselves, and claim, and justly too, a proud equality with the people of any portion of this Union. Sir, I hope the House will excuse me for the time I have consumed in the desultory and unpremeditated remarks I felt myself called on to make, and I will now take my seat.

Mr. PICKENS said he came from a State which would be affected very little by either ratio of distribution that might be adopted; it made very little difference to South Carolina what ratio of distribution might be established. Her combined representation in both Houses bears nearly the same proportion to the combined representation of all the States, as her representation in this House bears to the whole representation here. But he, (Mr. P.,) if he gave any opinion on the subject, was bound to confess that he considered that ratio which had been adopted last year a more just and equitable one than the ratio now proposed to be made by this amendment, according to the representation on this floor alone. It ought to be borne in mind that the revenue to be distributed did not accrue from direct taxation; on the contrary, it was a fund principally derived from the sale of lands. Mr. P. did not consider that branch, strictly and technically speaking, public revenue; at least it did not arise from taxation, because those persons who had paid this money had received a full equivalent for the same; there was a quid pro quo on both sides; and this was not taxation, it was a sale; the parties therefore from whom this money was derived had not been taxed. He (Mr. P.) had heard it urged that those States where public lands were sold raised immense revenue, as if it were a burden; whereas, their people had received a full consideration for all the money they had paid into the Treasury. This was important to be considered. Now, in determining the ratio of distribution or deposit of funds thus derived, it would be difficult to fix any ratio exactly equal. But he (Mr. P.) was most willing—nay, he was most anxious—to adopt that ratio which came nearest to strict justice; and it certainly appeared to him that the ratio based upon the mere ground of representation in this House was not the most just, because the fund was derived not from direct taxation, but from sales of public lands and imposts. According to the most generally received doctrine, (but which was not strictly true,) import duties were paid according to consumption, and consumption was according to population. In this point of view, a distribution according to representation in this House would exclude two fifths of a certain class of our population in a certain section of this Union, and would not do justice. But, further, it was well known that in certain States there had been a large increase of population since the last census. For instance, there was Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, and Michigan; some of these States had doubled their population, and more justice would be done them by the combined ratio than the single. The ratio of both Houses combined would approach nearer justice than any other we could adopt.

The funds raised from the sale of public lands were strictly trust funds; and this Government was created a trustee under the grants of territory from Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and other States, which were, to a great extent, limitations on the trust power. The act ceding these lands is in these words: "That the said lands shall be considered as a common fund, for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become or shall become members of the confederation or federal alliance of said States, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective portions of the general charge and expenditure; and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever."

Mr. P. then maintained that it was the duty of the Government, after all demands against it were satisfied, to deposit the surplus remaining, so that the States should receive the "use" and "benefit," as far as possible, intended by those States originally ceding the lands. He contended that it was not only sound policy, but our duty. The question as to a deposit of the surplus revenue was one between the safety and propriety of State corporations, selected as deposit banks, and the States themselves; and how any gentleman could hesitate between the two systems, he was at a loss to perceive. The one system gave us the unknown and dangerous power of banks, the other the faith and the stability of the States; and, whatever benefit might arise, the citizens of the States could receive it, instead of corporations with exclusive privileges.

But (Mr. P. said) it was not his desire, at that time of night, and that late day in the session, to trespass upon the time of the House with a full discussion of these points. He should not have said a word on this occasion, had it not been for the remarks of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VANDERPOEL.] That gentleman began his singular speech with an analysis of the votes that had been given on this occasion; and he (Mr. P.) thought that the gentleman, in reading a lecture, as he had done, to the North and to the South, had travelled, he must say, rather out of his sphere. The gentleman had made use of a homely adage—true, not very polished in parliamentary language, yet calculated to illustrate his lecture—he had said that those gentlemen who represented the manufacturing interests, "from their Yankee cunning, well knew how to discern on which side their bread was buttered."

He (Mr. P.) would retort upon that gentleman, and would say that it appeared to him clear enough that those gentlemen who, on every occasion, and on every question, unchangeably advocated and supported the political interest of a political party on this floor—they, they were the men who knew well "on which side their bread was buttered." Yes, sir; when the Treasury was full, they knew well, to use his own adage, where the butter for their bread came from; and then, sir, we never heard a whisper of what they now talk so much about—of reducing the revenue to the wants of the Government. No, sir; they knew so well how their bread was buttered, that they did not then talk of diminishing the quantity. But now, when it is proposed to distribute this surplus, they cry out in loud, and, they would fain make the country believe, in patriotic accents, for reducing the revenue to the wants of the Government! It must be left in the pockets of the people—the dear people!

Sir, when the Treasury was full to overflowing, in December, 1835, then the President himself, in his annual message, declared that "Congress should not disturb the principles on which the compromise act was passed;" and, further, he says: "If the unexpected balance in the Treasury should continue to increase, it would be better to bear with the evil until the great changes contemplated in our tariff laws have occurred, and shall enable us to revise the system with that care and circumspection which are due to so delicate and important a subject," &c. This was the language of the leader of this party then—the compromise ought not to be touched. And now gentlemen wheel to the right-about, and declare that this compromise ought not to be regarded. Why this gross and palpable contradiction? Sir, the reason is too manifest. When the President was willing to maintain the compromise bill, he had the treasures of the country in his hand; he had seized them in defiance of law, and he intended to use them, and he did use them, for his own base and profligate party purposes! Then, sir, there were no measures in agitation to take them out of his hands, to distribute them; and then, sir, he was willing they should continue to pour into the Treasury; then he was willing there should be no curtailment in the sources of corruption; then, sir, he did not dream of reducing the revenue to the wants of the people! No; then the compromise bill was to be kept sacred! Then, indeed, sir, the dependents of the Treasury and the political party of the gentleman [Mr. VANDERPOEL] knew well on "which side their bread was buttered." Now, sir, however, things have changed their aspect; and now we hear these same gentlemen talk in patriotic strains of reducing the revenue, of diminishing this fund of corruption! Now they read lectures to the Southern people, proclaiming themselves the peculiar guardians of their interests! devoted to the anti-tariff interests of this country! And why, sir, do we now hear this whining, these feeling professions of love for the dear people? Because this political party now dread that this surplus should pass out of their hands for just and safe deposit in the States, to whose people it rightfully belongs. Yes, sir; they love to hold in their own hands the money which they have used for purposes of fraud and bribery, and by means of which they have succeeded in foisting into power the minion of their political idol. They have used a league of banks, through which they have broken down the consecrated barriers of enlightened freedom, and have forced by foul means a man upon the confederacy who has no claims to the gratitude of his country. And, now that they have succeeded, as things begin to change, they preach about reducing the revenue to the wants of the Government, and talk about corruption! In their eagerness to keep still fast hold of the money, in their fear of seeing it slip from their grasp, they talk of its dangerous effects, of its corrupting the States, of its corrupting the people! and read us, who vote for this just distribution, lectures to warn us in their paternal love to beware of its dangerous consequences!

Sir, I could not sit still in my seat and hear this language held in the face of facts by those who have been the instruments of corruption, of subverting the power of the States by their employment of this money, by binding down the independence of the States to the footstool of executive power, by their unlimited control over this very surplus revenue. And now, after all this, they come here and call out for justice, and descant upon corruption with purity on their lips and any thing else in their hearts!

When a representative of the New York dynasty holds this language, and talks of bringing the revenue down to the wants of the Government, it is easy to see the motive; it is easy to see that they are alarmed at the tendency of things. If it were in order, and not so late, I would allude to some facts; but I do not choose to do so at present. And he would ask the gentleman [Mr. VANDERPOEL] if he himself did not, last session, in a speech, maintain that the compromise act was not to be touched, that it ought not to be; I ask the gentleman if I report him right.

Then, how does the gentleman come here now to call upon us to break it up? He now rises here, and has the hardihood to preach lectures to us about our rights, our duties, and our interests! I repeat, sir, they have changed their course; they contradict their own actions. When there were thirty-seven millions in the Treasury, at their unlimited control, then the compromise act was not to be touched; but now, when the money is in danger of slipping out of their hands, and there is danger that those who are in possession of the power of the country shall lose their source of corruption; when the measure of distribution is proposed, they who before were of the opinion that the compromise act should be held sacred, now read lectures to the South, and give us warning against the measure of distribution, as if we were thereby about to bring a revived tariff upon our country! Who brought upon us the tariff of 1828? The President elect and his political friends. They voted for it, and passed it in the Senate by a majority of one vote. Are these the men the South are to be taught to look up to as their guardians and protectors—guardians ready to swindle and betray them? What do we now see before our eyes? These very men are now holding up before this House a bill to reduce immediately the tariff, in utter defiance of the compromise, for the benefit of the South, while another bill has just been sent us here from the Senate, framed by the very same party, avoiding almost entirely the interests embraced and secured by the compromise, and which is to be held out for the benefit of the North. If this party who are now in power are sincere in their professions, and intend to act immediately upon this subject, why not unite on one bill and pass it? Why produce division and confusion by two bills in direct conflict?

Mr. P. said he was willing to do the best he could, under all the circumstances of the case; and he was not willing to take on implicit faith the representations and kind professions of gentlemen who are ever ready to do lip service, but who have always deserted us in time of need, from the Missouri question down to the tariff of 1828—gentlemen who represent no settled interests, but a political party, for political purposes and political effects. Sir, I trust no politician by profession. It is because I dread the power and faithlessness of politicians, as connected with the treasures of this Government, that I now desire to force the surplus from their foul grasp, by depositing it with the States. I am for this deposit, because I desire to break down corruption and bribery here, and to give power, independence, and blessing, to the States of this confederacy. Without this disposition of the surplus, a corrupt dynasty here must be forever uncontrolled.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, rose and said he thought it necessary for every gentleman to exercise a little philosophy on the present occasion. - He (Mr. P.) had voted generally with the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. VANDERPOEL,] but he had not entered into collision with any one in the vote he had given. He thought it did not come with good grace from New York to oppose this bill, on the ground that Rhode Island, Delaware, and other small States, received a small fraction more than they were entitled to. He confessed it was not, perhaps, pleasant to come from a small State; for, if it gained a little but once in a hundred years, there was no end to the reproaches made on that account. Mr. P. asked if it was fair and liberal in New York not to be satisfied? New York might be called the ruling city; there they generally had seven or eight millions on hand, of which they were always receiving the benefit, and yet they were not satisfied. And yet it might be shown that New York had received nearly seven millions more than it was entitled to. When he (Mr. P.) saw that great State arrayed to deprive the small States of the little which they received, he felt himself called upon to lift up his voice against it. He (Mr. P.) had voted against the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELT], because he was not willing to record the idea that there would be a surplus revenue to divide among the States; he did not wish to give an argument in favor of a bill which his honorable friend from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] had called a free-trade bill; he did not wish to see that bill introduced; but, if there should be a surplus to divide, it might be provided for by a bill afterwards, to be brought in for that purpose; and then, in such an event, he should go upon the ground that it ought to be divided according to the ratio of the States, and not upon the ratio of the representation in the House.

Mr. DENNY, in reply to the observations of Mr. VANDERPOEL, observed that he [Mr. VANDERPOEL] had not pointed out who were the true horse-leeches, crying "give, give." He contended it was not the States to which this appellation ought to be applied, but, on the contrary, to the banks. They had the money for their benefit; among them it was distributed, and the country called upon them to disgorge. They were the true leeches; they held on; and if gentlemen voted in the views of that honorable gentleman, [Mr. VANDERPOEL], they would still be permitted to hold on. We are (said Mr. D.) in possession of a surplus which is not derived from revenue, but from the sale of the public lands. The honorable gentleman [Mr. VANDERPOEL] alleges that the distribution of this surplus among the States will have a most ruinous tendency; it will make the Union a mere rope of sand. These he (Mr. D.) thought extraordinary arguments; we shall live over all this; the danger which the honorable gentleman threatens is not to be apprehended; but, on the contrary, great danger is to be apprehended if such a surplus is left at the discretion of the Government, to be loaned out at its pleasure to banks in every section of the country, thus enabling the Government to exercise a control over all parts of the Union, of an extent and of an intensity without parallel in any country in the world. But the honorable gentleman, [Mr. VANDERPOEL], instead of going into the merits of the case, and placing these things in their true light, has adopted a different course, and has contended himself with passing in review the different votes which have been given by different gentlemen on this question. Why is this? Why has he not rather discussed the real merits of the question? Instead of the merits of the case, he has brought into the field the feelings of gentlemen, as if the better to operate by an appeal to feelings rather than to argument. He [Mr. VANDERPOEL] has spoken of the horse-leech, and has characterized by this appellation his own constituents. Let them judge for themselves how far they merit the term. To him it appeared New York was more deserving the term than any other section of the country; for, out of twenty-two millions from the customs, New York received thirteen millions, which was paid there; and who, then, he would ask, was the horse-leech?

Mr. ROBERTSON said he would not be so unreasonable as to detain the House at that late hour. He rose merely to make his acknowledgments to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VANDERPOEL], who had so kindly undertaken to represent the State of Virginia. The gentleman had only followed the example of the State from whence he came, in taking the old Commonwealth under his especial protection; and, as one of her representatives, (said Mr. R.,) I feel myself bound, with all due humility, to acknowledge the favor. Those whom she has confided in to represent her, it seems, have mistaken her interest and their own duty. We have been outwitted, the gentleman tells us; gulled by a Yankee trick into the support of a measure which will fasten upon our constituents the present ruinous tariff. The Northern gentlemen very consistently urge a distribution of the surplus, in order (says the gentleman from New York) to prevent the success of any plan for reducing the revenue and diminishing the high rate of duties; and we of the South, who vote with them, are the dupes of their superior cunning. Sir, the gentleman himself is entitled to great credit for his own wonderful acuteness, which enables him so clearly to see through the designs of these very sagacious politicians; and it is kind in him to apprise us of our danger. I should like to have heard him assign the reasons why New York, some years past, so much in favor of distributing the surplus, is now so decidedly opposed to it. The true reason might perhaps be found to be that, having always a very large share of the public funds, she gains more by keeping what she has than by coming into a fair division. But, without attempting to account for the motives which influence others, I will very frankly tell the gentleman the reasons that induce me to vote for a distribution. Sir, it is with no view, as he would insinuate, of keeping up the present tariff, but with a view to counteract it. Is it to be endured that the gentleman from New York, who belongs to the dominant majority—to that party which professes so strong an interest for the South, and so much hostility to this tariff—should taunt Southern gentlemen of the minority with a design to co-operate with the North in keeping it up? If he and his party are sincere in their professions, why have they, who wield the whole power of legislation, permitted the South so long to be plundered by this unjust system of taxation? Why suffer it to oppress us for a day, when they have the power at any moment to repeal it? Why has the scheme of reduction proposed during the present session been permitted, until this late day, to slumber upon the table?

Sir, it is because we have no confidence in their professions that we are compelled to take the only means left us for redress, by restoring to the people of the South what this democratic majority continues to exact from them. It is this consideration—the conviction that the surplus revenue, whether derived from the sales of the public property or from the operation of an oppressive and unconstitutional tariff, belongs to the people, and would be worse than wasted by being left to the disposal of this Government—that induced me to support the proposition last year for distributing it. Upon the same principles, until the ruling party shall reduce the tariff, or take some effectual method for limiting the revenues to the just wants of the Government, I will vote for a distribution; I call it a distribution, because in truth no one expects a dollar will ever be called for by this Government. Only consider, sir, what would have been our present condition, had the act of the last session not been passed. We found in the Treasury, on the first day of January last, an unexpended balance of about fourteen millions remaining of the sums appropriated for the service of the last year; about six millions more it is thought remained unexpended, in the safe keeping of the disbursing officers. We distributed among the States about thirty-seven millions, making, together, about fifty-seven millions; add to this the estimated amount of receipts into the Treasury during the current year, and you would have had an aggregate sum of ninety or one hundred millions of dollars, perhaps even more, to be disposed of at the present session. What, sir, should we have done with it? We appropriated, last year, about twenty millions more than could be expended. Should we have been called upon still to increase our extravagant and enormous appropriations to accumulate still larger balances? Yes, sir; and then we should have applied all that could not be wasted in useless fortifications, splendid custom-houses, high salaries, and corrupt jobs of every sort, to carry on an unjust system of internal improvements in the Northern and Western States, from which the Southern people would, as usual, have derived little or no benefit. Sir, it is true, as the gentleman from New York says, the people of the South have been gulled; they have been gulled with promises of retrenchment long enough, while suffering from the oppressive exactions of this Government, and have at length, I trust, awakened to a proper sense of their rights and of their interest.

A word, sir, in conclusion, on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MANN] before me, proposing a distribution among the States in the ratio of their representation on this floor. I had intended to vote for that amendment, but further reflection has brought me to a different determination. It does not adopt, any more than the provisions of the deposit act which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] has preferred, the ratio prescribed by the constitution. That ratio, the ratio of federal numbers as it is called, it is impracticable at this time to apply; and though some of the States, particularly the smaller ones, get under the deposit act more than their just proportion, and some consequently less, the standard proposed by the gentleman from New York would, I am inclined to think, rather increase than lessen the inequality. The new States, at least, would be seriously injured by the change; and, as exact justice cannot be administered to all by either plan, I am willing to adopt that which most nearly approaches it, and which is likely to give the most general satisfaction.

Mr. HOAR felt induced to ask permission of the House to give his grateful acknowledgments for the compliment which had been paid to the people of the North by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VANDERPOEL.] That gentleman, under the name of Yankees, had particularly directed his compliments to the State to which he (Mr. H.) had the honor to belong. He was not disposed to take his [Mr. VANDERPOEL's] remarks as the gentleman had intended them; he had uttered the words as a reproach and a sarcasm; but, though such was their import and intention, he (Mr. H.) claimed them as sober truth; he thought it was true, in relation to Massachusetts, that she knew, as the honorable gentleman had said, "on which side of the bread the butter lies." By this expression he understood that Massachusetts was reproached as not being ignorant of what would conduce to the benefit of their section of the country, and what would operate to its peculiar injury, but without regarding the welfare of the whole. But, sir, the Massachusetts people well understand that the butter lies on that side of the bread which bears the general welfare of the whole country; that the best contract and the best legislation is that which is most equitable; that this alone, in the nature of things, can be permanent; and such being the fact, he took it as a compliment paid to the people of the North, and to Massachusetts in particular. There were laws in existence, the laws of the land; and on the faith of the permanency of these laws the people of the North had guided and directed their course and their conduct; the pursuits of the whole country were predicated upon these laws; and if the North knew that it conducted to the safety and benefit of the country that laws of such importance should not be forever vacillating and changing; if the North knew that the permanency of rules on which the business transactions of the country were all based, or if, in the words of the honorable gentleman, the North knew on which side of the bread the butter is, he considered it as a compliment, and returned thanks accordingly, while he would only say he wished that others knew the same thing themselves, which surely they ought to know. If the laws by which the pursuits of the whole country were guided were to be changed on every slight pretence, and the citizens were to be beaten about from land to ocean and from ocean to land, nothing but bankruptcy and ruin could befall those who had relied upon the laws for stability and protection. He therefore deprecated the idea held forth by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VANDERPOEL,] that because there was a surplus revenue derived from lands, therefore the whole policy of the country must now undergo a change, and laws which every one imagined fixed were to be subverted by a momentary caprice.

Mr. H. then proceeded to show that he did not advocate taxation for the sake of distribution; that man, he thought, would deserve a straight jacket, who would think of such a thing; but he viewed this money, not as the proceeds of taxation, for it came from the sale of lands, not from taxes of any kind imposed upon the people. Mr. H. concluded by laying down this proposition; that of all curses which can be inflicted upon a country, a course of legislation characterized by sudden changes, compelling the citizens frequently to change their pursuits and employment, is the greatest curse; this he held to be a proposition which no one could deny. The reverse of this is the side of the bread on which the butter lies.

The question was then taken upon agreeing to the amendment of Mr. MANN, and decided in the negative.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then submitted the following proposition, by way of amendment to Mr. BELL's amendment, which he said he would do without one word of debate:

Be it further enacted, That from and after the 31st of December next, in all cases where duties are imposed on foreign imports by the act of the 14th of July, 1832, entitled "An act to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports," or by any other act, which shall exceed 20 per centum on the value thereof, one third part of such excess shall be deducted; from and after the 30th of June, 1838, one half of the residue of such excess shall be deducted; and on the 30th of December, 1838, the other half shall be deducted; any thing in the act of the 2d of March, 1833, to the contrary notwithstanding.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the 30th September next, the duty on salt shall be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. HARDIN said it was certainly too late in the session to take up the subject of regulating the whole of the tariff.

Mr. BELL raised the point of order whether such a proposition, being of a distinct and substantive character, in no way analogous either with the bill or the amendment, could be moved; and, also, that it was the same as a bill already before the House.

The CHAIR (temporarily occupied by Mr. BRIGGS) decided against the point, on the ground that the amendment was not the same as the bill in question.

Mr. CAMBRELENG asked for the yeas and nays on the adoption of his proposition.

Mr. MERCER then took an appeal from the decision of the Chair that the amendment was in order.

The CHAIR [Mr. BRIGGS] having stated the grounds of his decision, that the amendment was not the same, in many material points, as the bill on the subject of the tariff before the House,

Mr. MERCER insisted upon his point; and Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, asked for the yeas and nays on the appeal, but the House refused to order them; and, after some remarks from Mr. REED,

Mr. CAMBRELENG drew the attention of gentlemen to the fact that they had themselves called for this proposition. With regard to the point of order, he would only remark, in the first place, that the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee was itself actually a part of a proposition before the Committee of Ways and Means. There were a number of memorials sent to that House on the subject of a distribution of the surplus revenue, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. Resolutions of State Legislatures and other propositions, also on the same subject, had been referred to that committee. Nor was that all. That committee had reported on the subject, and the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee was only one half of that reported on by that committee.

Distribution Question.

In the second place, the one proposition was just as much in order as the other, for the subject of both was the same. Mr. C. did not pretend that both were not a violation of the spirit of the rules; but inasmuch as the House had admitted the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee, it could not, consistently with itself, but admit the converse of that proposition. If they voted contrary to the decision of the Chair, they would be virtually voting down their own proposition, at least against the propriety of ingrafting it upon this bill.

Mr. WARD said he always felt disposed to sustain the Chair, where he could do so consistently; but he regretted to say that, in the present instance, he felt compelled to differ from its decision—not, however, on the ground taken by the honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MASON,] who had taken the appeal, but on the ground that, by the 41st rule of the House, it is expressly laid down that no motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted “under color of amendment.” Now, it was clear to Mr. W.’s mind (and he must confess that he felt no little surprise that there should be a difference of opinion on the subject) that the proposition now sought to be ingrafted on this bill had not even the most remote analogy with it. Each was of itself a distinct and substantive proposition, having no identity with, nor even bearing upon, the other. Would gentlemen point out what possible affinity there was between the plan for distributing a surplus or supposed surplus of the public revenue and the appropriations for the ordinary expenditures in fortifications?

But, asked the gentleman from Virginia before him, [Mr. PATTON,] if the original amendment were admissible, wherein consisted the inadmissibility of this amendment? Mr. W., for himself, would give the gentleman a response. He held the one to be just as inadmissible as the other; and who would contend that “two wrongs make a right?” He thought the decision of the Chair, in admitting the original amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, an unsound one, and the present embarrassment demonstrated it. To that amendment he had the same objection as to the present, and nothing but his known disinclination to raise a question of order, and the unparalleled accumulation of public business to be acted on in the short space of four days, prevented his then taking an appeal from the decision of their presiding officer. Thus much as to the applicability of the rules.

Mr. W. had, however, other and strong objections, applying both to the original proposition and the proposed amendment—objections which, though they had no immediate connexion with the point of order, yet they grew out of it. Without arrogating to himself the power of precedence as to what the Chief Magistrate might do, should this proposition be adopted by the two Houses of Congress, or without pretending to be an exponent of the opinions of that venerable patriot, yet his principles and sentiments were so well known that every gentleman must acknowledge that the whole bill would be jeopardized by ingrafting upon it this scheme of distribution. Let him ask, then, were gentlemen prepared to assume the responsibility of defeating this bill altogether?

Were they willing, for the sake of adopting a favorite scheme, the policy of which was at least questioned, to hazard the loss of a bill, the expediency and necessity of which was felt by all? Had gentlemen so soon forgotten the labored and untiring efforts of members of the last Congress to relieve themselves from any participation in the loss of the fortification bill two years ago? He repeated that he did apprehend the loss of the bill if this measure should be ingrafted on it, and he appealed to honorable gentlemen not to do that by an indirect vote which they would spurn to do directly; for an affirmation of the decision of the Chair, and the subsequent adoption of the amendment, would, he insisted, be virtually a vote against the bill itself.

One word as to the principle involved in the measure itself, and Mr. W. would take his seat; for the opportunity had gone by when long speeches could be made. He was opposed to the scheme of distribution, as provided for by the amendment. He had opposed it at the last session, and recorded his vote against it; and he never had, nor did he believe he ever should have, cause to regret that vote. A majority of that House was of a different opinion, and Mr. W. was compelled to yield, after doing all that the constitution empowered him to do to arrest its passage—that of recording his vote in the negative. In conclusion, he again made an earnest appeal to the House to reverse the decision of the Chair; for by that alone could they insure the passage of the appropriation bills for the necessary wants of the Government. Should the House affirm the decision of the Chair, and then vote down the amendment, its friends, under that decision, would renew it on the other appropriation bills, and one or all of them would be inevitably lost. Mr. W. here enumerated some of the more important bills; among which were, besides the fortification bill, the harbor bill, the civil and diplomatic bill, the Cumberland road bill, &c. For these reasons, thus hastily expressed, Mr. W. should vote to reverse that decision; and he sincerely hoped that, in that vote, he would meet with the support of a majority of the House.

Mr. HAYNES* said he had yet to learn that, when a proposition had been entertained and passed to dispose of the whole revenue of the country, except the sum of five millions of dollars, by a distribution among the States, it could be out of order to consider a motion to reduce that revenue. It was the greatest absurdity to contend that, while we had been considering a plan to distribute the public money, it was not in order to entertain a proposition to reduce or regulate its amount. He said it was obvious to him that this scheme of distribution was intended to prevent any future reduction of the public revenue. If the point of order now raised shall be sustained, (and there seemed to be a strong probability that it would,) it would furnish conclusive evidence that the distributors were, in fact and in principle, opposed to any reduction of the revenue whatever.

* Note by Mr. H.—The remarks of Mr. HAYNES were made upon a question of order. That question of order was this: Mr. BELL had moved an amendment to distribute, upon the principles of the deposit act of the last session, the surplus revenue over five millions of dollars, which might be in the Treasury on the 1st of January next. After that amendment had been adopted, and one offered by Mr. MANN, of New York, to regulate its deposit by the standard of representation established for the regulation of direct taxes, had been rejected, Mr. CAMBRELENG offered an amendment to reduce the tariff of duties on foreign imports. Mr. CAMBRELENG’s proposition was objected to, as out of order. That objection was sustained by a majority of the House, and justifies and sustains the position taken by Mr. HAYNES, that the distributing party intend that the public revenue shall never be reduced, if they can prevent it.

He would now take leave to warn Southern gentlemen, those whose constituents were opposed to a high tariff and system of distribution, that they were making common cause with a party utterly and entirely opposed to a reduction of the tariff, as they were also opposed to any and every diminution of the public revenue.

The point of order was then further discussed by Messrs. MERCER, PARKER, and REED.

The question was taken on the appeal, and decided in the negative: Yeas 94, nays 97, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, Ash, Barton, Beale, Bean, Black, Bockee, Bouldin, Bovee, Boyd, Brown, Burns, Cambreleng, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, J. F. H. So the House reversed the decision of the Chair.

The question then recurred on the amendment, as amended.

Mr. MARTIN then submitted the following amendment to the amendment:

"That the sales of the public lands shall cease from and after the passage of this bill, except to actual settlers upon the public land, upon such rules and regulations as shall be presented by the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approbation of the President of the United States, and which shall not be inconsistent with the following instructions:

"1st. That no one settler shall purchase a larger quantity than two sections.

"2d. That two years' residence upon the land, after the purchase, shall be necessary, and shall be satisfactorily proven to the Secretary of the Treasury before the patent issues.

"3d. That the price of the public lands to the settler shall be regulated as follows: To the purchaser of a quantity of land not exceeding one quarter section, fifty cents per acre; not exceeding one half section, seventy-five cents per acre; and to the purchaser of a section, or more, one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre."

The CHAIR decided this amendment to be out of order.

Mr. MARTIN appealed from the decision of the Chair, and called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 116, nays 68, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. So the decision of the Chair was affirmed by the House.

The question was then taken on the amendment of the Committee of Ways and Means, as amended by Mr. BELL, and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 110, nays 84.

So the amendment was concurred in.

The next and last amendment made in Committee of the Whole, and coming up on the question of concurrence, was the appropriation of $40,000 for fortifications at the mouth of Connecticut river.

After a few remarks from Mr. MCKAY, expressing his opposition to the appropriation at this time, on the ground that a survey had not yet been made,

The question was taken, and the amendment was non-concurred in.

The question then recurred on the engrossment of the bill for a third reading.

Mr. VANDERPOEL called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. PATTON said he desired to say a few words before the question was taken, not for the purpose of discussing the principles of the deposit act, but for the purpose of explaining distinctly the grounds of the vote he was about to give, and which might perhaps otherwise be misunderstood. I was one of those, Mr. Speaker, (said Mr. P.,) who zealously and strenuously supported the bill of the last session, directing the deposit of the surplus revenue with the States. I considered it and intended it bonafide as a deposite, and not as a distribution; and in that point of view, and looking to the actual circumstances in which we were placed, I then thought it a most salutary, necessary, and constitutional measure. I have seen nothing and heard nothing which has at all shaken my confidence in the wisdom of that law; concurring fully in the denunciations against any system of raising revenue for the purpose of distribution as inexpedient, unjust, and unconstitutional, I am utterly unable to comprehend the force or justice of the effort which is made to apply these denunciations to a measure which proposes to deposite with the States that revenue which has been unnecessarily taken from the pockets of the people, which it is found impossible to expend, even by the most liberal appropriations of every kind, and which, if not thus deposite, must remain deposited with numerous banks, and the benefit of this common property of the whole, in the shape of interest, discounts, &c., be employed by those immediately interested in those institutions, instead of being placed in such a situation, under the control of the Legislatures of each State, that the benefits and advantages of these funds, unnecessarily and improperly drawn from the people, may be, to some extent, and to a very considerable extent, diffused among those from whom it was improperly taken. All the declamation which has been written and spoken, all the apprehensions which have been expressed as to the danger of corrupting the people and the States, and laying them prostrate at the footstool of this Government, are bugbears which do not frighten me in the least. I have, therefore, no difficulty whatever in sustaining the principle of the deposite act, and renewing its provisions, for the disposition of a surplus, which accumulates in spite of all the efforts I can make to repeal or modify those unjust and oppressive laws by which this surplus is raised. It is, in my opinion, the best possible disposition that can be made of such a surplus. While these are my opinions, I have voted against the introduction of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee to this bill. I think it an inappropriate place for the law. This is a bill making the regular and ordinary appropriations for the completing and arming of our fortifications. It is strictly an appropriation bill; and the practice is very irregular, and will be productive of great confusion and mischief in our legislation, if subjects so incongruous, measures so various and inconsistent with each other, shall be jumbled together, and especially if the ordinary and annual appropriation bills shall be made the basis on which to pile acts of original legislation, distinct and independent of the annual provisions for satisfying demands created by past and permanent laws. This is one reason for my voting against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee. I had a further objection: the present Congress goes out of existence in a few days; before the emergency contemplated by the amendment can exist, a new Congress will have assembled. As yet, it is uncertain whether there will be any surplus; and it will be time enough, when Congress meets here next December, to dispose of the surplus, if it shall then exist, as that Congress may think right.

Distribution Question.

This measure, therefore, seems to me to be premature, unnecessary, and not altogether delicate to our successors; and although it is very probable, nay, almost certain, if I should be here at that time, and should find a large surplus, that I should be in favor of such a disposition of it as is contemplated by the amendment, still it seemed to me better to leave that matter to those who come after us, and whose business it seems more properly to be than ours. My objections, then, to the amendment have been on points of form and points of time, and not on grounds of hostility to the deposite of an inevitable surplus with the States, as has been already done. I had some faint hopes, too, that some modification of the tariff would take place, which would very much diminish, if not prevent, any surplus, which possibly might in some way be impeded by the success of a deposite bill. I attach, however, very little weight to this consideration, no more than I do to the other idea, that the passage of this amendment will interfere with the success of the land bill which has been sent to us from the Senate. If I thought the passage of the land bill would be impeded by the enactment of this deposite amendment, it would furnish an argument in favor of that amendment which would overrule and ought to overrule all objections as to form and time; for I have no hesitation in saying that I consider that land bill more impolitic, more pernicious in its practical operations, than the strongest opponents of those measures think the tariff and the deposite bill, and more unjust and more clearly unconstitutional than either of them.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I have constantly, since this amendment was proposed, voted against its incorporation with the fortification bill; and when it was decided by you, and acquiesced in by the House, that the amendment was in order as an amendment to this bill, I very cheerfully voted still further to amend the amendment by attaching to it a bill to reduce the revenue by a modification of the tariff. But the House have determined that the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee is in order; that it shall be incorporated with this bill; and, the bill being thus amended, the question is now presented whether the bill shall, as thus amended, be engrossed; in other words, whether the objections to the passage of the deposite provision at this time and in this form are so strong that we must sacrifice the appropriations for the fortifications; whether we shall rather make no provision for the ordinary and annual expenses of completing and improving the defences of the country, than give our sanction to the deposite provision. While I have opposed the introduction of this amendment, for the reasons above stated, although I would have voted against the passage of a distinct bill for the purpose contained in the amendment, as being premature, unnecessary at this time, and perhaps somewhat indelicate to the next Congress, still my objections to the deposite provision are not such as to warrant me in refusing to give my vote for it, when the alternative is either to vote for that, or to vote against the appropriations for keeping up, completing, and arming our fortifications. I shall not hesitate, therefore, to vote for engrossing the bill.

The question was then taken on the third reading of the bill, and decided in the affirmative, 112 to 70, as follows:

YAYS--Messrs. Ash, Beale, Bean, Beaumont, Black, Bockee, Boyd, Brown, Burns, Cambreleng, Chaney, Chapman, John F. H. Claiborne, Cleveland, Coles, Cramer, Cushman, Doubleday, Dromgoole, Dunlap, Fairfield, Fry, Fuller, Gholson, Gillet, Grantland, Joseph Hall, Hamer, Hannegan, Albert G. Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Holt, Huntington, Jarvis, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Klingensmith, Lansing, Lawler, Gideon Lee, Leonard, Logan, Loyall, Lucas, Abijah Mann, Martin, William Mason, McKay, McKim, Moore, Owens, Parks, Franklin Pierce, Pinckney, Joseph Reynolds, Rogers, Schenck, Seymour, Shinn, Sickles, Smith, Thomas, John Thomson, Toucey, Turrill, Vanderpool, Wagener, Wardwell, Yell--70.

So the bill was ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the bill (having been previously engrossed) was read a third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. BELL, the title of the bill was so amended as to add to the end the words "and for other purposes."

The House adjourned, at ten o'clock.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 27.

This being petition day, Mr. CAMBRELENG said that as there were only two days left on which bills could be passed between the two Houses, and as it was usual, at the close of the session, for gentlemen to lay their petitions on the table, because no action could be had thereon, he would move a suspension of the rule for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the appropriation bills.

Mr. A. MANN demanded the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. ADAMS said he hoped the motion would not prevail. This was the last day on which petitions could be presented, and he had a number in his possession which he was very desirous to present.

Mr. HAYNES rose to a question of order. He inquired whether a motion to suspend the rule was debatable.

The CHAIR said it was not.

Mr. ADAMS then moved a call of the House; which was not ordered.

Mr. LINCOLN hoped that the yeas and nays would be taken on the motion to suspend the rule, this being the last day for the presentation of petitions; but they were not ordered.

And the question on the motion to suspend was taken, and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 112, nays 21. So the rule was suspended.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. PIERCE, of New Hampshire, in the chair,) on the appropriation bills generally.

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved that the committee proceed to the consideration of the bill No. 895, being the old harbor bill.

Mr. CAMBRELENG hoped the committee would not take up that bill. He moved that the committee proceed to the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1837.

And, the question being taken on the motion of Mr. SUTHERLAND to proceed to the consideration of the old harbor bill, it was decided in the affirmative: Yeas 76, nays 65.

HARBOR BILL.

The bill having been read through,

Mr. SUTHERLAND said he wished simply to remark to the committee that this bill made appropriations for no new works, nor was it his intention to offer any.

Mr. CHAPIN moved an amendment appropriating $7,000 for the continuation of the works at Buffalo harbor.

Mr. C. said he had proposed the amendment under consideration, because an appropriation of seven thousand dollars for works at Buffalo harbor was recommended in the estimates of the engineer department accompanying the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, which was wholly omitted in the bill. The harbor bill, reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, provided for works already commenced under the authority of an act of Congress. For all such works appropriations were to be made annually until they should be completed, based upon the estimates of the engineer department, to whose charge and superintendence they had been committed. The provisions of this bill do not correspond at all with the estimates furnished and laid on our tables. In some instances the appropriations called for are omitted altogether, in others they are largely reduced. The aggregate of the estimates of the department for the year 1837 amounts to the sum of two millions three hundred and twenty-one thousand five hundred and thirty-six dollars; the aggregate of the appropriations for which provision is made in the bill, as reported, is the sum of nine hundred and forty-five thousand and dollars, falling short of what is required by the engineer department more than one half. Representing a district of country that has a deep interest in the improvement of harbors on the Northern lakes, he could not, consistently with a proper regard to his duty, suffer the bill to pass without expressing his dissent to the conclusions of the Committee of Ways and Means. He avowed it to be his settled conviction, that a judicious expenditure of the public treasure, having proper regard to economy and the great national objects to be effected by the speedy completion of these important works, required that Congress should respond fully to the calls of the engineer department by making liberal appropriations. He had devoted much time to the examination of this interesting subject, and was prepared to vote every dollar of appropriation to carry out and complete the present system of improving the harbors on the lakes called for by the department; and he hoped the various provisions of the bill, applicable to these works, would be amended accordingly. In the remarks he was about to submit, he should not, therefore, confine himself exclusively to the consideration of the amendment proposed, but he should take a wider and more comprehensive view of the subject, in order to call the attention of this branch of Congress and the country to the vast importance of these improvements, as connected with the internal commerce of the Northern and Western States.

At this late period of the session he was fully aware that the time of the House is too precious to be consumed in debate; he could assure gentlemen he did not intend to occupy more time than he deemed indispensably necessary, claiming for himself the privilege—a very common one—of presenting his views somewhat more in detail to the country, through the medium of the press.

The official communications annually made to Congress by the engineer department, in relation to the public works under their superintendence, are justly entitled to great consideration. Indeed, the estimates furnished by the resident engineer, and sanctioned by the distinguished officer at the head of the department, ought to furnish the measure of such appropriations, unless good cause can be shown why they should not. It might be said, without hazard of contradiction, there is not to be found in the public service a class of officers more intelligent, vigilant, trustworthy, and patriotic, than the corps of the United States engineers. Combining science with practical experience, and an intimate knowledge of the navigation and commerce of the country, they are eminently fitted for the discharge of the public trusts confided to them. Their estimates for appropriations are founded, without exception, upon actual surveys and examinations made on the ground, and furnish the most accurate and satisfactory information that can be acquired on the subject. For one, he had great confidence in these estimates, and he hoped the House would sustain the call of the department.

It is a part of the system of national protection to provide for the improvement and construction of harbors. They are works of great importance, and of public utility, clearly within the scope of the constitutional powers of Congress, and the legitimate objects of national legislation. The General Government derives revenue from commerce, in which the States, as such, cannot participate. The improvement of the harbors on the lakes having become, therefore, a part of the settled policy of the United States, it seems to be just that expenditures for necessary works should be commensurate to the increasing commerce of the country and the magnitude of the interests involved. Vast numbers of enterprising citizens have embarked in the commerce of these inland seas, under the reasonable expectation that Congress will make adequate appropriations to finish the works already begun, and authorize others where they are needed, by which means the dangers of navigation will be diminished, and the facilities of trade increased. Such expenditures are no longer to be regarded as of partial, local, or doubtful benefit. They are objects of vast national importance, affecting, to a large extent, the internal trade of the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan, and the Territory of Wisconsin, whose shores are washed by these lakes.

The strongest argument that can be suggested in support of liberal appropriations for these public works results from a simple narrative of facts, showing the increase of the commerce and navigation on the lakes. It would be instructive to present them somewhat in detail, as connected with the present argument, and for future reference.

In 1828, about the period when the present system of improving the harbors on the lakes commenced, the gross revenue collected in the district of Oswego, as ascertained from the Register of the Treasury, was only $64 65; in 1835 it was $36,424 49; and in 1836 it exceeded $52,000. In the district of Genesee, in 1828, the customs collected were only $131 26; in 1835, $26,071 74, and in 1836 they amounted to $60,000.

It appears from the transactions of the custom-house at Oswego, for 1836, that the aggregate of American vessels entered was 87,745 tons; of the same cleared, 93,323 tons. The aggregate of foreign vessels entered was 61,947 tons; of the same cleared, 60,554 tons.

During the past year, 26,998,697 pounds of merchandise were received at Oswego; of this amount, 16,039,226 pounds were destined to Canada and the upper lakes. There were also received during the same year 292,444 feet of sawed lumber, 35,217 feet of timber, and 180,000 bushels of foreign wheat.

There was, also, shipped on the canal from Oswego, in 1836, 72,239,084 pounds of property paying toll by weight; 8,390,948 feet of sawed lumber, and 192,112 feet of timber.

In discussing a subject of such vast importance to the people of the United States, it is impossible to keep out of view the immense extent and cost of the internal improvements, projected, commenced, and finished, under the authority of the several State Governments, and in the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, which have been or will be brought to bear with wonderful effect upon the trade, commerce, and general prosperity, of the States and Territory bordering upon the lakes. The works of the General Government, in the opening of harbors, commence where the internal improvements of the States terminate. New avenues for commerce in the fertile regions of the West are opening almost daily. The canals and railroads are the commercial channels leading to and from the lakes. Most of the harbors named in the bill on your table are the points of the actual or proposed terminations of such canals or railroads. The people of the States do, therefore, expect that the General Government will provide for the protection of shipping against the winds and waves, while receiving and discharging their cargoes, by the construction of piers, and by causing the obstructions to be removed at the entrance of harbors.

In 1822 there were about 10 sail of vessels, and only 1 steamboat, on all the upper lakes. In 1836 there were 39 steamboats, 3 ships, 6 brigs, and 147 schooners and sloops, with an aggregate tonnage of 25,206 tons; 13 steamboats of the largest class, and numerous other vessels, are now on the stocks, which will be ready for the opening of navigation in the spring.

During the past year, there were 810 arrivals, and the same number of clearances of steamboats, and 1,047 arrivals of ships, brigs, schooners, and sloops, and the same number of clearances, at the harbor of Buffalo, with an aggregate of 642,060 tons. During the same season there were 108,000 passengers going west from Buffalo in steamboats. The returns of the collector of canal tolls at Buffalo, in 1836, show an increase of seventy per cent. of merchandise and property sent beyond the State of New York through the Erie canal, and an increase of tolls collected there of nearly fifty per cent.

[Mr. MERCER rose and inquired whether the appropriation for Buffalo harbor was recommended by the engineer department.]

Mr. C. said he had so stated in the outset, and that he had no further knowledge of its necessity than such estimate, which he again referred to.

The following statement, which was believed to be authentic, exhibits the astonishing increase of the commerce of Chicago and Toledo:

"At Chicago, in 1833, were but four arrivals from the lower lakes, viz: 2 brigs and 2 schooners, say 700 tons. In 1835 there were about 250 arrivals, nearly all of which were schooners, averaging about 90 tons burden each, or 22,500 tons in all. In 1836, the first arrival was the 18th day of April. From that time to the 1st day of December, 226 days, 456 vessels (49 steamboats, 10 ships and barques, 2 brigs, 363 schooners, and 8 sloops) arrived, averaging 47,550 tons, as follows: 85 ships, steamboats, barques, and brigs, at 350 tons each, 21,250 tons; 363 schooners, at 100 tons each, (many of them carry 150 to 200 tons,) 36,300 tons—or 57,550 tons in all, without including the sloops. To give a more concise view of the increase of our commerce for the years above named, we place it in the following order:

1835	250	22,500
1836	456	57,550

"As there are several vessels now on the way which will arrive here this season, we may safely state the tonnage at 60,000, being an increase of 59,300 tons in three years.

"Toledo dates its birth as a town in June, 1834. At that period the space occupied by its present site, with the exception of one or two small clearings, was a dense forest. Its population scarcely amounted to 150. Not a steamboat of the larger class entered the Maumee river that year, except the Daniel Webster; which came in on her last trip in November. But few steamboats or schooners (we have not the means of a precise computation) entered the succeeding year, 1835. In 1836, from the opening to the close of navigation, there were, exclusive of the small steamboats that ply daily between this and Detroit, 601 arrivals, viz: 690 steamboats and 211 schooners, averaging 118,600 tons, as follows: 390 steamboats, at 250 tons each, 97,500 tons, 211 schooners, 100 tons each, 21,100 tons—making in all 118,600 tons."

Detroit, Milwaukee, Michigan city, and numerous other places of less importance, on the borders of these lakes, are making astonishing advances in trade, wealth, and population. It is said, upon good authority, that 223 vessels discharged cargoes at Milwaukee during the last season. The census of this town was taken under the act of Congress organizing the Territory of Wisconsin, and the population was ascertained to number 1,300, where, eighteen months before, there were but two families. These facts are surprising, even to those who live in this age of wonders. Every where in the vast fertile regions of the West, the country is advancing with railroad velocity, outstripping the calculations of the wildest enthusiast. The lake coast of New York and Pennsylvania, and the northern part of Ohio, have more than doubled in population within the last eight years, since the General Government began the construction of harbors; and Michigan has increased from a population of about twenty thousand, to upwards of two hundred thousand souls; from a wilderness, to a comparatively dense population of enterprising and industrious citizens.

It is impossible, at the present day, to assign limits to the future population and wealth of the States bordering upon the Western lakes. Their productive industry, owing to the fertility of the soil and other natural advantages, will soon equal that of any other portion of the United States of the like extent. The lakes, which are the natural avenues for their trade, are destined to be covered with vessels engaged in an active and profitable commerce.

A project has been set on foot to overcome the Falls of St. Mary, and open the navigation of Lake Superior, which, it is believed, may be accomplished at a comparatively trifling expense, as it will require but three locks of seven feet lift each, and a canal of less than a mile in length. By this means, more than twelve hundred miles of coast navigation would be added to the present.

The whole amount appropriated, from the commencement of the improvement of the harbors on the Northern lakes to the close of the last session of Congress, was one million two hundred and ninety-eight thousand eight hundred and forty dollars and eighteen cents. This sum has been applied to the following improvements:

The expenditures mentioned in the above tabular statement, it should be borne in mind, are for works extending along a coast navigation of twelve hundred miles, where, prior to 1828, no good harbors existed on the main land, except at the extremities of Lake Erie and Lake Ontario. Then, a trip from Buffalo to Detroit was considered as dangerous as crossing the Atlantic—vessels being often compelled, by sudden storms and adverse winds, when they had nearly reached the place of destination, in order to avoid being wrecked on the coast, to put back, and make the port from which they had sailed. Now, vessels of all descriptions cross Lake Erie with almost as little danger as they ascend the Hudson. The change has been wrought by the appropriations alluded to. Already twelve good harbors have been created on Lake Erie and three on Lake Ontario. These have been generally made by removing the bar at the entrance of the harbors, and by constructing piers of wood and stone to break the force of the waves, and prevent the accumulation of sand and gravel in the channels. This experiment has proved entirely successful. The object of the appropriations now asked for is, in most cases, to make these structures permanent; in some few others, it is to remove the bar between the piers.

No good harbors now exist on Lake Michigan. This fact accounts for the destruction of human lives and the loss of property which occurred on those waters during the past season. It is computed that property to the value of two hundred thousand dollars was destroyed by one storm, at and near Chicago, which was entirely owing to the impossibility of passing over the sand bar at the mouth of the river, between the piers. The following extract from the message of Governor Dodge, to the Legislature of Wisconsin, presents a clear and correct view of this branch of the subject:

"The shipping interest of Lake Michigan, for the last two years, has increased to a great extent, and little has been done to protect it. Appropriations for the construction of harbors and light-houses are of the first importance to protect our commerce, as well as the lives of enterprising citizens on Lake Michigan. Many lives, and property to a large amount, have been lost, for the want of the necessary harbors on this lake. I would suggest the propriety of asking of Congress an appropriation sufficient to cover the expenses of surveying all the necessary harbors on Lake Michigan, and the construction of such harbors and light-houses at the most eligible situations, for the security and protection of our lake trade."

The following is an extract from a memorial of the General Assembly of Indiana to the present Congress, asking an appropriation of one hundred thousand dollars for the improvement of the harbor at Michigan city, Indiana:

FEB. 27, 1837.]

Harbor Bill.

"That, owing to its natural and relative position, Lake Michigan may be emphatically styled, in its commercial importance, the Mediterranean of North America. The business in this lake has increased in a ratio far exceeding that of any other newly-occupied navigable waters. The amount of merchandise landed at the different points on the whole lake, it is believed, would not fall short of twenty millions of dollars. The amount landed at Michigan city alone exceeds three millions of dollars. The losses sustained by damage to vessels and merchandise on the lake during the past year, which mostly has been for want of harbors, has not been less than a million of dollars. In two years past, more than fifty lives have been lost, many of them young, intelligent, and promising, who met with a premature and watery grave for want of harbors; vessels being under the necessity of encountering the severest gales at sea, without any other hope than that of being able to outride the storm."

In 1836, five millions one hundred and fifteen dollars and ninety-three cents, as appears from the report of the Commissioner of the Land Office, were paid into the Treasury, on the sales of public lands, in the State of Michigan; yet the bill before us contains only the pitiful sum of forty-five thousand dollars for harbors in that State. This is a narrow, illiberal policy, unjust to the enterprising citizens who have emigrated from the Eastern States to settle and improve the public domain, and unworthy the character of a great and powerful empire.

The pioneers of the West may be regarded as the forlorn hope in the march of improvement. Their lot is a life of hardship, privation, and enduring toil, exposed alike to the dangers of savage warfare and the wasting diseases incident to all new settlements. They level the forest, reclaim the swamps, clear up and fence their farms, subdue and fit the soil for cultivation. They enlarge the bounds of civilization. They may be said to live not for themselves, but for their children—for the good of their country. Every consideration of justice, humanity, and patriotism, call upon the Congress of the United States to extend to those hardy, brave, enterprising citizens, who first occupy the public lands, and convert a howling wilderness into fruitful fields, to the fostering care and protection of the Government. Open to them the facilities of trade with the commercial cities on the seaboard. Enable them to send the products of their labor to market, where they may receive in exchange the commodities of the Southern States, the manufactures of New England, the teas of China, and the spices of India, at such reasonable cost that they may not be entirely deprived of the luxuries of life common to all who inhabit the old States of the Union.

The expense of transportation from Buffalo to Chicago, Milwaukee, or Michigan city, during the summer months, is about one dollar per barrel bulk; later in the season, when the weather becomes tempestuous, and the dangers of navigation increase, the price of freight advances to four or five dollars per barrel bulk, which, of course, becomes a charge upon the consumer. This enormous charge falls upon those least able to bear it; it falls upon the settlers on your public lands. The charge for freight would be nearly uniform, at all seasons of navigation, provided the harbors on Lake Michigan were made accessible to shipping, and secure against storms. This would, also, reduce the rates of insurance, which become, of necessity, a tax upon the people of the West.

It has long been the settled policy of Great Britain to extend her commerce whenever it can be done with profit, and to gain a foothold by occupying the ground in advance. With the manifest and avowed design of securing a portion of the trade of the rich agricultural States bordering on the lakes, the Parliament of Upper Canada have assumed the stock of the Welland canal, so that it has become a provincial work. It is said, upon good authority, that the Welland canal and locks are to be enlarged, so as to admit the passage of vessels of the largest capacity that navigate the lakes. The British Government is making extraordinary exertions to open a navigation for ships around the rapids of the St. Lawrence, and the work is now in progress. This important work, which is to be constructed upon a magnificent scale, it is expected, will be finished in two or three years, when an uninterrupted communication will exist between the ocean and the Western lakes for ships and steamboats of three hundred tons burden. It requires no gift of prophecy to foretell, what I do not hesitate to declare as my firm belief, that many gentlemen present will have the gratification to see British vessels discharging their cargoes at Oswego, Sodus Bay, Toledo, Detroit, and Chicago, which were freighted with merchandise at the docks of London or Liverpool.

It is stated in the journals of the day that the Parliament of Upper Canada have appropriated eight hundred thousand dollars for the construction of a railroad from Niagara to Detroit, which will form a connecting link in the chain of railroads chartered, or finished and in operation, from the city of Boston, through Massachusetts, New York, Upper Canada, and Michigan, to Lake Michigan, and extending westwardly from Chicago to Galeana. A canal is also projected to connect Lake Ontario with Lake Huron, by a short and feasible route through Lake Simcoe. Such are the vast and magnificent plans of internal improvement adopted by the only Power on earth which can, from its local position, become a competitor of our maritime cities for the immense trade of the fertile and productive regions bordering on the lakes. It touches our national character not to be outdone by our powerful competitor in this noble field of commercial rivalry. Let not the golden prize be seized and borne away by another, in consequence of a spiritless and parsimonious policy on the part of the Congress of the United States.

It must be apparent to the most casual observer that Great Britain intends to avail herself for the present, and secure for the future, the advantages of her position in regard to the trade of the Canadas and the adjacent States. With this view, the British Government is strengthening and completing its system of fortifications in the Canadas, which will answer the double purpose of maintaining the supremacy of the Crown, by overawing the disaffected and disloyal among his Majesty's subjects in the provinces, and of efficient defence against the arms of the United States in the event of war.

It is a maxim in political economy, that a redundant population tends to weaken the State. The emigration of the inhabitants of the old States of the confederacy to the States and Territories stretching along and beyond the chain of Western lakes will long preserve that medium density of population so congenial to a happy and prosperous condition of society. It was a saying of the Emperor Adrian, "He had rather see the empire full of people than riches." Let the surplus population of the Eastern and Middle States pour forth into the valley of the Ohio and the Mississippi, the prairies of Michigan and Illinois, and the mineral region of Wisconsin, where the labor of the agriculturist must reap a rich reward, and well-directed enterprise cannot fail to prosper. In reference, therefore to the general welfare of the Union, no impediment should be thrown in the way of public improvements which have a tendency to encourage emigration, and keep down the increase of population within the old States to proper limits.

In the further improvement of harbors on the lakes, it is desirable that a system should be pursued having due regard to the commercial facilities which will be most needed by the country as it advances in wealth and population. With these important objects in view, Lakes Huron and Michigan ought to be surveyed by engineers, who should be required to report all the statistical and topographical information they might be able to collect to Congress, accompanied with a general plan for the improvement of such harbors as will best serve to diminish the dangers of navigation and meet the demands of increasing trade. This would bring the prominent points into view, and throw open to the public the natural avenues for internal commerce. It would, moreover, shut the door against those applications to Congress for appropriations which originate in a spirit of speculation, with interested individuals, who seek private gains at the expense of the public. It seems to be generally admitted that those points on the lakes where the business of the country naturally centres, at the mouths of navigable streams, at the terminations of canals and railroads, do require accessible, convenient, and safe harbors; wherever such do not exist, it is believed to be the duty of Congress to provide the means for their construction.

Compare the expenditures of the General Government for objects of admitted national utility, in the new States, with the munificent appropriations for our maritime cities; for the improvement and defence of the seaboard, and the protection of our foreign commerce, wherever a sail whitens the ocean. Look at your marble palaces for custom-houses, rivalling in architectural beauty and grandeur the splendid edifices of Greece and Rome; look at your granite dry docks at Boston and Norfolk; look at the impregnable defences of your seaports; look at your line of battle ships under cover in your navy yards, all constructed at the expense of the Treasury of the United States; look at your Delaware breakwater, which has already cost the Government over fifteen hundred thousand dollars, and is only half completed—then turn your eyes to the Western lakes, and behold the unprotected condition of your internal commerce; witness the annual sacrifice of the lives of American citizens in navigating those dangerous seas; the vast destruction of property in gales and storms, owing almost entirely to the want of accessible and safe harbors for shipping. Who can fail to perceive, at a glance, the great inequality which prevails in the distribution of the favors of the Government, the marked injustice of Congress towards the neglected public interests of the West? This unequal state of things should no longer exist—a speedy remedy ought to be provided. The people of the West have the right to demand that equal and exact justice should be done alike to all portions of the Union presenting substantial claims for the consideration of Congress. They desire nothing more. In the present condition of our finances, with a Treasury overflowing, all the various branches of the public service may be abundantly provided for, and the leading interests of the country protected, which fall within the constitutional powers of Congress, without imposing the slightest additional burden upon the people.

Mr. C. said he could not conclude without expressing his acknowledgments to the Committee of Ways and Means, for raising the appropriation for the improvement of Big Sodus bay, at his own request, from five thousand dollars, as contained in the original bill, to twelve thousand. The necessity of the increase was the more urgent, as an incorporated company was now engaged in the construction of a canal, of large dimensions, to connect Sodus bay with the Erie canal and Cayuga lake. When the bar at the entrance of this harbor, between the piers, shall be removed to a sufficient depth, it will become one of the best harbors for shipping on Lake Ontario. The harbor is spacious; the water within the bar is of sufficient depth for a ship of the line; the anchorage is good; it possesses, moreover, the important advantage of being a convenient refuge for vessels in severe gales.

After some remarks from Messrs. E. WHITTLESEY, MERCER, SMITH, SUTHERLAND, and G. LEE,

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARD moved to amend the bill by striking out “$50,000” in the appropriation for the continuation of the improvement of the harbor at the mouth of Oak Orchard creek, New York, and inserting $10,000.

After some remarks from Mr. HARD, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PARKER moved to amend the bill by inserting an appropriation of $6,963, in addition to former appropriations, for the improvement of the harbor of New Brunswick, New Jersey.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. McKAY moved to amend the bill by increasing the appropriation for the removal of obstructions at Ocracoke inlet, North Carolina, from $12,050 to $13,085.

After some remarks from Messrs. McKAY and SMITH,

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WHITE offered an amendment providing for the establishment of a port of entry at the mouth of Laurel river, and an appropriation of $45,000 for the improvement of the Cumberland river, between the mouth of Laurel river and the city of Nashville, to be expended according to the report made by Colonel Abert, of the engineer corps, of a survey executed in the year 1835.

Mr. W. said, with all due respect to the admonition of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WHITTLESEY,] and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. LEE,] warning the committee of the impropriety and great danger of allowing any amendment whatever to this bill, he felt it his duty to offer the amendment under consideration. And he must be permitted to say that he could not but admire the extreme modesty and generous liberality of the earnest appeals of those two gentlemen, when he reflected upon the various items contained in this bill. The committee will discover, by an examination of the different appropriations proposed in this bill, that, although there are twenty-six States in this Union, each entitled to a fair and just proportion of the public expenditures of this Government, two thirds of the amount appropriated by this bill is to be expended in the States of Ohio and New York; and out of the remaining third, Tennessee and Kentucky are to receive the pitiful sum of ten thousand dollars. And yet, notwithstanding this manifest inequality and injustice, the representatives from those two States are modestly asked to sit still, and fold their arms, and quietly look on and see themselves robbed, without raising a voice in defence of their just claim for a small pittance out of your overflowing Treasury, or daring to express their indignation at your flagrant injustice. Sir, this siren song of submission and forbearance towards this bill, as it now exists, test you may jeopard its final passage, may lull others to sleep, whilst you carry on your insatiable plunder upon the national Treasury, in which my constituents hold a common stock. But, (said Mr. W.,) if I cannot reach your sense of justice and equity, I intend fearlessly to expose your injustice. It is objected by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WHITTLESEY,] that this amendment ought not to be adopted, because the appropriation has not been reported by a standing committee. My reply to this objection is this: unfortunately for the States of Tennessee and Kentucky, either from a want of intellect in their members, or from a want of sagacity in the presiding officer of this House to discover it, or from some other cause, not politic, just at this time, for me to speculate upon, it so happens, out of the eighteen members who compose the standing Committees of Commerce and Ways and Means, whose duty it is to examine and report upon propositions of this kind, not one of them is from the State of Kentucky, and but one from the State of Tennessee, and he constitutionally opposed to all appropriations by the National Government for internal improvements. I do not mention this as a complaint of personal neglect. Being one of the youngest members upon this floor, in years as well as political life, I did not expect or desire to be placed upon one of those important committees. Yet I do consider that great neglect has been done towards those two States, in not placing some one of their older members upon one of these committees, through whose hands three fourths of the business of this House has to pass. Mr. W. would ask this committee to consider that it is not from any want of intrinsic merit in the measure proposed by this amendment that it does not come recommended by a standing committee, but from a want of deliberate investigation and just consideration of those committees to whom this subject was referred the session before the last, and likewise this, by express resolution.

Sir, if this committee will take the trouble to cast their eyes over a list of the members composing those two committees, they will perceive that sixteen out of the eighteen are selected from the Atlantic States, and but two west of the Alleghanies: one from Ohio, [Mr. Conwin,] and one from Louisiana, [Mr. Johnson,] both of which States are amply provided for in this bill. Sir, it is an old and true saying, that "charity begins at home;" and with their two committees, in the manufacture of this bill, it has remained at home. If it has passed without the limits of the various States in which the different members of the committees reside at all, its visits are like angels', few and far between. Whilst every stream of any importance emptying into the Atlantic, and every creek and branch running from the States of Ohio and New York into the Northern lakes, is to be ornamented with a splendid and magnificent harbor, large and valuable streams in the interior States are wholly forgotten and neglected.

Mr. W. said that this amendment was not offered by him as a mere matter of form, to make a display of his name upon the journal, expecting it to be voted down as a matter of course. No, sir; it is offered as a matter of substance and of just merit; and if he should succeed (as he felt confident he should, if he could retain the attention of the committee) in convincing this committee that this proposition would bear a rigid scrutiny, and a triumphant comparison, tested by merit, with any object contained among the almost innumerable items of this bill, he expected it to receive the favorable action of this committee, although it did not come before you recommended by the standing Committee of Commerce or Ways and Means. If he should fail in maintaining its intrinsic merit in comparison with other objects, he should feel it his duty to acquiesce in a vote of rejection.

Mr. W. said that, as the committee had not, during this session, had the benefit of a report from any standing committee upon this subject, and as there seems to be a lamentable ignorance in relation to the size and importance of this stream, he would briefly state, for the information of the committee, that, in the year 1835, there was a survey made of this river by one of the United States engineers, under a resolution passed by this House, the report of which survey, made by Colonel Abert, of the engineer corps, he now had before him—a report drawn with great labor, highly creditable to the intellect of its author; minutely describing the length and size of the river—its advantages for navigation—its obstructions—the character of soil in the counties contiguous to its banks—the various minerals as well as agricultural products. He said he would not weary the committee by reading the report; but if any gentleman doubts the importance of this river, and desires information, he will discover, by an examination of this report, made by one of the first officers in the service of the Government, that the Cumberland river, from its source to its mouth, is five hundred miles in length, (longer than any river within the limits of the United States that empties into the Atlantic east of the Alleghany mountains,) running through bodies of land for the distance of three hundred miles that will bear a successful comparison for fertility and variety of products with any part of the globe—abounding in minerals of almost every description—coal banks inexhaustible immediately upon its margin—salt, manufactured to the amount of a half million of bushels annually at the various works, the most distant not exceeding thirty miles from the river, which quantity could be greatly increased if an additional market were opened by the improvement proposed; a stream admirably adapted by nature for navigation, with but few natural obstructions. The sum asked to be appropriated by this amendment is estimated by the engineer who executed the survey as being sufficient to remove the obstructions between the mouth of Laurel and Nashville, a distance of near two hundred miles. This reports recommends in the strongest terms the great advantages to be derived from the improvement of the navigation of this stream, at so little cost to the Government.

This subject, together with this report, has been referred to some standing committee of this House each successive session since the execution of this survey, and has uniformly received the favorable action of some committee of this House each session preceding the present; but, from press of business or some other cause, the passage of the appropriation for this object has always failed. Before the survey alluded to was made, during the session of 1833-'4, a bill passed appropriating thirty thousand dollars to the improvement of the Cumberland river in Kentucky and Tennessee; but, unfortunately for the people who reside in Tennessee and Kentucky above Nashville, the expenditure of that appropriation was confined exclusively to that portion of the river lying below Nashville. By a rigid and most singular construction of the constitution, so much of that appropriation as was intended by Congress to benefit his constituents, as well as the entire population occupying the country above Nashville, fell a victim to the executive veto, based upon a newly discovered idea that no appropriation by the General Government could be constitutionally applied above a port of entry. He said he wished it distinctly understood by the committee he did not read the constitution in this way; he wished no such inference drawn from his having associated the erection of a port of entry with the appropriation asked in his amendment. He did not believe that any act passed by Congress could either enlarge or diminish, add to or take from the constitution; but the Chief Magistrate, whose sanction has to be given to this bill before it becomes a law, does; and in order to obviate his objection, and secure the signature of the President to this bill, he had inserted a clause in the amendment providing for the establishment of a port of entry at the mouth of Laurel river, the highest point upon the Cumberland river proposed to be improved. This is his apology to the committee for presenting this singular anomaly, this strange association of the creation of a port of entry with an appropriation for the improvement of a river. Notwithstanding the two subjects are somewhat incongruous, yet the necessity of the case demands that the incongruity should be overlooked. For his own part, he did not intend to stickle about a nice point of order in voting for this amendment, nor should the committee, under the peculiar circumstances of this case. His constituents are by no means a fastidious people; they want this appropriation, they greatly need it, their prosperity much depends upon it; if they cannot get it in the ordinary way, they are willing to resort to the extraordinary; if they are without the limits of the constitution, and cannot gain admittance through any other channel than a port of entry, they are willing to enter in at that door. They regretted, to be sure, to learn that while the constitution was construed so as to embrace within its arms States all around, and even a portion of their own State, they should have been declared without its pale. They rejoice, however, there is a way opened for them to come in; and, although it seems to them a crooked way, they are disposed to avail themselves of the offering. Being convinced that every member of this committee was satisfied of the importance of this river, and the justice of this appropriation, he hoped that neither a strict construction of a point of order, nor the objection growing out of a want of recommendation from the standing committees, will close this only remaining avenue left his constituents to get back again under the protecting arm of the constitution.

He said he was frank to acknowledge that, in making up his mind upon any proposition brought before this House, a favorable recommendation from a standing committee had a considerable influence in forming his judgment. Yet he was not willing to yield a passive obedience to the report of a standing committee, and vote for or against a measure in accordance with their recommendations. He cared not how he acquired the facts; if he considered the measure right, and deserving, by its merit, his favorable consideration, he gave it his vote, even if it should not be endorsed by a standing committee.

It will be recollected by this committee that he had, in more than one instance in the last two days, pursued this course. Upon the proposition to appropriate twenty thousand dollars to the repair of a fortification at the mouth of the Connecticut river, although offered as an amendment, without the recommendation of a standing committee, he gave this amendment his sanction, because he deemed it needful. At the same time, he was not partial to a general system of fortifications as a means of defence. He did not regard them as the most important branch of the great system of national defence. A few were absolutely necessary for the protection of large cities, situated upon the coast; to secure the entrance of large harbors; to guard the mouths of large rivers. But in a country like this, after all, the main reliance for defence is upon the patriotism and valor of the citizens, and the facilities afforded by good roads, canals, and navigable rivers, for the rapid concentration of men and supplies to any and every point of our extensive frontier. In time of peace, fortifications were expensive, requiring a standing army to keep them in repair, and preserve them from ruin. Not so with navigable rivers, canals, and roads. They were alike useful in peace and war; affording important facilities and benefits to agriculture, manufactures, and commerce.

He wished the chairman of the Committee on Commerce [Mr. SUTHERLAND] to bear in mind that he voted against the proposition to strike out of the navy bill the appropriation of four hundred thousand dollars, necessary to complete and launch the magnificent ship of the line Pennsylvania. He called the recollection of the gentlemen from the North to the fact of his having voted, only a few days since, for four hundred thousand dollars to build four sloops of war, although offered by way of amendment, and not recommended by the Committee on Naval Affairs. He would say a few words in relation to the claims of Tennessee and Kentucky upon the justice of the General Government, and the neglect with which they had been treated, and he was done. It will be remembered that Tennessee and Kentucky, the two States interested in this amendment, pay annually a large amount in taxes upon consumption into your Treasury; that they are altogether consuming States, and import nothing; that they have not a ship afloat upon the ocean, and derive not one cent of direct benefit from all your foreign commerce, for the protection of which you spend millions annually; and although there may be seventeen millions of revenue collected yearly in the city of New York, as has been boasting displayed before this committee by the member from that city, [Mr. LEE,] and zealously urged as an argument why New York was justly entitled to more than an ordinary share of the disbursements of the public money, yet the merest sciolist in political economy knows that these duties are always paid (and that too with heavy interest) by the consumers. Sir, Kentucky and Tennessee have been members of this confederacy near a half century; during which time how many millions have they contributed to your Treasury, and how many hundreds have they received back again? How many cents have returned to Kentucky? Not one cent. Tennessee, I believe, has received forty-five thousand dollars since she was acknowledged as a State. It will not be contended that there are any two States in this Union more loyal, more devoted to the true principles of this republic. None are more prompt to vindicate and contend for the rights and honor of this nation. None are more ready to take up the line of march to meet foreign aggression, no matter upon what border of this widely extended country it may approach. This Government has never yet drawn a bill upon their patriotism that has not been promptly discounted, nor upon their valor that has not been most nobly redeemed.

He would not detain the committee by reciting the many splendid victories achieved by their daring courage during the late war; their noble deeds are matters of history; their fame is above the reach of eulogy or detraction. No, sir. He said, he repeated, neglect, injury itself, could not alienate the affections of the people of these two States from this Union. They have long and patiently borne both. Under all political changes their attachment has remained unimpaired. You may check and embarrass their progress in wealth, as you have done; you may impoverish them by your mistaken policy, or, to speak in plain and honest language, by your unpardonable neglect and wilful injustice; yet you cannot weaken their attachment to this Government; they will continue to cling to the Union, "as their best, their greatest, and last hope." Yet he demanded of the candor of this committee if they ought not, whilst they were scattering millions upon millions of the surplus treasure upon the seaboard and upon the lakes, to return upon meritorious and useful objects of appropriation a small division of the perpetual drain from those two States into the National Treasury. He said it was not his habit to indulge in complaints, but he must repeat he felt that these States, and especially Kentucky, had been treated by this Government with cold neglect, with crying injustice. He said he did not stand here asking charity at the bar of this House; he scorned the character of a beggar; he was no mendicant for bounty, no petitioner for alms; his constituents would spurn him from their presence, when he returned home, if he would dare fill such a character upon this floor. He stood here as one of the representatives of the people of this nation; and, in the name of his constituents, he asked for justice, nothing but sheer justice. He called upon gentlemen from the North and from the East to bear in mind that, during the last session, as likewise this, he had voted for the appropriation of millions for the increase of the navy, for the erection of fortifications, for the building of light-houses; and now the small pittance of forty-five thousand dollars is asked, as the only appropriation for all purposes to two States, and the murmuring sound of opposition is heard from the North—from the gentleman from New York, [Mr. LEE,] from the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. SMITH,] and from the West—from the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WHITTLESEY.] "Et tu Brute." Sir, he said, the gentleman from Ohio must permit him to say, last of all did he expect opposition from that quarter—the representative of a Western, adjoining State, whose lake borders are now whitened by the bones of Kentuckians who perished gallantly defending the wives and children of the gentleman's constituents from the savage cruelty of the Indian. He had occupied the attention of the committee much longer than he intended when he rose. He knew the great mass of unfinished business on hand, and but a very few days remained to dispose of it; but, before he took his seat, he would say, by way of assurance to those who felt a deep interest in the success of this bill, and as a guarantee of his sincerity of purpose in offering this amendment, and that he was actuated by no sinister design, that, whether his amendment was sustained or not by the committee, he would still vote for the bill. He wished it understood that the justice and liberality of a Kentuckian were not confined to the narrow limits of a congressional district, not circumscribed by the boundary of a State, but commensurate with the just wants of every part of this wide-spread Union.

After some remarks from Messrs. E. WHITTLESEY, WILLIAMS of Kentucky, MERCER, SMITH, and CHAMBERS of Kentucky,

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to: Yeas 67, nays 59.

Mr. CARTER moved an amendment appropriating $50,000 for the continuation of the Muscle Shoals improvement, in the State of Alabama, and constituting Kingsport a port of entry.

After some remarks from Messrs. CARTER, CAMBRELENG, and BELL,

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CASEY offered an amendment appropriating $25,000 to the improvement of the Illinois and Great Wabash rivers, severally; and to establish a port of entry at some point thereon.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. YELL moved to amend the bill by adding after the 119th line an appropriation of $25,000 for the removal of obstructions in the Arkansas river, between Little Rock and Fort Smith.

After some remarks from Mr. YELL, the question was taken on the above amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. YELL moved to amend the bill by adding an appropriation of $30,000 for the removal of obstructions in the White and Black rivers; and an appropriation of $10,000 for a similar purpose for the river St. Francis; which amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAWSON moved to amend the bill by adding an additional section, appropriating $25,000 for buoys, beacons, &c., at the harbor of Brunswick, Georgia; making a separate collection district there, and constituting the said harbor a port of entry.

After some remarks from Messrs. DAWSON, SUTHERLAND, PINCKNEY, A. MANN, and D. J. PEARCE,

Mr. DAWSON withdrew his amendment, intending to renew it when the light-house bill should be taken up.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, moved to amend the bill by inserting an appropriation of $210,000, in addition to former appropriations, for continuing the work of removing the obstructions to the navigation of the Mississippi river at its mouth.

Mr. J. explained the reasons why an appropriation for this object had not been embraced in the bill. At the last session of Congress, the sum of $150,000 was appropriated in this bill for the removal of these obstructions, to be expended by the Secretary of War, under the direction of the President of the United States, after new surveys had been made. The Senate reduced the amount to $75,000. The matter had been neglected for some time, in consequence, he supposed, of the departure of Secretary Cass. Mr. J. then proceeded to state that these surveys had since been made, that they were presented to the House on Saturday, and were now in the hands of the public printer. The Committee of Ways and Means have not had it in their power to assemble together for the purpose of recommending the appropriation; but he was justified in saying, from the cursory view they had had of the documents, that it met their approbation. The amount stated in the amendment was that which had been recommended by Captain Chase, and the other engineers who had been associated with him in making the surveys. Mr. J. alluded to the great importance of the removal of these obstructions to the commercial world. The obstructions were becoming daily more great, and ships were subjected to much detention and difficulty, and the owners of them, consequently, to much loss.

After some remarks from Messrs. D. J. PEARCE, GARLAND of Louisiana, SMITH, REED, and LAWRENCE,

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HANNEGAN offered an amendment appropriating $50,000 for the improvement of the navigation of the Great Wabash, and constituting a port of entry at some point thereon.

After some remarks from Messrs. HANNEGAN and MERCER, the question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRAYSON moved an amendment appropriating $10,000 for the survey of certain rivers between Charleston and Savannah.

After some remarks from Messrs. GRAYSON, OWENS, SUTHERLAND, and PINCKNEY, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, offered an amendment extending the objects of the appropriation of $10,000, contained in the bill for removing the wreck in the harbor of New Bedford, Massachusetts. Agreed to.

Mr. DENNY offered an amendment appropriating $3,000 for placing buoys in the Ohio river, between Pittsburgh and Louisville. Rejected.

Mr. HARRISON, of Missouri, offered an amendment appropriating $2,000 for the continuation of the survey of the St. Francis and Black and White rivers, in Arkansas and Missouri, &c.

Mr. YELL said, at this stage of the proceedings of the committee, he should not attempt to argue the constitutionality of the improvements he proposed in his amendments. The one for the Arkansas river above Little Rock, to the State line, was a subject of great importance, not only to the State he had the honor to represent, but to the nation. The General Government had, by her treaties, sent to the west of Arkansas some 75,000 or 100,000 Indians, who, by this contract, are bound to supply them for five years with every article of bread-stuffs, besides every agricultural implement, &c. This river was the only means by which the treaty compact is to be complied with; and in the present state of the river above the seat of Government (Little Rock) it cannot, with any certainty, be done.

It is due to the State, the Indians, the garrisons on our frontier, as well as to the Government, to make the appropriation asked for in the amendment; therefore, the Government has made a small appropriation for the removal of obstructions in the river Arkansas below Little Rock, which has rendered the navigation to the seat of Government safer, and most of the season certain. Mr. Y. hoped that the amendment would not be rejected because it was not reported by a standing committee; it was sufficient for him that the Legislature of his State had forwarded to this Congress a memorial for the very purposes indicated in the amendment. This memorial is now in another branch of this Congress, which might account for its not being favored with a recommendation from the Committee of Ways and Means.

Harbor Bill.

Mr. Y. said the appropriation for the improvement of the White, Black, and St. Francis rivers was of vast importance to the northern and eastern portions of the State. He regretted extremely the disposition of the committee to reject every amendment that was not reported by a standing committee; for himself, he believed his constituents knew as much or more of the importance of this appropriation than any standing committee, and they had demanded it.

Mr. Y. concluded by saying, this being a water measure, he had but little hope of its passage; it was not upon the seaboard nor upon the lakes, and somehow or other it found no favor with that interest in this House.

After some remarks from Mr. HARRISON, The amendment was rejected.

Mr. REED offered an amendment appropriating $5,000 for the improvement of the harbor of Provincetown, Massachusetts.

After some remarks from Messrs. REED, SMITH, and CRAIG,

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MILLIGAN moved to amend the bill by increasing the amount for the harbor at Wilmington, Delaware, from $8,000 to $15,000. Rejected.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to amend the bill by increasing the amount appropriated for repairs of the harbor of Chester, Pennsylvania, from $500 to $2,000. After some remarks from Mr. INGERSOLL, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN moved an amendment appropriating $100,000 for the improvement of the Tennessee river at the Muscle and Colbert shoals, in the State of Alabama. After some remarks from Messrs. MARTIN and CHAPMAN, the question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GHOLSON offered an amendment appropriating $100,000 for removing the obstructions at the mouth of the Tombigbee river, and constituting the town of Van Buren a port of entry; also, an appropriation of $20,000 for similar purposes for the Yallahusha river; and a third appropriation of $20,000 for another similar object.

After some remarks from Mr. GHOLSON, the question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WISE offered an amendment appropriating $1,000 for the placing of buoys at certain points on the Eastern Shore of Virginia.

After some remarks from Messrs. WISE, SMITH, CRARY, E. WHITTLESEY, SUTHERLAND, BELL, and HARPER, the amendment was negatived.

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved to amend the bill by striking out the following item:

"For opening a passage of fifty yards wide and seven feet deep, at low water, between the town of Beaufort and Pamlico Sound, North Carolina, and for improving New river, in addition to two sums of five thousand dollars each, appropriated at the last session of Congress for the harbor at Beaufort and for New river, twenty thousand dollars."

Mr. UNDERWOOD made some remarks in support of his motion, and had not concluded when, the hour of three having arrived,

The House took a recess.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half past four o'clock, when Mr. UNDERWOOD concluded his remarks on the amendment under discussion at the time the House took a recess, which was to strike out the following item:

"For opening a passage fifty feet wide and seven feet deep, at low water, between the town of Beaufort and Pamlico Sound, North Carolina, and for improving New river, in addition to two sums of $5,000 each, appropriated at the last session of Congress, for the harbor at Beaufort and for New river, $20,000."

Mr. McKAY and Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina spoke in opposition to the amendment, and in justification of the propriety of the appropriation.

Mr. HARPER moved to amend the bill by striking out the following item:

"For continuing the improvement of the harbor of Baltimore, Maryland, fifteen thousand dollars."

Mr. H. briefly supported his amendment, and adverted to the fact that the citizens of Philadelphia bore themselves the expense of clearing out their harbor, and was at a loss, he said, to see why Baltimore should be so much more favored.

Mr. SUTHERLAND and Mr. SMITH briefly replied to Mr. HARPER.

Mr. HOWARD said, that if the gentleman from Pennsylvania had allowed himself to reflect for a few moments, he must have perceived that he was the last man in the House who ought to have made this motion. Between the cities which they respectively represented there had long been, and still was, an active commercial competition, but conducted upon liberal and fair principles. The people of Baltimore had resorted to every expedient to extend the advantages flowing from their geographical position, and had kept their harbor open this winter by means of an ice boat, an invention of their own; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania would find that his people were so deeply impressed with the necessity of counteracting this step, that they were about to do the same thing. This motion would, if successful, very much cripple the commerce of Baltimore; and would be said, by those less charitable than he (Mr. H.) was, to proceed from a narrow jealousy, which he was sure neither the gentleman nor his constituents felt. But unkind persons would so construe it, and he begged leave to state that, upon this subject, the colleague of the gentleman [Mr. SUTHERLAND] had introduced this bill at the last session, and ought to be considered a more appropriate representative of the feelings of Philadelphia than the author of the pending motion.

If the gentleman would exchange his magnificent river and flowing tides, which swept so nobly along in front of his wharves, for the land-locked harbor of Baltimore, he might be welcome to this appropriation. But the peculiar position of Baltimore had attracted the attention of Congress sooner than any other harbor in the United States; for, in 1791, an act of Congress was passed assenting to the imposition of a small tax upon tonnage, for the express purpose of keeping the harbor clear; but its product was so inconsiderable that the State had permitted the city to apply a valuable fund in aid of it, amounting to twenty, twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars a year. This fund had been temporarily withdrawn, under circumstances which had no sort of connexion with the question before the House. It was sufficient to know that it was withdrawn; and whilst harbors, great and small, were receiving the care of Government, it was not to be supposed that a port of such nature as Baltimore could be overlooked. There were many other considerations connected with the subject, but the time of the House ought to be now counted by minutes, and he would therefore consume no more of it.

Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill.

[H. OF R.]

The motion was then rejected, without a division.

Mr. LYON moved to strike out "twenty thousand," and insert "fifty thousand," so as to increase the appropriation for improving the navigation of the Mobile bay, by deepening the channel across Dog river bar and Manlaw pass.

Mr. L. said he did not intend to consume the time of the House by a speech at the present stage of the session, but he begged to make a brief statement of facts in support of the motion he had submitted. He requested that the Clerk might read a memorial from the Chamber of Commerce of Mobile, asking an appropriation for the improvement of the Mobile bay; which was done.

It would be seen, continued Mr. L., from the document just read, that the value of the exports of cotton alone, from Mobile, was estimated for the present year at twenty millions of dollars, and the number of vessels that discharge and receive cargoes at not less than five hundred. All vessels drawing over ten feet of water were obliged to remain below Dog river bar, at anchor, in the bay, a distance of fifteen or twenty miles from the city of Mobile, and had to discharge their cargoes and receive their return freights with the aid of lighters. The obstruction to the navigation interposed by Dog river bar subjected persons engaged in commercial pursuits and in the navigation of the bay to much inconvenience, delay, and expense. A very intelligent officer of the engineer corps, Captain Chase, had, in his report, estimated the cost of deepening the channel across the bar, so as to admit vessels drawing twelve feet of water, at one hundred and fifty thousand dollars; and had expressed the opinion that the improvement, when completed, would be permanent. Mr. L. begged that the report from the engineer department might be read by the Clerk. He said he feared the small sum of twenty thousand dollars, proposed in the bill, would not be sufficient to make all the necessary preparations for the commencement of the work, and leave on hand a sum sufficient to enable much progress to be made in deepening the channel across the bar. The improvement contemplated was one of much consequence to the people of Alabama, and parts of Mississippi and Georgia; and he hoped he was not asking too much in proposing to appropriate, at the present time, one third of the estimated cost of the work. With an appropriation of fifty thousand dollars, every necessary preparation could be at once made, and the work commenced with a prospect of its early completion. It had heretofore been commenced, but the amount appropriated had been so small that little or no progress, he believed, had been made. It was, no doubt, (said Mr. L.,) the intention of Congress to complete an improvement already commenced, and known to be essentially important; and he hoped his proposition to increase the appropriation might prevail.

Mr. GHOLSON and Mr. SUTHERLAND made a few remarks in support of the amendment, when it was agreed to: Yeas 64, nays 61.

Mr. GRAVES then moved the following amendment, which he supported by a statement of the great importance of this work to the commerce of the whole Western States, twelve of which were directly interested:

"And be it further enacted, That all the tolls that have been, and shall hereafter be, received by the Government upon the stock which it now owns, or may hereafter acquire, in the Louisville and Portland canal, be appropriated by the Secretary of the Treasury to the purchasing up the individual stock in said canal, on such terms as he may think best; and that when all the stock in the said canal shall be thus acquired by the Government of the United States, and the amount hereby appropriated shall be refunded to the Government, that tolls thereon shall be so reduced as barely to defray the expenses of superintending, repairing, and enlarging, of said canal, so as to answer the purposes of the commerce of the river Ohio.

"And be it further enacted, That $225,000 be, and are hereby, appropriated for purchasing up the individual stock of the Louisville and Portland canal; and that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to purchase up so much of said individual stock as he can procure for the sum hereby appropriated: Provided, however, That he shall not pay a greater price than fifteen per cent. advance upon the par value of said stock."

After some remarks by Messrs. GRAVES, CAMBRELENG, PEARCE of Rhode Island, and FRENCH,

Mr. STORER moved a proviso that a survey should be first made, to ascertain whether the canal was substantially built, and capable of passing all the steamboats which navigate the Western waters; which was disagreed to; and then

The amendment of Mr. GRAVES was disagreed to: Yeas 49, nays 84.

Mr. CASEY moved an amendment for a survey and estimate for the removal of obstructions in the Illinois and Kaskaskia rivers, $5,000. Lost.

Mr. CRANE moved an amendment for the improvement of the Miami of Lake Erie, $20,000. Lost.

Mr. CLAIBORNE, of Mississippi, moved the following:

"For a continuation of the survey of the Mississippi seacoast, from the Rigolets to Mobile Point, including the mouths of Pearl and Pascagoula rivers, $3,000."

Mr. C. said that he would not detain the committee at this late hour, when the time of the House was as valuable as it was limited. A survey of this interesting seacoast had already been ordered upon his motion, and he now moved an additional appropriation in the event of the former proving inadequate. His sole object, in brief, was to direct public attention to that part of the State of Mississippi, a section heretofore unknown and little appreciated, but which in every point of view deserved the attention of Government. He had on a former occasion, when the House had ordered a reconnaissance of the coast, expressed his views at length; and he would now merely express a hope that the report of the officer detailed for the service would at the next session of Congress be followed up by liberal appropriations to improve the fine harbors between the Rigolets and Mobile point.

The bill was then laid aside, to be reported to the House.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved that the committee take up the civil and diplomatic bill, including the appropriation to pay the members themselves.

Mr. MERCER moved to take up the Cumberland road bill.

The former motion, taking precedence, was put, and agreed to: Yeas 89, nays 59.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee then proceeded to the consideration of this bill.

The bill, together with the several amendments reported thereto by the Committee of Ways and Means, having been read—

Mr. W. THOMPSON moved to amend the bill by inserting;

"For the salary and outfit of a diplomatic agent, to be forthwith sent to the independent Government of Texas, — thousand dollars.

"For the expenses of running a boundary line between the United States and the independent Government of Texas, — thousand dollars; such line to be run by commissioners to be appointed by the United States and the republic of Texas."

Mr. T. said no one could regret more than he did the very limited time that is allowed for this discussion. I, sir, (said Mr. T.), am in no way responsible for it. My fault has certainly not been a want of zeal in pressing the subject upon Congress. The course of things for the last few weeks has been eminently illustrative and characteristic. The whole time of the House has been occupied with matters of purely a personal or local character—in a miserable scramble for spoils, in which all parties have equally participated, to the exclusion of every thing of general importance. The question now before the House involves, in some sort, the destinies of a young republic just rising into existence, and our own character for justice, consistency, and a fearless discharge of our duties. It is peculiarly fitting that we should introduce this young sister into the great family of nations. Why has it been so long postponed? Are gentlemen afraid of the argument? Are they afraid that a spontaneous burst of popular enthusiasm will force them to do that to which the cold, selfish, and sectional feelings of politicians are opposed?

I hope (said Mr. T.) to show, beyond the power of refutation, that it is our right and duty to recognise Texas, upon every principle of national law, as laid down by every publicist of reputation, as well as upon the established practice of our own and all other Governments. Martens, a writer of the very highest authority, lays it down that "a foreign nation does not appear to violate its perfect obligations; nor to deviate from the principles of its neutrality, if, in adverting to the possession of power, without examining into its legality, it recognises," &c.

Vattel says: "In this particular foreign Powers take for their rule the circumstance of the actual possession of power, if the interest of their affairs so require; and, indeed, there cannot be a more certain rule, or one which is more agreeable to the law of nations or the interdependency of States. As foreigners have no right to interfere in the domestic concerns of a nation, they are not obliged to canvass and scrutinize her conduct in the management of them, in order to determine how far it is either just or unjust. They may suppose the right to be annexed to the possession."

"When a nation has expelled her sovereign, other nations consider her thenceforward as a free and sovereign State."

"If foreign Powers have received the ministers of a usurper, and sent theirs to him, the lawful Prince, on recovering the throne, cannot complain of these measures as an injury." I will not fatigue the committee with other authorities from writers on public law; I will only add the weight of one distinguished name of our own country. Mr. Clay, in his speech on the recognition of the South American States, holds the following language:

"The rule we have followed has ever been this: to look at the state of the fact, and recognise that Government, be it what it might, which was in actual possession of sovereign powers. When one of these Governments was overthrown, without embarrassing ourselves with any of the principles involved in the contest, we have ever acknowledged the new and actual Government as soon as it had positive existence. If there is any principle settled for ages, any which is found in the very nature of things, it is that every sovereign Power has the right to judge of the existence of other sovereignties." It is, sir, founded in the very nature of things. What is recognition? The acknowledgment, the annunciation of a fact; nothing more. What the necessity of this rule? The intercourse of nations is regulated by contracts called treaties. With whom are these contracts to be made? With the Government having actual possession of power; for no other can enforce them. A stronger case for illustration cannot be stated than that which we are considering? We have an unsettled question of boundary; can Mexico send commissioners to meet ours in adjusting the line? Can Mexico guaranty that line when it is run? Is there, in short, one vestige of Mexican power left in Texas? Why, sir, Mexico has no Government any where. It has none of the attributes of a Government—it is the corpse of a Government—the outward seeming and form, but without the living principle. Look at the correspondence of our minister with the Mexican Government; what a long list of violations of the laws of nations, and outrages upon all the rights of American citizens; outrages, if she were a respectable Power, sufficient to justify war. She is not. She is too weak, too feeble, for a contest with us; and nothing that is like to occur would, in my judgment, justify it. Mexico is unable to restrain her people from violation of our rights; she is unable to compensate for the accumulated outrages which have been perpetrated. I am, nevertheless, not only opposed to war measures, but to menaces; although I well understand that these menaces are intended to aid in procuring a treaty for the cession of Texas. Anxious as I may be for such an event, vast and inappreciable as would be its advantages, yet, sir, the greatest earthly good is not to be sought by individuals, or nations, by dishonorable means.

If you restrict the inquiry as to recognition to the fact of the possession of power, the rule is safe and certain. If you put it upon the probability of maintaining that possession, you are thrown into a wilderness of doubt and uncertainty; you have no data which approach certainty. Upon what are such calculations to be made? Upon the superiority in money, men, and ships? How fallacious does all history show such data to be? Who can estimate that Antæan quality of liberty which rises from every fall "renewed with strength, and fresh with life?" Who can estimate the power of free institutions, the difference between an army of freemen, contending for their hearths and altars, and the trained bands of a despot? Who, looking at the matter a priori, would have predicted the successful termination of our own Revolution? Or that a little State like Holland, not much larger than that from which I came, and like it in other things than extent of territory, could, single-handed and alone, have contended against the power of England on the ocean, and of France, of the magnificent Louis, on land? Yet her institutions were free, and her people, therefore, patriots; and she did so struggle, and gave to the history of man some of its brightest pages and most illustrious names—the names of Van Tromp, De Ruyter, and De Witt.

I can well conceive a case where, with the strong probability, and almost or quite a certainty, of the insurgent Government being speedily overthrown, foreign nations would not only have the right, but would be forced by an irresistible necessity, to recognise such Government. Many of the countries of Europe are dependent upon those on the Baltic for bread. In the case of a successful rebellion, and the establishment, however temporarily, of another Government, are those countries, thus dependent, to wait for the restoration of the ancient order, and starve in the mean time? Take another case: Great Britain is, in my judgment, absolutely dependent for her very existence upon American cotton. It employs so much of her labor, and its manufacture constitutes so large a portion of her wealth and power, that to be deprived of it would be to strike at the very foundation of her social and commercial organization; and it is a consoling reflection to me that Old England is not the only country in the world that is thus dependent. In the event of a successful revolution here, is she to calculate the probabilities of the termination of the contest, and, in the mean time, to bid famine and desolation to stalk through the land? No, sir; she would recognise the Government in power, establish relations with it, and, when it was overthrown, would do the same with the new Government. What was the course of England to those who temporarily held power during and at the close of the French revolution—that revolution against which all her vast powers were roused and exerted—opposition to which has entailed upon her a debt which has made every eighth man in England a pauper? Did she look to the principles involved? No; she utterly and always reprobated them; but only to the fact of the possession of sovereign power. What was the course of our own Government, in the ever-changing phases of that awful conflict which deluged France in blood, and made of her beautiful city a modern Golgotha? Whenever the curtain rose on a new scene in that grand drama of blood and crime, and new actors appeared upon the stage with the truncheon of power, we did not hesitate to clasp their reeking hands, ay, sir, with the blood of the best son of Louis, our own good and great ally, who had taken us by the hand and led us through “the dark valley” of our Revolution, clotted under their finger nails! Even with the Directory, the infamous Directory, we were not only willing to establish relations, but sought them, sued for them.

What was the course of our Government with the insurgent States of South America? Spain had not abandoned the contest. There were at the very moment ten thousand Spanish troops in Venezuela alone, and Spain had possession of important posts in all the States, if States they might be called. Spain and Portugal were both arming and girding their loins for a last desperate conflict. There was every reason to believe that the allied sovereigns of Europe were about to interfere on the part of Spain; and it is now matter of history that at the Congress of Aix la Chapelle a proposition to that effect was made by Prussia, and only prevented by the resistance of England. In addition to which, South America was torn to pieces by intestine divisions; hostile chiefs were in the field, more opposed to each other than to Spain. Under these circumstances, we did not hesitate to recognise them. We did more: we forbade foreign interposition. Our Government was forced to these measures by the irrepressible enthusiasm of the people, who, in all matters involving the interest of human liberty, are always ahead of cold, selfish, calculating politicians. And why was it so? Was it really a contest for liberty? In name only; for the slightest reflection would have satisfied any one that they were incapable of maintaining it. It was not for liberty, but a change of masters; whether they should be the subjects of a civil despotism, as they were; or a military despotism, as they are. As to regulated liberty, they were unfit for it. They were intoxicated with its spirit, and reeled and tottered along, until they fell into the same slough from which they had emerged. They prostrated themselves before the harlot Licentiousness, and fondly imagined that they were worshipping the true goddess. The great cause of civil liberty was as little concerned as it would be in the question which particular buffalo should lead the vast herds which roam over our magnificent prairies. Yet, when they unfurled their banner, they inscribed upon it the sacred words, “Liberty and Republic,” and our hearts bounded to them. It was right, sir, as the spontaneous and unpurged feelings of our people always are right; we no longer deserve liberty than we can sympathize with those who are struggling for it; we are no longer capable of maintaining it, when we are afraid to express that sympathy. Compare the situation of South American States then with Texas now.

South America, without regular Governments, army, navy, or treasury; with the prospect of all Europe combining against the new States, and torn to pieces by domestic dissensions: Texas, with no motive for any foreign Power to interfere; a well-adjusted and well-administered Government, united as one man; an army, a band of heroes; a treasury in her lands almost inexhaustible, and one strictly so in the high minds and brave hearts of her gallant defenders, who ask no wages but victory, no guerdon but liberty.

Look at the very sensible report of the agent (Mr. Morfit) lately sent to Texas. This fighting between Americans and Mexicans is no new thing; it has been going on since 1812; and what has been the uniform result? That the Americans, with one fifth of the numbers of their adversaries, have always been victors—400 in an open fair field beating 4,000 of the best troops of Mexico. I will not unnecessarily go into the detail. It fully sustains the opinion of Mr. Morfit, that their relative power and efficiency is as one to five. Every military man knows that the superiority of good troops over bad is increased in an almost infinite ratio as you increase the numbers engaged. To say nothing of the advantages of the troops of the country invaded over those of the invaders, Mr. Morfit states the army of Texas to be 7,000 fighting men; does any man honestly think that Mexico can ever send men enough to Texas to reconquer it? No man does.

We recognised Mexico in 1822. She had no Government until 1824. Spain had possession of the fortress of St. Juan de Ulloa, one of the strongest in the world, and one which military men regard as the key to Mexico, and giving to those in possession of it absolute command of the country. Not only has Mexico no foothold in Texas, but the foot of a hostile Mexican does not pollute her free soil. Can Mexico complain that we do for Texas what we did for her? As to advancing the great cause of human liberty, how wide, how immeasurable, is the difference! The Texans have learned their lessons of liberty where alone they can be well learned, at the fireside. They take with them our liberty, language, and laws; and in my heart I believe the three are inseparable, and that the first cannot be enjoyed without the last. It has been the fashion, sir, to disparage and denounce the people of Texas. I regret that an illustrious man—a man than whom I reverence and respect none living more, for all his great and good qualities—has lent the weight of his great name to that which, if he had not done so, I should pronounce a gross calumny. Is it true that these people left a free Government for a despotism? They left the oppressed, the tribute-paying South, for a Government as free as any under the sun, amply and cautiously secured by charters. As to the population, I will only say that the delegation which Texas sent here a year ago could have desired a comparison with the representation of the majority of the States on this floor, only on the score of personal vanity. But, sir, look to their career, wise, glorious, and merciful, as it has been. Let any man point his finger to a fault that they have committed; where they have failed to do the right thing in the right place; where they have failed to conquer their enemies in the field, or to spare them when conquered. Is it to such a people that you will refuse sympathies which have been squandered upon the undeserving?

But, sir, there is a point in our history still more striking than those to which I have just alluded: the case of the rising of Greece against the power of the Ottoman—an insurrection begun by some bandit chiefs. The Greeks—always turbulent, factious, treacherous, and mercenary; their descendants possessing none of the qualities of their ancestors but their vices—chained down in slavery for two thousand years, abhorred and degraded by Byzantine and Mussulman, superstitious and oppressive—raised once more the shout of liberty; and what did we see? A proposition, in the very incipency of their struggle, to give them the aid of our countenance; ay, sir, even at the risk of a conflict with the Holy Alliance, and tendering that issue. Whence came this movement? From a very distinguished representative of that very section which is with such unanimity opposed to this amendment! Why is this, sir? The true answer, if given, would do any thing else than satisfy a very large portion of the people of this confederacy. We could sympathize with the degenerate Greek. We could hope to see Greece, surrounded by Austria, Russia, and Turkey, a free republic—a beautiful geography, truly, for a republic. There are no such sympathies now for Texas, nor for liberty.

I will allude to only one other case; and although it was not the action of our Government, yet it is one which is more touching to my feelings. It was the course of France; that to which I feel we are indebted for the privilege which we have of sitting here; to which, next to an all-wise and all-ruling Providence, and the wisdom and courage of our fathers, we are indebted for the success of our own Revolution. It was to us what our recognition may be to Texas—the crisis of our fate. It was just at the moment of Lord North's conciliatory resolution, which General Washington was afraid would be known to the army, believing that it would divide our people and paralyze our strength. It was in February, 1778, that we were recognised by France. Will any one say that the contest was then ended, or even that there was a probability of success? That gave us success. And if ever there was a scene upon this earth upon which the powers above looked with delight, it was when Lafayette rushed into the tent of Washington to announce the fact, fell upon his breast, and burst into tears. Sir, is there a man with the heart of a man who can look back upon that scene and refuse to others that countenance to which we are so much indebted for our own national existence?

I have been asked, of what great advantage to Texas would our recognition be? I answer, it gives her position countenance. If we refuse it, how greatly will it embarrass her. If she applies, as she will, to other nations, what will be the answer? Why have not the United States recognised you? They are your nearest neighbors, and best know your true position. It is the Government most likely to sympathize with you. If your case were a proper one for recognition, the United States would be the first to do for you what was done for South America and Mexico. What reply could Texas make, but one which would degrade and dishonor us in the eyes of the world? That we did sympathize with them, that we well knew that they were entitled to recognition, but were afraid of offending the Powers of Europe; or, which should cause a deeper blush on the cheek of an American, that all the generous feelings of our nature were chilled and subdued by miserable considerations of sectional jealousies.

Suppose, however, that other Governments, more wise and less timid, take them by the hand; for, without the aid of your recognition, Texas is free beyond the reach of fate; is it prudent to drive off from us a people whose hearts turned to us in the very first moment of their triumph? Is it wise to change those feelings into alienation and a sense of wrong and injustice? I entreat gentlemen from the manufacturing and commercial States to consider the advantages of proper commercial relations with Texas; those sections which will supply them with manufactures and carriers for their immense productions. Is it wise to forego these advantages, and not only to lose their markets, but, through advantageous treaties made with England, for example, to have the whole West supplied with goods coming to Texas duty free, and smuggled into the United States? And would it be possible to prevent it? To the West, what advantages does it not hold out? A vision as bright, in a commercial point of view, as that which burst upon the seer on Pisgah—a railroad from New Orleans or Metamoras to the Gulf of California, opening to their energies and resources the vast trade of the Pacific, of India, and China.

But we have the old raw-head and bloody-bones of offending Old England held up to frighten us from our propriety. We are to be deterred from doing what is unquestionably right and proper, because other nations may not approve it. I like not this stimulated virtue, which exists not in our own hearts, but in the eyes of other men. If that is to be our rule of conduct, we had better abolish all the forms of a free Government; for ours, bad as it is, is a standing eyesore to all despotisms. Corrupted as it is, perverted as are all its operations to base and selfish purposes, still it is better than any other.

Do gentlemen reflect how they express the tone of American feeling at home, and the estimate of American character abroad, by such topics? Whence comes it? Is it a remnant of our colonial feeling, which neither the Revolution nor the late war has been able to remove? When, on ocean, lake, or land, have we ever met on equal terms that the roar of the British lion has not been turned into wailings? Such fears are unbecoming an American statesman, unworthy a freeman combating in a just cause; and I trust that I shall never be engaged in any other. Let our motto ever be that of England's lion-hearted King: "If the powers above will be but neutral, we fear no odds against the world in arms." But, sir, if I must, against my will, and in violation of all the just pride of an American, reason away these fears, what motive, let me ask, has Great Britain to interfere? Will not the settlement of Texas open an extensive market for her manufactures, and be an additional source of supply of the staple so important to her? What is there to countervail these important considerations? Nothing, sir, nothing.

It was a wise saying of Bonaparte, that, let alone the commerce and money of England, and you might do what you pleased. The only motive for such interference, that has ever been suggested, is the opposition of England to the extension of slavery. The great object has already been accomplished by the movement in the West Indies. English philanthropy is now satisfied. That act consists well with the uniformly cold, selfish, rapacious colonial policy of England. What dependent province has she failed to oppress and plunder, as far as she dared to do it? Let her repeal the charter of her East India Company—a company of chartered plunderers and murderers. Let her do something to raise once more the people of Ireland—gallant, heroic, gifted Ireland—to the dignity of men and the rights of free-men, before she has the effrontery to talk of slavery and the rights of men in other countries.

Let that ribald reviler, that pensioned libeller, that hired patriot, O'Connell, who has unfortunately too much influence in the present policy of England, before he embarks in a crusade for liberty in other lands, go to his own good city of Dublin, and there at nightfall see the swarms of squalid wretches creeping from their dens of hunger and misery, with scarce a rag to cover their nakedness, standing under kitchen windows to catch literally the crumbs which fall from the tables of the rich. Let him divide with them his "rents," the degrading price of his patriotism. Let him at least vindicate their rights with the feelings of a patriot and the dignity of a statesman, before he shall dare to utter one word of sympathy with the slaves of this country, in all substantial comforts as well provided as he is, and more honest and virtuous, and therefore more happy. But, sir, if topics like these are to be urged here, how long will it be before we shall be told that we must not refuse to receive petitions from slaves, lest England will take it in judgdon. The cases are parallel.

He is very little acquainted with European politics, or with that lightest of all possible things, the present periodical literature of England, who does not know that the Government of that country has other matters on its hands, of far greater consequence. Since the seizure of the fortress of Ochaco, by the Russians, fifty years since, her course has been one of progressive and uninterrupted aggrandizement. The wars that have so much weakened some of the States of Europe, and annihilated others, have only resulted to Russia in an increase of territory and of power. That giant arm, even yet dripping with the blood of butchered Poland, is already uplifed, and all Europe is sitting and trembling under its dark shadow. England will make no war upon any free State; and this, and this only, was the true reason of her interposition in the unfortunate quarrel between this country and France.

Although, sir, I will not say that we are bound to extend aid and countenance to every insurgent people, I do think that we owe countenance and all proper aid to those who really strike for freedom and violated constitutional charters. We set this ball in motion: our Revolution, it has been truly said, was in politics what the reformation was in religion—it unchained the human mind. It was the greatest event in the history of man! How infinitely do all the discoveries in physical science sink in comparison with that glorious epoch when men were first taught to be free. Other nations struggling for liberty look to us as did the wise men to the Star of Bethlehem.

We, sir, have passed through the same stormy seas through which our gallant neighbor has been struggling unaided but by her own stout heart and sinewy arm. She has reached the light which we have placed upon the beach! Shall we drive her off? These young eagles, almost unfledged, have flown from their nest, and a grand and glorious flight they have made; they have been gazing on the sun, returning to us with weary wing; shall we refuse to them a resting-place? I hope, I trust not.

Mr. MASON, of Ohio, rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman, though participating largely in the regret, felt by many others, that a proposition of such momentous character as the one under consideration should have been introduced at a period of the session which must necessarily exclude that deliberation and discussion so essential to the proper decision of every important question, yet I am unwilling to let the vote be taken without detaining the committee with a brief statement of some of the objections I have to the proposed amendment.

The abstract right of this Government to recognise the existence and independence of foreign Powers is not denied. Whether the exercise of this right, in any particular instance, can be vindicated as just to others, and, at the same time, consistent with a due regard to our own interest and honor, is another and very different question. It is also admitted to be the practice of nations, founded in the necessity of the thing, to treat with the Government de facto, established in a country, without regard to the Government de jure. It is not competent to other Powers to inquire into causes of dispute between the belligerent parties, with a view to ascertain which is in the right, and to grant distinguishing favors to the one or the other, according to the result of such an inquiry.

Non-intervention is the cherished doctrine on which the Government and people of the United States have hitherto practised, as evinced in the conduct of both during the civil war that raged for so many years between Spain and her provinces in this hemisphere.

Mr. Monroe, in his annual message to Congress, in 1819, speaking of the insurrectionary struggle of the Spanish provinces of South America, said that "The greatest care had been taken to enforce the laws intended to preserve an impartial neutrality. That a virtuous people may, and would, confine themselves within the limits of a strict neutrality." That "it was of the highest importance to our national character, and indispensable to the morality of our citizens, that all violations of our neutrality should be prevented. No door should be left open for the evasion of our laws; no opportunity afforded to any, who may be disposed to take advantage of it, to compromise the interest or the honor of the nation."

And, finally, he was able to assure Congress and the country that, notwithstanding the sensibility and sympathy which were naturally excited by such a contest—

"It had been the steady purpose of this Government to prevent that feeling leading to excess, and that it was very gratifying to have it in his power to state that so strong had been the sense, throughout the whole country, of what was due to the character and obligations of the nation, that very few examples of a contrary kind had occurred."

With these principles for my guide, I propose very briefly to examine the question, whether it is the duty of the United States now to recognise Texas as an independent nation. Before the people of Texas can rightfully invoke the interference of foreign Powers, it must be proved, not only that they are in the enjoyment of all the attributes of a sovereign and independent State, but also that they possess the moral and physical ability to maintain, within their limits, the sovereignty they have asserted. Our information in relation to the condition of Texas is doubtless very deficient, both in its extent and precision.

The little we have is principally to be found in the report of Mr. Morfit, accompanying the President's message, on the subject of the condition of Texas, communicated to Congress on the 22d of December last. According to Mr. Morfit, the population of Texas consists of Anglo-Americans, Mexican natives, aborigines, and negroes, the whole estimated at 65,000 souls. Of these, he says, there are, perhaps, 30,000 Anglo-American settlers and 3,500 native Mexicans of Spanish descent. After stating that the population, consisting of emigrants from the United States, is said to be not less than fifty thousand, he adds that, "if I were to take my own judgment exclusively on this matter, and were to reason as to what I have not seen by that which I have, I should say the population, exclusive of Mexicans, Indians, and negroes, has never exceeded thirty thousand."

Suppose this estimate of that part of the population which consists of Anglo-Americans and Mexicans to be an approximation to the truth, (and there are many reasons for believing it exceeds the fact,) the whole amount of physical force belonging to the nation of Texas, exclusive of Indians and negroes, will fall considerably below that of many counties in the State of Ohio. And this population, small and feeble as it is in the aggregate, is not permanent, but a portion of it at least retreats at the approach of danger to the east bank of the Sabine.

As to the military force, we learn from the same report that it consists of an army of about 2,200 strong, not including the settlers or farmers, who can be armed on any emergency, so as to augment the number to at least 5,000 efficient men.

The naval force of Texas consists of four small vessels, carrying in all twenty-nine guns.

The internal resources of the province appear to be wholly inadequate to the successful resistance of any respectable force that might be employed for its subjection. It relies exclusively on external aid for the means of supporting the independence it has declared. No fact can be better authenticated; it is confirmed as well by the report to which reference has so often been made, as by all contemporaneous history, that the army of Texas is recruited from the citizens of this Union—is kept in the field, paid, and supplied with arms and provisions, by contributions derived from the same quarter. Mr. Morfit says:

“The present resources of Texas are principally derived from the sympathies of their neighbors and friends in the United States, and by loans upon the credit of the State. The donations from the former quarter have been, and will no doubt continue to be, very liberal, and indeed munificent. Several individuals, not interested in the success of the country further than their general attachment to the cause of independence and that of their old compatriots, have unostentatiously presented $5,000, while numbers have contributed $1,000 each, and small associations in the different States have thrown in their aid, until the aggregate has swelled to a large amount. I have been surprised,” he says, in conclusion, “to find that Texas has carried on a successful war thus far, with so little embarrassment to her own citizens or her treasury; and perhaps it is the first instance in the history of nations where a State has sustained itself by men and means drawn wholly from a distance.”

If this hasty review of the condition of Texas has not resulted in demonstrating her incapacity to maintain an independent Government, it has incontestably established another fact deeply affecting the character of this country, namely, that the ability of Texas to maintain her separate existence and sovereignty has been, and still continues to be, derived exclusively from the means furnished by the people of the United States, in direct violation of their neutral obligations; consequently, should the United States return to the neutral attitude from which they have so widely departed, and strictly enforce the laws intended to preserve our neutral character, the Government of Mexico would soon be restored in the province of Texas.

Whether the latter event ought to be desired by the friends of constitutional law and liberty any where, is a question that does not and cannot properly enter into our consideration in this discussion.

Suppose, therefore, the Texans should continue to receive assistance in men and money drawn from the United States, and should be further sustained by the co-operation of our army advanced into the heart of their country; and suppose, upon this hypothesis, their ability to maintain their independence, when thus sustained, should be admitted, still there are considerations arising out of so peculiar a state of things that ought to deter us from the indiscretion of a precipitate acknowledgment of their independence. If their independence has been the result of the counsels, or has been achieved, and thus far maintained, by the people of the United States; if our citizens compose her armies, and have command of the military and naval forces of the country; if they are found in possession of all the great offices of the Government, from the Chief Executive downwards, can we hope to escape the reproaches of other nations, and of impartial posterity, if we make haste to recognise a state of things that we have notoriously contributed so largely to produce?

What would the act of recognition, under such circumstances, be but an acknowledgment, not so much of the ability of Texas, as our own ability, and determination too, to maintain her independence at every hazard? Would not such conduct expose us, whether justly or not, to the charge of assisting in the dismemberment of a friendly Power, for the unworthy purpose of seizing on one of its fairest provinces? Can we, consistently with national honor, after aiding the cause of rebellion in a neighboring republic, be the first to recognise the Government established by the insurgents? I concur most cordially in the views and opinions expressed by the President, in his message of the 22d of December last, on the subject of the condition of Texas. In relation to the conduct proper for this Government to observe in the contest pending between Mexico and Texas, he says that

“It becomes us to beware of a too early movement, as it might subject us, however unjustly, to the imputation of seeking to establish the claim of our neighbors to a territory, with a view to its subsequent acquisition by ourselves. Prudence, therefore, seems to dictate that we should stand aloof and maintain our present attitude, if not until Mexico itself, or one of the great foreign Powers, shall recognise the independence of the new Government, at least until the lapse of time or the course of events shall have proved beyond cavil or dispute the ability of the people of that country to maintain their separate sovereignty, and to uphold the Government constituted by them.”

Mr. Chairman, we are called on, not only by the amendment under consideration, but by the newspaper press in different quarters of the Union, to yield a speedy recognition of the independence of Texas. For what purpose is the prompt acknowledgment of her Government demanded? Not, certainly, because she desires to enjoy that independence, the recognition of which she solicits; not that she desires to possess the rank, privileges, and immunities, that belong to a free and sovereign member of the great family of nations; no, her object, distinctly avowed, is far more humble, and besetting her feeble condition. It is, that she may make a surrender of her independence, government, territory and all, to the United States, on condition of annexation and reception into the Union!

The first elections under the constitution of Texas were held last autumn. Mr. Morfit reports that

“The voters at the different polls were required to state whether they were ‘in favor of annexing Texas to the United States;’ and the response through every municipality has been wholly in the affirmative. He says that great unanimity prevailed in the important point of ‘seeking admission into the Union of the United States of the North.’ He also discloses the very important additional fact, that ‘the terms upon which they desire to become an integrant of that Union have been discussed in the cabinet, and have already been, or will be, made the heads of instructions for the conduct of their representative near the Government of Washington.’”

A fact so extraordinary has not escaped the notice of the Executive, who says, in the message already referred to, that the people of Texas have, since the last session of Congress, “openly resolved, on the acknowledgment by us of their independence, to seek for admission into the Union as one of the Federal States. This last circumstance is one of peculiar delicacy, and forces upon us considerations of the gravest character.”

It appears, then, that the Government of Texas is simultaneously urging its pretensions to recognition, and treating for annexation to the United States; and the former seems to be made subservient to the latter. Indeed, the evidence, to my understanding, is irresistible, that a separate independent existence never was, at any time, an object of desire on the part of the people and authorities of Texas. From Mr. Morfit's report we learn that, in September, 1835, General Cos invaded the province of Texas, and that “a battle ensued, which terminated in the retreat of the Mexicans. He says the Texians assert that this resistance was not because they even then wished to separate from the confederacy; but, on the contrary, because they were desirous to bring back the Government to the terms of the constitution of 1824." If it be true, as they allege, that as late as September, 1835, they took up arms "in defence of the constitution," I can only say that, in the brief interval of a little more than one month,

"A change came o'er the spirit of their dream," and their intentions underwent a revolution equally sudden and extraordinary; for, in the month of November following, they held a convention at San Felipe, and formed a provisional Government, and there made a declaration which "was considered as an absolute separation from Mexico."

This proceeding in November, 1835, was speedily followed by the convention of the 2d of March, 1836, which in due form "declared Texas a free, sovereign, and independent State."

If a redress of grievances, or the defence of the Mexican constitution, and not separation, had been the object of the Texians, they would have tried petition and remonstrance, before resorting to arms—the last remedy of the oppressed. The Anglo-Americans of Texas could have found, in the conduct of their ancestors, when colonists of Great Britain, an example of patience and forbearance worthy of their imitation. The people of the old thirteen States, while they were subject to the dominion of the mother country, employed more than ten years in petitioning the King, Parliament, and people of Great Britain, before they finally resolved on having recourse to arms for the defence of their liberties. And then they did not strike for independence; for it was more than a year after the first blood was spilt in the revolutionary conflict, before they made a declaration of independence.

It is true that Texas, in 1833, applied to the Government of Mexico to be admitted, as a State, into the confederacy; and that her application was refused, and her agent imprisoned. The causes that led to the imprisonment of Austin have been variously related. What they were, precisely, I cannot ascertain. The bare refusal of the Government of Mexico to admit, on the first application, one of her provinces, as a State, into the confederacy, will not, it is presumed, be considered a sufficient cause to justify rebellion and revolution. There are many examples in our own history of unsuccessful applications on the part of our Territories to be admitted into the Union; and no one ever supposed that such a disappointment would justify these Territories in renouncing their allegiance to the United States.

Believing, then, that the whole conduct of the people and authorities of Texas, both before and since the commencement of hostilities with Mexico, evinces a design on their part to separate from the parent country, not on account of grievances that had become intolerable, nor yet for the purpose of obtaining independence, except as the means of effecting their ultimate design of annexation to the United States, I cannot, entertaining such a belief, vote for the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON.]

If the object of procuring our acknowledgment of the new Government of Texas be to facilitate the design of her incorporation into this Union, (and that she seeks this connexion we well know, from her own solemn acts and avowals,) how can those who are opposed to such a measure give their assent to any course of proceeding that leads directly to its accomplishment?

Sir, I shall not permit myself to be drawn into the discussion of any question to which a direct proposition to annex Texas to the United States might very properly give rise. In relation to that momentous subject I will now only say that sufficient for the day is the evil thereof, and that, in my judgment, evil will be the day when that question shall come to be seriously entertained by the councils of this nation. I have noticed it now because it naturally connects itself with the proposition before us, in the aspect in which I have been considering it. The friends of annexation are consistent in voting for recognition; but those who are opposed to the former, and who believe, as I do, that it is the end, and the latter the means, cannot consistently give their support to the present movement. If no other objection existed to the recognition of Texas, I regard this as decisive, till she can give satisfactory evidence of her desire to have independence for the sake of independence, and not that she may barter it away. But, sir, other objections do exist.

Mexico is our neighbor, with whom we maintain diplomatic and commercial relations, and have a treaty which secures, as far as treaty stipulations can do, an inviolable friendship between the two nations. Are we not bound, by every consideration of national comity and plighted friendship, to confer with Mexico before we proceed to recognise the independence of one of her revolted provinces? For many years, and until within a few weeks past, we have had a minister resident in Mexico. I understand he has had no conference or correspondence whatever with the Mexican Government on the subject of the civil war in Texas; nor have we in any other manner given any intimation of our intention to acknowledge the separate existence of that province. On that subject we have maintained an ominous silence towards Mexico; yet presuming, I fear, on her inability to resent the affront, we are about to intrude ourselves into her affairs. It is true Mexico is torn by internal dissensions, her treasury is exhausted, her army mutinous, her people discontented and rent by faction; but her weakness cannot release us from the obligations imposed by our neutral character, nor from the duty of practising towards her that courtesy which is due from one friendly Power to another. Her misfortunes ought rather to inspire her more prosperous and powerful neighbors with sentiments of forbearance and respect for her feelings in the hour of her adversity. To take advantage of her distresses would ill become the character of a magnanimous nation. We might at least ask Mexico whether she still intends to persist in the attempt to reduce the Texians to obedience, and, perhaps, could suggest some method by which a reconciliation might be effected, consistently with the honor and interest of both parties. Such a course of conduct would be entirely respectful and conciliatory, and it has the additional recommendation of being in strict accordance with the former practice of this Government in similar circumstances. So cautious, not to say tardy, was this Government in its movements towards a recognition of the Spanish colonies in South America, that as late as the year 1821 the period had not then arrived, in the opinion of the Executive, for the interference of this Government; for although the President, in his message of that year, had declared "it had long been manifest that it would be impossible for Spain to reduce these colonies by force, and equally so that no condition short of their independence would be satisfactory to them," yet he proposed nothing further in their favor than to urge upon the Government of Spain the justice and policy of her immediate recognition of their independence.

In March, 1822, the Committee on Foreign Affairs of this House, to which had been referred the President's message concerning the recognition of the late Spanish provinces in America, made an elaborate report; and, in reference to Spain, the report asserts "That the measure which this Government now proposes to adopt has been considered with the most respectful attention, both in relation to her rights and to her feelings." The line of policy pursued by every department of this Government towards Spain and her American colonies, during their arduous and protracted struggle for national existence, was, indeed, worthy of the purest and best days of the republic. How far this example of scrupulous neutrality and respect for the rights and feelings of the parent country has been imitated by the Government and people of the United States, during the war between Mexico and Texas, impartial history will tell.

The President's message, and other documents relating to Texas, were referred, at an early period of the present session, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs; that committee very recently reported, as the result of its protracted labors, a naked resolution recognising the Government of Texas; but not a fact was reported to enlighten the understanding and guide the judgment of this House and country on a subject of such vital importance. The committee may have thought that silence was the better policy, in a case where it might be difficult to reconcile the facts with a foregone conclusion.

Sir, to interfere in the domestic quarrel of our neighbor, so soon after the commencement of hostilities, and before the inability of Mexico to re-establish her Government and laws over the insurgent province has been demonstrated, and at the very moment when, according to information communicated by the President, she is making preparations, and evincing an unaltered resolution to prosecute the war, would be an act on our part rash, disrespectful, and premature—giving to Mexico just cause for war against the United States. That war against us will be the consequence of our intermeddling, is what I do not affirm. We may find in the weakness of the injured party that impunity which we could not challenge from the justice of our cause. But I reaffirm that an act of recognition at this time would be rash and premature, nay, without example in the history of this country, in parallel cases. It is not one year since Texas made a formal declaration of independence; and a year and a half has not yet elapsed since she first took up arms in defence of the Mexican constitution. And she still continues to be threatened with another invasion from Mexico. Can we, under these circumstances, recognise her immature independence, without being justly chargeable with a too ready interference with the quarrels of others?

Very different from that of Texas was the revolutionary history of the Spanish provinces in South America, and very different the conduct of the United States towards them, from that which is proposed to be now observed in regard to Texas. Buenos Ayres, though she had exercised the powers of an independent Government from 1810, yet she did not declare her independence of the Crown of Spain till July, 1816.

Venezuela and New Grenada declared their independence, and maintained a war for more than ten years; and, after they had obtained the object for which they contended, united themselves, in December, 1819, into one nation, by the title of the Republic of Colombia.

Chili declared its independence in 1818.

Lima, the capital of Peru, surrendered to General San Martin the 12th of June, 1821.

Mexico declared her independence, and practically established it, the 24th of August, 1821. The three latter provinces had, like their sisters, waged a bloody contest with the mother country a long time before they finally resolved on independence.

Under these circumstances, President Monroe, in March, 1822, by a special message to Congress, recommended the recognition of these several provinces. He informs Congress that "for the last three years the Government of Spain had not sent a single corps of troops to any part of that country, nor is there any reason to believe it will send any in future."

He took that occasion to add that "through the whole of this contest the United States have remained neutral, and have fulfilled, with the utmost impartiality, all the obligations incident to that character."

Thus we see that Spain having neglected for three years to send a military force against her revolted colonies, and there being no reason to believe that a further attempt would be made by her to subject them again to her dominion, and these colonies having all of them for many years been in the exercise of independent power, and some of them having declared their independence six years before, the Government of the United States, in 1822, proceeded to recognise their separate and independent existence. And this proceeding, after so long a delay, was, at last, not adopted without a delicate regard for the rights and feelings of Spain, and not until our friendly offices had been interposed to induce her to be the first to acknowledge their independence.

Such, sir, is not the conduct now deemed necessary to observe towards Mexico; for at the moment she is assembling a military force on the borders of Texas, with the avowed purpose of invading it, we, without even a show of respect for her rights or feelings, never having consulted with her in regard to either, are about to acknowledge the independence of her revolted subjects, though their independence is not one year old. The motive for this indiscreet haste in a matter of great national concernment I cannot appreciate. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Thompson] seems to suppose that its justification may be found in the conduct of France when she recognised the independence of the United States. I join most heartily in his eloquent eulogium of the French nation for the important services it rendered this country in the hour of its need. But to refer to some of the facts attending the recognition of our independence will not, certainly, be interpreted into evidence of a wish to lessen the debt of gratitude due from this nation to the French.

France recognised our independence in February, 1778, nearly three years subsequent to the battle of Lexington, and more than one year and a half after the declaration of independence was made, and several months after the capture of Burgoyne and his army. This proves that France did not act in so grave a matter without circumspection and due consideration of circumstances. Besides, it ought to be no offence to say, what now belongs to history, that the motive which influenced the councils of France to recognise the independence of this country at the time she did, was not sympathy for the sufferings of republican patriots so much as jealousy of the power of Great Britain—a hated rival, whom she was resolved to humble. Assuredly, unregenerated France, oppressed with the feudal despotism of accumulated ages, could have seen nothing congenial with her feelings and maxims in the young, vigorous, and uncourtly republicanism of America.

I have therefore not been able to find, either in the practice of the United States or in that of other nations, any example that would justify this Government in acknowledging, at the present time, the independence of Texas. According to my own convictions of duty, I am compelled to vote against the proposed amendment.

It only remains for me, in conclusion, to thank the committee for the patient attention with which it has been pleased to honor me.

Mr. HOAR said he felt somewhat unwilling to address the House on this subject, as, in doing so, he should be obliged to turn his eyes from the poetry with which not only he (Mr. H.) but the House, had no doubt been delighted, on the introduction of this motion by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. Thompson.]

Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill.

[H. OF R.]

That honorable gentleman has drawn a lively picture, full of pleasant fancies, enlivened by the finest touches of the imagination, instead of a plain matter-of-fact speech. I confess, (said Mr. H.,) that if called upon for admiration of the gentleman's pleasant picture, I am fully prepared to give it; but, if I am called on to vote, I shall first be under the necessity of casting my eyes on a picture somewhat different from that which the honorable gentleman has delineated.

The bill on the table is intended to provide for the support of Government for the ensuing year. The gentleman from South Carolina has introduced an amendment providing for the payment of the salary of a diplomatic agent to Texas, and in his motion for this purpose is an expression recognising the independence of that Government.

It is not my intention, sir, to call in question the general principles which the gentleman from South Carolina has advanced, but their application to the case of Texas. These principles seem to me wholly inapplicable to Texas as it now exists. It appears to me, sir, his brilliant fancy has formed a Texas wholly different from that which lies on our southern border. The proposition is to send a diplomatic agent to the independent Government of Texas. By adopting this proposition, we, in effect, declare that Texas is now in fact independent, and prepared to take a place among the family of independent nations. We are called on to assert a fact. This assertion should not be made without evidence; it ought first to be proved to the satisfaction of this committee. The proposition of the honorable gentleman is, that we should acknowledge this fact; my proposition, in reply to the honorable gentleman, is, that he should prove this fact. To justify the measure proposed by the honorable gentleman, it must be shown, by satisfactory evidence, that there really does exist an independent nation to be acknowledged, before we adopt any measure involving such an acknowledgment.

I beg leave to call the attention of the committee to the report which the executive branch of the Government has laid before Congress in relation to this subject. To this report the gentleman from South Carolina has referred, and to it let us look for evidence of the independence of Texas.

The question which seems first to present itself in this inquiry relates to the number of inhabitants; and here, sir, we find, by the evidence furnished to the House, that the whole population of Texas does not, in point of fact, amount to more than fifty or sixty thousand persons! These people, who style themselves Texians, are generally citizens of the United States, whose families, for the greater part, are still residing in the United States. We are told that this independent nation possesses a navy, an army, &c. The report informs us that this navy and army are in fact composed of and furnished by citizens of the United States; it has a revenue, we are told, but I find, in the report before us, that all the revenue comes from the contributions of the citizens of the United States. Here, then, are a number of citizens of our own country, crossing our southern border, seizing the reins of government in Texas, and calling on us to pronounce them an independent nation! If we allege the simple fact, it will be said that a number of our people, having seized upon a portion of territory not belonging to us, call now upon us to give them a legal title to a country over which neither we nor they have any legitimate command or control.

In calling upon us to acknowledge their independence, we are called upon to sanction the seizure they have made of this portion of a country at peace with us. It is a singular fact, to which I would beg for a moment to direct the attention of the House, that, at the very same time at which we are called on to recognise the independence of Texas, a document is laid upon the table of this House by our own Executive Government, in which we are informed that this very people, whose independent existence as a nation we are called upon to recognise, is actually composed of a crowd of citizens from our own country, not having been, and not now being, permanently settled or located in the country--mere transient visitors they might be called. There is another fact to which I would invite the attention of the House, in connexion with this subject; which is, that one of our generals, at the time these self-styled Texians (called and proved by the executive branch of our own Government citizens of these United States) were engaged in conflict with Mexico, was authorized, on the pretence of watching the Indians, to march his army into Texas, the territory in question, while we are professedly at peace with the Mexicans. And, in view of these facts, we are called upon to acknowledge Texas as an independent nation!

A portion of our own citizens enter the territory of Texas, establish a form of government, and, with the countenance of an army of our own a part of the time in the territory, successfully resist the Government of Mexico over the territory; and then this Government, whose citizens have made this achievement, are urged to be first in acknowledging that Texas is independent of Mexico. Those who have made this achievement are said, in the report on our tables, to remove their families to our own side of the line when in danger, and the soldiers themselves occasionally return to their homes in the United States.

Mr. H. was willing to grant all that the honorable gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Thompson] had said in relation to the weakness and imbecility of Mexico; but the weakness of the one party did not justify the lawless exercise of superior force in the other party.

Mr. H. then proceeded to examine the position maintained, that these citizens of the United States were no longer our citizens, having expatriated themselves; and that they therefore were bona fide citizens of Texas.

Mr. H. then referred to the statement in the report of Mr. Morfit, on the table, to show that Texian soldiers left their families in the United States, and were, to all intents and purposes, citizens of the United States; that they have the right to expatriate themselves he would not deny; but the proposition remained unshaken and fully established, that the persons, for the greater part, now in Texas, and calling themselves an independent nation, were, in point of fact, no other than citizens of the United States, who had helped to wrest that country from the Mexican authorities.

In conclusion, Mr. H. expressed his readiness to acknowledge the independence of Texas as soon as that State shall give evidence of possessing a competent number of inhabitants; to be actually vindicating, by other means than those furnished by ourselves, the right to self-government. But if, as is declared in the report laid before the committee, the Texians cannot sustain themselves without aid from the United States, it is difficult to perceive how that State can truly be called independent.

For one moment let us glance at a few facts. The number of Texian soldiers is stated in the report not to exceed 300. The remaining 1,900 or 2,000 are citizens of the United States. They have a navy consisting of three or four vessels, mounting, in all, 29 guns. The vessels are manned by 200 seamen. They depend on the United States for their pecuniary resources.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot anticipate the result of any negotiations, which may now be pending, or which may now be actually concluded, but concealed from us, between our own Executive and the Government of Mexico, or between the present commander-in-chief of the Texian forces and the Mexican chief. Before the meeting of the next Congress, events may occur which will render Texas independent. If so, the declaration of the fact may then be very proper. It may happen, on the other hand, that the Mexican chief, late a captive, may be in fact received by the people in Mexico, as by a recent report we have been taught to expect, with almost idolatrous acclamations; and, instead of executing any real or supposed treaty heretofore made, he may, with more or less success, attempt to restore Mexican authority in Texas. At present, the facts disclosed to us do not seem to me to warrant the measure proposed.

Mr. BYNUM moved that the committee rise.

Mr. CAMBRELENG reminded the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BYNUM] that to-morrow was the last day on which bills could be sent from this House to the other. He hoped the gentleman would not insist on his motion.

Mr. BYNUM, however, did not withdraw it; and, the question being taken, the committee, by a large majority, refused to rise.

Mr. BYNUM then said that he had arisen on the present occasion to address the committee with feelings of peculiar diffidence, arising from a full consciousness of his own incompetency to do any thing like adequate justice to the magnitude of the considerations involved in the very important question which was then before the committee. He would gladly have deferred entering into a discussion involving so many considerations until another day. The lateness of the hour (eight o'clock at night) precluded the possibility of a full and impartial investigation of the various topics that that subject necessarily involved.

He had hoped that the committee would have consented to rise, reported the bill to the House, and obtained leave to sit again; but this it had refused to do, and the friends of the measure then before the House were compelled to enter on the discussion of this most important subject, whether prepared or unprepared to do it that justice which its importance imperiously demanded. He had always felt the deepest reluctance to obtrude himself upon the attention of that House or its committee; and he felt doubly more so on the present occasion, knowing the state of feelings that all parts of the committee must at that time experience, from the tediousness and fatigue of one whole day's sitting. Sir, (said Mr. B.,) I will not complain of any course that this honorable body may deem it fit to pursue, on this or any other subject, in relation to myself. I have my duties to perform here, as a member of this body, and shall endeavor to do them, as I have ever done, in as well as out of this House, openly, fearlessly, and, I hope, independently; and should I in the discharge of those duties, in the course of my remarks, become tedious, or use any thing personally offensive, it would arise from the peculiar attitude which the course of the committee has forced me to assume, and not from any intentional feeling, on my part, to inflict any wound on the feelings of that body, or any of the humblest members of it, (if there be any more so than others.)

Now, sir, with these preliminary remarks, I will beg the attention of the committee to the subject before them. What is that subject? It is a simple proposition for this committee to determine on the existence of a certain fact, in relation to the existence or non-existence of a certain independent community. The amendment proposed by the honorable member from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON] was for the appropriation of a certain sum for the outfit and salary of a diplomatic agent to be sent to the independent republic of Texas, and for the expenses of running the boundary line between the United States and the Government of Texas; which proposition involved in its decision the affirmation or negation of the existence of an independent community or Government in the territory of Texas.

He was truly glad that the House had at last been placed in a situation from which it could no longer escape from acting upon a subject so indispensably necessary, as well for the honor and high character of this Government, as for its true interest and national policy.

He had regretted, and had looked on with pain for some time, in witnessing the part that the majority of that House had been playing off on that subject during the greater part of the last session, and the entire part of this session, up to the present moment. While he felt incapable of lecturing the House for any course it might in its wisdom pursue, upon that or any other subject, yet he must confess that he, as well as the greater part of those who had observed the progress of this measure, had looked with disgust and indignation on their truckling, skulking, and shrinking from this question, which had been so much evinced whenever any matter touching it had been called up there. If there was any thing either odious or alarming in its agitation, he, for one, had not had the astuteness to detect it. Why, then, this sudden timidity? This extraordinary precaution on the present, more than on every similar occasion? What was there novel or unprecedented in passing on the present proposition? If a stranger had been present, and were to judge from the course that certain honorable gentlemen had pursued, whenever an intimation had been made, near or remote, touching the present subject, he would have instantly concluded that it must have been one of a most extraordinarily novel nature; conjured up, too, perhaps, by the spirit of some foul demon, whose touch threatened little less than our political annihilation. Sir, (said he,) such a course, on such a subject, he was free to confess, augured, to his mind, the most inauspicious results. He saw nothing to justify it in the conduct of politicians whose object was a straight-forward course and fair dealing.

The people of this country were too intelligent to have eternally played off on them this game of political shuttlecock.

There was a time at which, when nations and politicians, as well as individuals, should assume the responsibility of their acts. This dodging and evasion of important questions is not the true character of the American Congress; it is not in pursuance with the high-minded and illustrious examples given us by the patriots and statesmen of former days. It was not of them to shuffle off the responsibility of meeting any questions, however momentous. They had never shrunk from the assertion of a fact that they knew to exist. Sir, he said, let us have no more of this, for the honor and dignity of our common country, if not for its policy and interest; let us not seek to avoid, by evasions and indirection, that which we dare meet directly. It is pusillanimous to be afraid to assert that which we know, and all mankind conversant with the true history of the country know, to be the facts.

But, sir, it is proper that this nation should now decide on this simple question of fact, as to the independent or dependent existence of this community, that is now located in the Territory of Texas, under all circumstances.

I say it is incumbent on this Government to assert the fact, either negatively or affirmatively—that it is incumbent on this Government to do so, as an independent sovereignty, and which becomes apparent from the very necessity of the case. Our own interests require it, and justice demands it. Our protection and self-preservation require it; and I will show, independently of its expediency and necessity, we had precedents and examples abundantly set us, not only by our own nation, but by nearly every other civilized one in all Christendom.

The necessity of recognising every independent community as an independent nation, as soon as the fact could be ascertained, arises from the indispensable necessity, amongst all other nations, of making them responsible for their own acts; and hence it is an obligation resting on the Government, and due from it to the people who compose that Government, to make all other communities responsible for their own acts, as soon as practicable; and this they cannot do, except by treating them as independent nations, and thereby making the whole responsible for the acts of its parts. Such, sir, is the position now taken by every distinguished writer upon international law; and such has produced the necessity of immediately recognising the independence of every community, as soon as all others lose their control over it, rightfully or wrongfully, and are thereby rendered no longer, by reason or justice, responsible for their acts.

Now, sir, (said Mr. B.,) I think the honorable gentlemen who have been so violently and inflexibly opposed even to the consideration of this subject at all, begin to get a foretaste of the singularly awkward attitude in which, by their conduct, they would necessarily place their country, in their refusal to recognise the independence of a community not responsible to any other earthly power for its acts. Is there a statesman of intelligence, in this or in any other country, who is not impressed with the weight and importance of this reason? To his mind it was perfectly conclusive as to the necessity of action, and immediate action, on the subject. This, said he, would apply, and was applicable, to all Governments, nations, and communities; and, as a general reason, it was sanctioned by reason, justice, and necessity. Yet, sir, we have been gravely told, and repeatedly too, that there was no necessity for the action of this Government on that subject, and by honorable gentlemen professing the intelligence and acumen of statesmen. Upon principles, as it regards all nations, general policy should compel us to recognise, under all such cases, (apart from its necessity,) for our more beneficial and commercial relations and intercourse with such communities. Such, in his judgment, was the true policy that this Government should pursue towards all Governments more indifferently situated. Yes, sir, if the territory of Texas was two thousand miles distant from this Government, such should be the policy that this Government, as a free independent republic, should adopt towards it, to act in accordance with its necessity, with true policy, and with national law.

But, under what additional obligations are we placed, when we take into consideration the many surrounding and peculiar situations in which the case before us presents itself by the juxtaposition of the territory of Texas to that of the United States; by the yearly, monthly, weekly, and daily commercial transactions and intercourse carried on with that people and the people of this Government. Sir, if, under ordinary circumstances, the reason for action on such an occasion is correct, as he thought he had sufficiently shown, what ought to be the action of this House in regard to the case of Texas, then? If the interest of our people was alone to be consulted, the action of this body was necessary; it was more: it was demanded, and indispensable to the well-being and harmony of the commercial relations now carried on between the people of this country and Texas. In the great variety of business now transacted between those nations, it is natural to suppose that there has been, or will be, differences of opinion as to the powers and rights of each other, growing out of these various transactions between the two communities. Texas, or the people of Texas, may become the trespassers either on the rights of our people, our commerce, or our soil. Now, sir, for such a grievance, from whom would you seek redress? This is bringing the question home, and within a nutshell, to the plain comprehension of all. Whom would your Government, Mr. Chairman, hold responsible for the outrages committed on the commerce of our people, their rights, and other trespasses on the soil, by the inhabitants of Texas? Would you, sir, pretend to hold Mexico responsible for the acts of Texas now, and attempt to punish her for the depredations that the citizens of Texas might commit on our commerce or territory? Has Mexico any authority in Texas at this time, or has she had any within the last twelve or fourteen months? Has she a single officer, fort, army, or soldier, now within the borders of Texas? Has she, or can she, by any possibility, exercise any control over the authorities, or the Government, or the people of Texas? Sir, not one particle, not one scintilla or iota of control or authority does Mexico now exercise in any part, near or remote, direct or indirect, within the territorial limits of the Government of Texas. Then, how supremely absurd, how pre-eminently ridiculous, is it to pretend to hold Mexico responsible and bound for the acts and conduct of the people of that Government.

Yet, sir, such is the extraordinary condition in which this Government is left, by the refusal to recognise the independent political existence of that Government at this time. Does any honorable gentleman not at once perceive in what a deplorable position such a ridiculous, blind, impolitic course places this country? But let us pursue this subject still further, and observe in what it must terminate when carried out. Let us refuse to acknowledge the independent existence of this nation, and look not to that Government for redress of injuries inflicted by its citizens on our people. The palpable absurdity of applying to Mexico has been already shown, as she possesses neither power nor authority in any part of Texas. We have refused to consider Texas an independent nation; and therefore, as a nation, she cannot be held responsible for her acts, not being considered as such by us. In what dilemma, then, do we, by the folly of our own acts, place this Government? He had shown that Mexico, by no principle of reason or justice, could be made responsible for the conduct of the citizens of Texas. Texas, not being considered an independent nation, cannot be made liable for the conduct and acts of her own citizens. Then, if neither Mexico nor Texas is responsible for the acts of the citizens of Texas, who are? There was no other nation that had put up any pretensions to the government over that territory, as he had, as yet, been informed of. Sir, (he said,) there was but one alternative left for gentlemen, to escape from this dilemma: having shown that this people could not, with any sort of propriety, be considered citizens of Mexico, and Mexico made responsible for their acts, and this House was about to decide that there was no such nation as Texas, with an independent Government, that made her responsible for the acts of her own people—this Government was made by that decision, as the only alternative left, to view every citizen of Texas as a pirate, marauder, bandit, and lawless freebooter, subject to be hung on the yard-arm of every ship at sea, or swung to the limb of every tree in your forests. Such, sir, is the unhappy result of false premises, when traced to their legitimate conclusions.

Can any man, or set of men, believe for a moment that the citizens of Texas, the armies of Texas, are mere freebooters, marauders, a banditti of pirates and outlaws, and that this Government should treat them as such? No, sir; no, sir! You cannot impose on the intelligent people of this country the conclusions to which you yourselves have come, as will be demonstrated this night by your votes, and it will be vain and idle for any gentleman who has taken this absurd position to attempt to relieve himself in future from an opposition to a measure most irreconcilably at war with reason, with justice, and the true policy of this Government.

With this view of the subject, (said Mr. B.,) he would now undertake to examine some of the facts, as they related to the actual condition of Texas, in a political point of view. The very honorable and venerable gentleman on his left, [Mr. HOAN,] in reply to his honorable friend from South Carolina, [General THOMPSON,] had asserted that this committee should rely on facts—facts were what the honorable gentleman placed himself on. Sir, (said Mr. B.,) I am a plain matter-of-fact man. I thank the gentleman for that idea. They are the facts in this case that he had mainly relied on to justify the opinions and sentiments which he had entertained on this subject. But for his knowledge of the facts in relation to that subject, his opinions might have been totally adverse to what they then were. It was upon the facts alone that he (Mr. B.) was disposed to rest the decision of this question; and what were the facts in relation to the political condition and relations of Texas? The President, to be correctly informed on this subject, after giving the commissioners of Texas to understand, during our last Congress, that as soon as it could be ascertained that they had organized a de facto Government, that they would be immediately recognised by this Government. Most prudently and wisely had he despatched a commissioner or agent to that Government, for the express purpose of ascertaining the exact facts, as near as practicable, of the real condition and situation of that Government; not relying on the statements of the commissioners of Texas, her agent, or partisans, he adopted the precautionary measure of sending one of his own—a gentleman well known here for his integrity and capacity.

He agreed perfectly with the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MASON,] and the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAN,] that we should not be led away by our feelings on this subject, but should be governed by the facts. Now, sir, (said he,) what are the facts, so far as they had been able to ascertain them?

He would first notice rumor and common report, which, in absence of all other, might be properly received as evidence. Then, sir, what was common report on this subject, and which had been acquired in by all parties for the last twelve months or thereabout? Have we not seen in the public journals—Mexican, American, and Texian—that the Mexicans had been defeated in Texas, and that every soul of them had been driven out of their territory, and that they had been the quiet possessors of the whole country for near twelve months; that the whole seacoast of both Texas and Mexico was now under the entire power and control of Texas? Such were the facts that we had learnt of all parties, and as yet were uncontradicted by any. But let us, as we should do, abide mostly by the evidence and facts put forth by our own witness, Mr. Morfit, the agent sent by the President to collect and report the facts to this Government. What said he in relation to the political condition of that country?

Mr. Morfit, our confidential agent, states as follows: "The Texans are in complete and undisturbed possession of all they claim; that they can, at any time, oppose an army of from five to eight thousand men to their invaders, and that they have a regularly organized and orderly Government." This, sir, is directly at variance with the statements just made by the honorable member from Massachusetts, who was so anxious that the facts of this question should be considered.

"The Congress of Mexico," continues Mr. Morfit, "which is now in session, seems to have exhausted all ordinary mod-^s of raising revenue, and adverts to the necessity of levying new contributions. The national power and integrity of Mexico seems to be lost in these domestic difficulties; and hence Texas argues that no other army will be raised to cross the Rio Grande against her. There is much reason in this assertion; and, besides the feebleness of the Government, the people in the provinces adjoining Texas are opposed to the war, as they have already suffered severely in the progress and return of their own army through their country. Zacatecas and Chihuahua have manifested great desire for peace; and if the ambition of a few men contending for power could be allayed, Mexico would be quiet and Texas free."

"If we recur to the military incidents of Mexico, in which persons from the United States took part, even while that country was under the dominion of Spain, it will be seen that nearly all the conflicts were disastrous to her subjects, and that there seems to be a fatality against her that is likely to keep pace with all her pretensions on this side of her natural boundary, the Rio Grande. As early as 1810, the military post at Baton Rouge, whose commandant had committed many wrongs against Colonel Kemper, was attacked by 40 Americans, under General Thomas, and the garrison, with Colonel Lossas and 120 men, subdued. The Mexicans, about that time, had commenced a revolution against Spain; and Colonel Ross, with 500 men, proceeded into Texas, to aid the patriots. He attacked and took the strong fortress of Goliad without any loss, and soon after defeated and captured 1,500 Mexicans. This army determined upon the conquest of Mexico, and routed and cut to pieces 3,000 men near San Antonio. A reinforcement of 4,000 Mexicans assailed Bexar, in the absence of the American generals; but the troops resolved to act themselves, and defeated the assailants with the loss of only three men.

"In 1812, General Toledo, who had revolted from the Spanish Government, took command of San Antonio, and, with Ross's force of 400, and 300 Indians, routed another Mexican army of 4,000. These events led to the general revolution which separated Mexico from Spain; and ever since then, whenever the Texans have been engaged either with the Mexicans to establish a republic, or against them to defend it, they have almost invariably prevailed. In the year 1832, when the Texans near Nacogdoches had been aggrieved by the military at that post, and had ineffectually endeavored to procure their removal, they took up arms for the purpose, and, with 250 undisciplined men, defeated 375 regulars under General Lus Piedrus. In 1832, during the administration of Bustamente, and after the violation of the federal constitution, a detachment of 132 Texian settlers, under Captain John Austin, besieged and reduced the fort at Velasco, garrisoned by 173 Mexicans under Colonel Ugartichea, with great loss to the besieged."

"In 1835, the Mexican garrison at Anahuac, under Captain Tenoria, surrendered to Colonel Travis, commanding a smaller force. In October of the same year, the Mexican cavalry, from the fortress at Bexar, were completely routed. At Gonzales, a few weeks after, 92 Texans, under Colonels Bowie and Fanning, fought the battle of Conception, and defeated 450 Mexicans.

"The battle near Bexar was fought in the same month, and 400 Mexicans were obliged to retire, under cover of the artillery of the town, before 200 Texans; and in December, the city of San Antonio and the Alamo, defended by 1,300 Mexicans, under General Cos, surrendered to 400 Texans, commanded by Colonel Milam. On the 21st of April, 1836, the decisive battle of San Jacinto was fought, in which General Santa Anna, with 1,300 men, were defeated by General Houston, commanding 783; and, on the 24th of the same month, all the Mexican forces retreated beyond the frontiers of Texas. This concluded the second campaign, and thence, it is said, 'a new epoch in her history was dated.'

Here, sir, is the evidence of our own witness; such are the facts that the confidential agent of our own Government communicates to the Executive. Is he to be believed, or is he not? We have rejected the evidence of the commissioners of Texas, and called on one of our own. Will you now discredit your own witness? Will you attempt to do it? Sir, you cannot. In the most ordinary courts of justice no man is permitted to discredit his own witness. Now, sir, what is the evidence of this witness of our own Government? Why, that "Texas is a regularly organized Government, and is in full and successful operation; that she has expelled her invaders, and is in complete possession of every foot of territory that she claims," and is thereby, by all intents and purposes, made the de facto Government. These are the facts to which I would call the particular attention of honorable gentlemen who are so much disposed to try this subject by the facts. These are facts and evidence put forth by our own witness, and it is too late now to attempt to discredit him.

From the whole tenor of Mr. Morfit's report, it does appear to me most clear that Texas is the de facto Government, and that every syllable of it goes to show the entire improbability, if not the utter impossibility, of Mexico ever reconquering Texas. From the brief history that he has there set forth of these contending parties, it is impossible for any impartial observer to doubt longer of the utter impracticability of Texas ever becoming again under the dominion of Mexico. This fact no man can doubt who will read that report; it is clear, lucid, and impartial, and speaks of facts alone, and not of rights.

It was upon these facts that he now called on that House to act, without regard to any supposititious, hypothetical theories. It was the facts on which he had relied, and on which the committee should rely for the character of their action on that question, and he thanked most respectfully the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAN,] who had so particularly invited the particular attention of the committee to the facts to which he had referred; he thought an attentive perusal of them would leave but one impression on the mind of every honest impartial reader who would take the pains to examine them. But, said he, if there had been reason to doubt the statements that were contained in Mr. Morfit's report, the occurrences and events that had taken place since were amply sufficient to remove them. What had they heard ever since the battle that had been fought at San Jacinto, which had rendered imperishable the fame of Houston, and spread over the fertile fields of sunny Texas a blaze of immortal glory? You have heard it dinged in your ears, day by day, weekly and monthly, that Texas ought not immediately to be recognised; that Mexico was reassembling troops to invade and overrun, (as by one fell swoop,) and depopulate the entire province of that little band of devoted patriots, whose deeds of noblest valor alone had won for them a country and a home. But, sir, what had been the progress and march of these Mexican myrmidons? What one's foul footsteps had yet polluted that soil, rendered sacred to liberty by the valor of self-expatriated heroes, whose deeds have often eclipsed those of Greece and Rome in the proudest days of their glory and renown? No, sir, not a Mexican soldier has dared to re-enter Texas since their entire defeat and discomfiture on the plains of San Jacinto. The defeat and capitulation of Santa Anna was decisive of the fate of Texas, and may be justly considered the birthday of this new-born republic. Sir, (said Mr. B.,) would to God I had a talent for eulogy, this night would I attempt to do justice to the memory of those noble spirits whose deeds of gallantry have shed such a lustre around the name of Texian. Where now are your Bravos and Bustamantes? What one has yet shown himself within the jurisdictional limits of Texas? Have not the armies of General Bravo been dismissed, or, rather, have they not deserted, and refused to recross the Rio del Norte? Are they not in a wretched state of revolt and privation, and destitute at this moment of every means necessary for the subsistence of an army of successful operation? If the public journals of either country are to be credited, they are. The last accounts from Mexico bring us information, too, that the whole country is likely to declare in favor of Santa Anna, who stands pledged himself, doubtless, by his own solemn acts, not to invade Texas again, but to recognise her independence. These events all concur to corroborate and strengthen the statements of facts set forth by Mr. Morfit in his report to the Executive. Then, sir, how is it possible that any intelligent man can longer doubt, with such facts and corroborating circumstances staring him in the face, of the independent existence of a de facto Government in Texas? He did not feel disposed to doubt the sincerity of honorable gentlemen there, though he thought there were adequate grounds to do so, when they saw fit to go so directly in the face of both facts and circumstances tending directly to the contrary, to which he too would most earnestly request the recollection of honorable gentlemen on that occasion.

The honorable gentlemen from Massachusetts and Ohio, however, had doubts, and reprobated the idea of the independence of Texas being acquired by renegades, plunderers, and marauders, that had fled from justice in their own countries, and seemed to lay much stress upon their being land pirates, speculators, &c.; although he knew the charge, as it related to nineteen twentieths of that people, was entirely gratuitous and unfounded, he was willing, for the time being, and argument's sake merely, to grant it. Its fallacy, he would show, was too palpable not to be detected by the most superficial observer. What, he asked, had that House or this nation to do with the moral character of the armies of either Texas or Mexico? Who would stand up there, and say the one was more debased than the other? What were the armies of Mexico, but convicts and pressmen of every hue, from the tawny mustizee down to the sable sambo? The fifth of every prison and dungeon in Mexico had been emptied into Texas, led on by bandits, that knew no law but that of plunder. He hoped that House would never descend so much as to undertake to decide on the moral character of the armies of any nation.

What if every man in Texas was a common highwayman, or robber, if you choose, or even an assassin, that could not, nor should not, affect this question; not even if they were ten times more debased than they had been described. The question was one of mere fact as to their independence; and, in deciding that, we had nothing to do with their morals, color, or complexion; which, he imagined, none doubted would compare with that of their invaders. He again repeated, were the Texans the most degraded, abandoned people on earth, having gained possession of their country, and having established a de facto Government, we were bound in good faith to recognise them.

But the honorable gentlemen were as much, if not more so, out in their other objection. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAN] had said that the army of Texas was composed of Americans, and that there were not more than three or four hundred Texans. Mr. B. did not know that there were as many, nor did he care to know it. Had there not been ten Texans in their armies, it would not have been at all material to the present issue. If they were able to hire men to fight their battles, it was their look out, not ours; or if they could get them from other nations to fight their battles for nothing, it was their good fortune, and they were entitled to all the benefits of it. The honorable gentleman, in making this objection, surely had not reflected on the history of other nations, which abundantly furnished the most analogous precedents and examples.

There had hardly been a war of consequence, amidst ancient or modern nations, in which auxiliaries had not, in some manner or form, at some one time or another, been introduced. But for the auxiliaries of England, under Wellington, would the French ever have been dislodged from the Tagus, and finally driven out of Spain? In that contest, every brilliant exploit was performed by foreigners; and were they not considered the armies of Spain, and did not the benefits of their victories redound almost exclusively to the benefit of Spain? But he needed not to dwell on foreign examples, when they abounded in his own country. What Indian war had occurred, in which we had not a part of our armies composed of Indian auxiliaries? Look at that time to Florida: were we not employing in our armies Creeks to put down the Seminoles? And what was the nature of our armies during our Revolution? Where were the French—their navy—Lafayette and his illustrious compatriots and coadjutors in the cause of American liberty? Without the auxiliaries of France would Cornwallis have surrendered at York?

Sir, the gentleman has been exceedingly unfortunate in his objection. It is one that would have applied with equal or more weight to our own country in by-gone days. I hope he will review these facts, and give to them that weight to which their truth entitles them.

The next branch of the subject that he proposed to examine was, what had been the precedents in relation to the acknowledgment of new Governments that had been set by this Government, and its action in similar cases.

He did not hesitate to say that the recognition of Texas, under the present circumstances, was in strict conformity with nearly every precedent set by this Government, from the administration of the great Father of his country's liberties, (General Washington,) down to the present day. The fact of the existence of precedents for recognition had been most triumphantly argued in that House on a former occasion, perfectly analogous to the present, by a distinguished statesman from Kentucky, and had been so much more ably and eloquently maintained, and set forth, than he could do, that he would simply read from the speech of that honorable gentleman, now a Senator in another body, which was as follows:

"Mr. Clay continued. Having shown that the cause of the patriots was just, and that we had a great interest in its successful issue, he would next inquire what course of policy it became us to adopt. He had already declared that to be one of strict and impartial neutrality. It was not necessary for their interests, it was not expedient for our own, that we should take part in the war. All they demanded of us was a just neutrality; it was compatible with this pacific policy, it was required by it, that we should recognise any established Government in Spanish America. Recognition alone, without aid, was no just cause of war. With aid it was, not because of the recognition, but because of the aid, as aid without recognition was cause of war. The truth of these propositions he would maintain upon principle, by the practice of other States and by the usage of our own. There was no common tribunal among the nations to pronounce upon the fact of the sovereignty of a new State. Each Power must, and does, judge for itself. A nation, in exercising this incontestable right, in pronouncing the independence in fact of a new State, takes no part in the war. It gives neither men, nor ships, nor money. It merely pronounces that in so far as it may be necessary to institute any relations, or to support any intercourse, with the new Power, that Power is capable of maintaining those relations and authorizing that intercourse. Martens, and other publicists, lay down these principles."

"When the United Provinces formerly severed themselves from Spain, it was about eighty years before their independence was finally recognised by Spain. Before that recognition the United Provinces had been received by all the rest of Europe into the family of nations. It is true that a war broke out between Philip and Elizabeth, but it proceeded from the aid which she determined to give, and did give, to Holland. In no instance, he believed, could it be shown, from authentic history, that Spain made war upon any Power on the sole ground that such Power had acknowledged the independence of the United Provinces.

"In the case of our own Revolution, it was not until after France had given us aid, and had determined to enter into a treaty of alliance with us—a treaty by which she guaranteed our independence—that England declared war. Holland was also charged by England with favoring our cause, and deviating from the line of strict neutrality; and when it was perceived that she was, moreover, about to enter into a treaty with us, England declared war. Even if it were shown that a proud, haughty, and powerful nation, like England, had made war upon other provinces, on the ground of a mere recognition, the single example could not alter the public law, or shake the strength of a clear principle.

"But what had been our own uniform practice? We had constantly proceeded on the principle that the Government de facto was that which we could alone notice. Whatever form of government any society of people adopts, whoever they acknowledge as their sovereign, we consider that Government, or that sovereign, as the one to be acknowledged by us. We have invariably abstained from assuming a right to decide in favor of the sovereign de jure, and against the sovereign de facto. That is a question for the nation in which it arises to determine; and, so far as we are concerned, the sovereign de facto is the sovereign de jure. Our own Revolution stands on the basis of the right of a people to change their rulers. He did not maintain that every immature revolution, every usurper, before his power was consolidated, was to be acknowledged by us; but that as soon as stability and order were maintained, no matter by whom, we always had considered, and ought to consider, the actual as the true Government. General Washington, Mr. Jefferson, and Mr. Madison, had all, whilst they were respectively President, acted on these principles.

"In the case of the French republic, General Washington did not wait until some of the crowned heads of Europe should set him the example of acknowledging it, but accredited a minister at once; and it is remarkable that he was received before the Government of the republic was considered as established. It will be found in Marshall's Life of Washington, that when it was understood that a minister from the French republic was about to present himself, President Washington submitted a number of questions to his cabinet, for their consideration and advice; one of which was, whether, upon the reception of the minister, he should be notified that America would suspend the execution of the treaties until France had an established Government. General Washington did not stop to inquire whether the descendants of St. Louis were to be considered as the legitimate sovereigns of France, and if the revolution was to be regarded as unauthorized resistance to their sway. He saw France, in fact, under the Government of those who had subverted the throne of the Bourbons, and he acknowledged the actual Government. During Mr. Jefferson's and Mr. Madison's administrations, when the Cortes of Spain and Joseph Bonaparte, respectively, contended for the crown, these enlightened statesmen said, we will receive a minister from neither party; settle the question between yourselves, and we will acknowledge the party that prevails; we have nothing to do with your feuds; whoever Spain acknowledges as her sovereign is the only sovereign with whom we can maintain any relations. Mr. Jefferson, it is understood, considered whether he should not receive a minister from both parties, and finally decided against it, because of the inconveniences to this country which might result from the double representation of another Power. As soon as the French armies were expelled from the peninsula, Mr. Madison, still acting on the principles of the Government de facto, received the present minister from Spain. During all the phases of the French Government—Republic, Directory, Consuls, Consul for life, Emperor, King, Emperor again, King—our Government has uniformly received the minister.

"If, then, there be an established Government in Spanish America, deserving to rank among the nations, we were morally and politically bound to acknowledge it, unless we renounced all the principles which ought to guide, and which hitherto had guided, our councils."

Yes, sir, such were the sentiments, at that time, of that most distinguished son of the West, of whose birth any country should justly be proud; whose known talents it were mean and low, even in an enemy, to disparage, however much he had and might differ with him in their political views as it regarded the future policy of the nation; he never could so far forget what was due to candor and honesty as to deny him the meed to which his talents and services to his country so pre-eminently entitled him. This speech, from which he had just read an extract, was delivered on the 24th of March, 1818, by Mr. Clay, in the Committee of the Whole, on a proposition identical with that now before the committee, offered by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. Thompson.] The speech of that honorable gentleman, it was seen, covered the whole ground of precedent, and left but little for him (Mr. B.) to say. The honorable gentleman (Mr. Clay) had shown them that the first precedent had been set on that subject by General Washington, than whom no nation nor age had ever produced a statesman of more consummate prudence and precautionary foresight. General Washington never stopped (said Mr. Clay) to consider whether the descendants of St. Louis were to be considered as the legitimate sovereigns of France. He saw France, in fact, under the government of those who had subverted the Bourbons, and he acknowledged the actual Government. Now, sir, what was the "actual Government" here alluded to, but the Government de facto? This was the first precedent set by the great founder of American liberty, which had been regularly followed up and pursued by his illustrious successors, in the persons of Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Madison, and Mr. Monroe. The practice, so far as he was informed, seemed to have descended down from the primary days of the republic, in an uninterrupted series of precedents and examples, heretofore unquestioned by any source of intelligent statesmen or politicians whatsoever.

Mexico herself had been acknowledged under circumstances by far more unfavorable than those under which it was now proposed to acknowledge Texas. At the time that this country acknowledged the independence of Mexico, it was a fact well known that the mother country, (old Spain,) for nearly eighteen months after her independence had been acknowledged by this Government, held possession of some of the strongest fortresses in all Mexico. Mexico was recognised by this Government in 1822, at which time the armies of old Spain had complete possession of one of the strongest posts and most impregnable forts in the whole Government. Among others, she held possession of the castle of San Juan de Ulloa, at Vera Cruz—amongst the strongest posts in the world, Gibraltar and Quebec not excepted. Then, sir, let us compare the then condition of Mexico with the present condition of Texas. Texas has expelled her invaders, taken captive the commander-in-chief of the armies, and President of Mexico; and there is not a post, fort, or fortress, or castle, at this time, of any description or denomination, in any part of her territory, in the possession of an enemy, nor has there been for near twelve months. Then, how incomparably stronger are the claims to recognition on the part of Texas than were those of Mexico! Yet the recognition of Mexico met with but little opposition from any part of this Government. Why, then, this morbid sensibility in regard to Texas? Strange, exceedingly so; it was unjust in the extreme. Sir, in reply to a communication in relation to the recognition of Mexico, from Mr. Monroe, then President of this Government, the report of a committee of this House held the following language: "For a nation to be entitled to respect in foreign States, to the enjoyment of these attributes, and to figure directly in the great political society, it is sufficient that it is really sovereign and independent; that it governs itself by its own authority and laws." Now, what other laws were in force, at this time, than those of her own enactment, in any part of the territories of Texas? None, sir, none, if our own agent and witness is to be believed, or the reports and statements contained in the journals of the three Governments of Texas Mexico, or of the United States. This report contains the precedent set at that time by this House; thus adding additional weight to those precedents sanctioned, first, by the illustrious founder of his country, and acquiesced in by every President down to the present time. He had perceived nothing more uniform than the course proposed to be taken by the amendment on your table, offered by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina. The precedents, so far, that had been set, by both the legislative and executive departments and branches of this Government, he had shown, he thought, satisfactorily, were in favor of the recognition of Texas, and the immediate adoption of the amendment before the committee.

Mr. B. would now state what took place between this Government and the republic of Colombia, as he found it in an extract from a letter written by the very honorable and distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, who then filled with great ability the station of Secretary of State of the United States under the administration of Mr. Monroe; and he was bound to believe that they contained the opinions of the honorable gentleman at that time. In his letter to Mr. Anderson, of 1823, he then stated: "The formation of the republic of Colombia, by the fundamental law of 17th December, 1817, was notified to this Government by its agent, the late Don Manuel Torres, on the 20th of February, 1821, with a request that it might be recognised by the Government of the United States," &c. *

* * * "The request and proposal were renewed in a letter from Mr. Torres of the 30th of November, 1821, and again repeated on the 2d of January, 1822. The President, on the 8th of March, declared that the time had arrived when the acknowledgment of the independence declared by the Spanish American colonies could no longer be withheld, &c. An appropriation was made by law, (4th of May, 1822,) 'for such missions to the independent nations on the American continent as the President should deem proper.' Here, sir, was what in substance was then contended for, and sanctioned by that distinguished, though now eccentric, statesman of Massachusetts, whose diplomatic talents ranked inferior to no man now living, on this or the other side of the Atlantic, and which had ever been displayed by an ability equalled only by the extensiveness of his masterly power of research. In these instructions to our minister, (Mr. Anderson,) the whole ground of time was covered. The first request was made to this Government by Don Manuel Torres, on the 20th February, 1821, for the recognition of the independence of that republic. On the 8th of March, 1822, it was recommended by Mr. Monroe, the then Chief Magistrate; and on the 4th of May, 1822, an appropriation was made, virtually recognising the independence of that Government, but a little more than fourteen months after the first application had been made; and this, too, was done in the very face of the remonstrances of the Spanish minister, (Anduaga;) yet it was now contended that the application of Texas was too soon, and premature, who had been knocking at our doors for recognition about the same length of time, while not a voice had been raised against it by Mexico. This, he thought, was conclusive as to the immateriality of the time for which a Government should apply to be recognised, and placed Texas on the identical grounds of former Governments that had preceded her in similar applications. He hoped the honorable gentleman who had represented his country with so much ability on this occasion, in 1823, would not now be found to disparage the salutary principles for which he had then so ably contended. He too, in that communication, had taken ground in favor of the Government de facto, which he conceived to be the only true ground to be taken by this Government, and properly the only legitimate one to be taken by every Government on all similar occasions.

Mr. Wheaton, one of the profoundest modern writers on international law, in relation to the acknowledgment, by France of the independence of the United States, says:

"That the acknowledgment of the independence of the United States of America by France, coupled with the assistance secretly rendered by the French court to the revolted colonies, was considered by Great Britain as an unjustifiable aggression; and, under the circumstances, it probably was so. But had the French court conducted itself with good faith, and maintained an impartial neutrality between the two belligerent parties, it may be doubted whether the treaty of commerce, or even the eventual alliance between France and the United States, could have furnished any just ground for a declaration of war against the former by the British Government. The more recent example of the acknowledgment of the independence of the Spanish American provinces, by the United States, Great Britain, and other Powers, whilst the parent country still continues to withhold her assent, also concurs to illustrate the general understanding of nations, that where a revolted province or colony has declared and shown its ability to maintain its independence, the recognition of its sovereignty by other foreign States is a question of policy and prudence only."

Implying, most clearly, that if France had formed a treaty of commerce, or even an alliance, with this Government, by which the independence, of course, of this Government would have been acknowledged as being the de facto Government of the land—that even then, and in that case, without the assistance rendered on the part of France to the United States, it would have been no cause of war on the part of Great Britain against France. And, sir, it was not on account of the recognition of the independence of this country, on the part of France, that Great Britain declared war against her; but for the aid that she had overtly given and rendered to the United States, and thereby making herself in fact the first aggressor. France had confederated with the United States in the war against Britain; and the act of one confederate was, as it has ever been, received as the act of the other. France, then, in reality, had first commenced with the United States a war, to all intents and purposes, against the powers of Great Britain. It was not, therefore, the recognition of the American independence that justified the Government of England in declaring war with France, but for an actual confederation and coadjutation with her enemies and their revolted provinces, without which, as Mr. Wheaton has most justly intimated, she could have had no just cause for war.

But, sir, as his honorable friends from the North and East had exhibited, he thought most unnecessarily too, an extraordinary sensibility on this subject, evincive of their untoward repugnance to touch it, he would show there must have been a most prodigious falling off in that quarter from the free and liberal doctrines that were advocated in 1823 by that most profound and erudite statesman whom all New England now seemed proud to honor, and who had but recently received a portion of the suffrages of that very enlightened and enterprising section of this country for the first office in their gift. He alluded to an honorable Senator who now occupied a seat in another part of that building, (Mr. Webster.) That gentleman, in 1823, did not appear quite so timid. It was then that he stood forth on this floor, the champion of liberty, and with the fervor of his lofty eloquence advocated the cause of freedom in a foreign land, expiring beneath the grasp of a despot's hand. There was not then felt such appalling forebodings from that quarter by the mere expression of an opinion by either the executive or legislative departments of this Government. There was not that chilling horror felt, which seems now to baunt the consciences of certain honorable gentlemen on this floor. Sir, said Mr. B., such was the language held by the highly gifted gentleman to whom he had alluded, in his speech in this House on a resolution introduced by himself for the appointment of an agent or commissioner to Greece, whom it was then proposed to be immediately despatched by the President, whenever, in his discretion, it might be deemed proper:

"In reference to what might be the opinions of other nations on our course here," said Mr. W., "they might indeed prefer that we should express no dissent upon the doctrines which they have avowed, and the application which they have made of those doctrines to Greece. But I trust we are not disposed to leave them in any doubt as to our sentiments upon these important subjects. They have expressed their opinions, and do not call that expression of opinion an interference; in which respect they are right, as the expression of opinion in such cases is not such an interference as would justify the Greeks in considering the Powers as at war with them. For the same reason, any expression which we may make, of different principles and different sympathies, is no interference. No one would call the President's message an interference; and yet it is much stronger in that respect than these resolutions."

These are sentiments that justly do honor to an American statesman. Here is a position assumed, that this House, nor this nation, should never abandon; as a free expression of opinion was identified with the rights of individuals, so it was essentially identified and inseparably necessary to the rights of nations. These were sentiments that it becomes every American patriot to sustain, as well for the honor as for the freedom and independence of his nation. Yes, sir, we have the right to the expression of our opinions, as well as a nation as individuals, as to the dependent or independent existence of any Government or nation, without giving just cause for war or for censure; nor should even the horrors of war deter us from the maintenance of this right. Sir, what is recognition, but an expression of our opinion that a nation is free or independent? And have we no right to do this, for fear of giving offence to some foreign despot? Away with such craven fears, as anti-patriotic, and at war with every ennobling emotion of a heart that throbs with the feelings of freedom for his own or another's country.

But, to show further authority to justify the position that he and his friends had taken on that subject, he would not confine himself to the writers on national law, or to the distinguished debaters and statesmen of his own country. He would show that it was a position that had been taken by England herself, of whose displeasure honorable gentlemen seemed to stand in such trepidation on the present occasion. It had been asserted and maintained, by one of the most exalted and highly gifted spirits of the age, and who, for high order of intellect, has at no time been surpassed by the first premiers of Great Britain. It was to be found in the correspondence between M. Zea, minister, &c., of his Catholic Majesty of old Spain, with the court of Great Britain, and through the honorable Mr. Canning, then prime minister, &c., of that realm. In reply to M. Zea, complaining to Mr. Canning of the course that the Government of Great Britain had pursued in the recognition of the independence of Mexico and the South American States, Mr. C. had taken up the subject of both the right and duty of other nations, than those combatant, to recognise the de facto Government, and has, in a most masterly manner, placed it upon grounds which must ever hereafter make it perfectly unassailable and indisputable. He has demonstrated, most clearly and satisfactorily, that the Government de facto is the only one that should be recognised, and that it is the duty of all nations to do so; and that doing so affords no just cause of complaint against any power, and further, from war. Yes, sir, such will be found the opinions of the first English statesman of the age. But let Mr. Canning speak for himself. In his reply to the minister of Spain he states that "The example of the late revolution in France, and of the ultimate happy restoration of his Majesty Louis XVIII, is pleaded by M. Zea in illustration of the principle of unextinguishable right in a legitimate sovereign, and of the respect to which that right is entitled from all foreign Powers; and he calls upon Great Britain, in justice to her own consistency, to act with the same reserve towards the new States of Spanish America which she employed, so much to her honor, towards revolutionary France.

"But can M. Zea need to be reminded that every Power in Europe, and specifically Spain amongst the foremost, not only acknowledged the several successive Governments de facto, by which the House of Bourbon was first expelled from the throne of France, and afterwards kept for near a quarter of a century out of possession of it, but contracted intimate alliances with them all; and, above all, with that which M. Zea justly describes as the strongest of de facto Governments, the Government of Bonaparte; against whom, not any principle of respect for the rights of legitimate monarchy, but his own ungovernable ambition, finally brought combined Europe into the field.

"There is no use in endeavoring to give a specious coloring to facts which are now the property of history.

"The undersigned is therefore compelled to add, that Great Britain herself cannot justly accept the praise which M. Zea is willing to ascribe to her in this respect, nor can she claim to be altogether exempted from the general charge of having treated with the Powers of the French revolution. It is true, indeed, that, up to the year 1790, she abstained from treating with revolutionary France long after other Powers of Europe had set her the example. But the reasons alleged in Parliament, and in state papers, for that abstinence, was the unsettled state of the French Government. And it cannot be denied that, both in 1796 and 1797, Great Britain opened a negotiation for peace with the Directory of France—a negotiation the favorable conclusion of which would have implied a recognition of that form of government; that in 1801 she made peace with the Consulate; that if in 1806 she did not conclude a treaty with Bonaparte, Emperor of France, the negotiation was broken off merely on a question of terms; and that if from 1808 to 1814 she steadily refused to listen to any overtures from France, she did so declaredly and notoriously on account of Spain alone, whom Bonaparte pertinaciously refused to admit as party to the negotiation. Nay, further: it cannot be denied that, even in 1814, the year in which the Bourbon dynasty was eventually restored, peace would have been made by Great Britain with Bonaparte, if he had not been unreasonable in his demands; and Spain cannot be ignorant that, even after Bonaparte was set aside, there was a question among the allies of the possible expediency of placing some other than a Bourbon on the throne of France.

"The appeal, therefore, to the conduct of the Powers of Europe, and even to that of Great Britain herself, with respect to the French revolution, does but recall abundant instances of the recognition of de facto Governments by Great Britain, perhaps later and more reluctantly than by others, but by Great Britain herself, however reluctant, after the example set to her by the other Powers of Europe, and especially by Spain."

"To come now to the second charge against Great Britain, the alleged violation of general international law:

"Has it ever been admitted as an axiom, or ever been observed by any nation or Government as a practical maxim, that no circumstances and no time should entitle a de facto Government to recognition, or should entitle third Powers, who may have a deep interest in defining and establishing their relations with a de facto Government, to do so? Such a proceeding on the part of third Powers undoubtedly does not decide the question of right against the mother country.

"The Netherlands had thrown off the supremacy of Spain long before the end of the 16th century; but that supremacy was not formally renounced by Spain till the treaty of Westphalia, in 1648. Portugal declared in 1640 her independence of the Spanish monarchy; but it was not till 1668 that Spain by treaty acknowledged that independence.

"During each of these intervals the abstract rights of Spain may be said to have remained unextinguished. But third Powers did not, in either of these instances, wait the slow conviction of Spain, before they thought themselves warranted to establish direct relations, and even to contract intimate alliances with the republic of the United Netherlands, as well as with the new monarchy of the House of Braganza.

"To continue to call that a possession of Spain, in which all Spanish occupation and power had been actually extinguished and effaced, could render no practical service to the mother country; but it would have risked the peace of the world. For all political communities are responsible to other political communities for their conduct; that is, they are bound to perform the ordinary international duties, and to afford redress for any violation of the rights of others by their citizens or subjects.

ued responsible for acts over which it could no longer exercise the shadow of a control, or the inhabitants of those countries, whose independent political existence was in fact established, but to whom the acknowledgment of that independence was denied, must have been placed in a situation in which they were either wholly responsible for their actions, or were to be visited for each of those actions as might furnish ground for complaint to other nations, with the punishment due to pirates and outlaws.

"If the former of these alternatives, the total irresponsibility of unrecognised States, be too absurd to be maintained; and if the latter, the treatment of their inhabitants as brutes and outlaws, be too monstrous to be applied, for an indefinite length of time, to a large portion of the habitable globe, no other chance remained for Great Britain, or for any country having intercourse with Spanish American provinces, but to recognise in due time their immediate existence as States, and thus to bring them within the pale of those rights and duties which civilized nations are bound mutually to respect, and are entitled reciprocally to claim from each other."

Mr. Chairman, (continued Mr. B.,) the lucid argument, the convincing reasoning, with which these opinions and sentiments have been enforced, the immense distance at which they have been placed by that most distinguished individual beyond all future controversy, require from my hands no further comment.

Sir, I have here concluded my authorities for the justification of my action upon this truly important subject; and he would now appeal to honorable gentlemen, and with the utmost sincerity and candor ask what foot of political ground had they left, upon which to predicate their continued opposition to the measure before the committee. He thought he had shown (at least he had done it to his own satisfaction) that the recognition of a de facto Government was not only just, but necessary; that it was not only temporarily expedient, but that it was the true policy of all nations, "ex necessitate rei," to do so; that it was a principle that had not been acted on alone by one President of this Government, but by all before whom that question had come; that it had not been sanctioned alone by one precedent of this Government, but by every one that had taken place on the same subject; that it had been avowed, not by one, but by most of the distinguished men of this country who had had an occasion to express themselves on the subject; and, finally, that it had been asserted and maintained by one of the most distinguished statesmen in all Europe, and acquiesced in by the Government of Great Britain, and silently sanctioned by nearly all the Powers of Europe. He had now but a few remarks to make, of a more local nature, to some of the honorable gentlemen of that House, who had evinced, either by their action or expression, their indomitable opposition to the recognition of Texas under the present circumstances.

Sir, (he said,) I will pass over the unsettled state of Mexico, the invasion of Barradas, in 1829, several years after her independence was recognised by this Government. I will pass over the doubtful revolutions and throes with which that Government has been afflicted by the ascension to its presidency of Iturbide, Victoria, Montano, Bravo, Pedrazza, Guerrero, Bustamante, and, finally, Santa Anna, to show how little security there is in the permanency of her own Government, the difficulty with which she has to contend to keep in subjection her own citizens, and the increased improbability of ever being able in future to invade and reconquer Texas. Mr. Chairman, (said he,) I fear that there are other signs in our political firmament than those that have yet appeared in the horizon, for this extraordinary opposition to a measure so palpably justifiable upon every variety of reason. I fear, sir, there is yet something at the root of this opposition that has not been set forth; there must be, to justify the action of this House. Can it be that fiend-like envy and jealousy which caused the expulsion from celestial bliss of a Satan, a Moloch, and Beelzebub, to the infernal regions of damned spirits? Can it be that remote probability of adding to Southern influence and preponderance in this nation; or does it arise from a feeling, ten-fold worse, of anti-slavery? Are the prejudices against these institutions so strong, in a certain quarter, as to cause this justice to be withheld from that suffering people, contrary to every practice of our own Government, and so utterly repugnant to all the principles of right, of justice, the true and impartial policy of nations, and the irrevocable laws of universal equity? If such be the true causes of the hostility to this measure, it is time for every man to the south of the Potomac to know it; and we would be here recreant to our duty, traitors to the dearest interests of our people, to keep the fact concealed from them one hour longer. He would invoke gentlemen to review those opinions, if founded on such disastrous prejudices, before they became too deeply rooted to admit of amelioration. They could not be acted out, there or elsewhere, short of throes and convulsions that must shock every quarter of this republic to its inmost recesses.

But who were those that were now clinging to those prejudices as to some holy relic; and what had been their history since the first appearance of those reckless spirits, aspiring to guide the councils of this nation? He would omit the manifestations of its first spark, in that insurrection known by the name of the Pennsylvania whiskey insurrection, so promptly quelled, alone, by the virtue and patriotism of a Washington.

It was the same party that had raised the cry against the admission and treaty for Louisiana, which had shed immortal lustre over the name of Jefferson, which gave us the complete possession of the whole waters of the Mississippi, whose mighty streams were now laving the shores of nine sovereign and independent States, and pouring into the granaries of the world the almost invaluable products of its prolific and fertile valleys. Yes, sir, even at that time was the policy of that same party displayed against the acquisition of the most rich, flourishing, and now by far the most prosperous portion of this nation. Against that measure too, from this same reckless, envious, mistaken, misguided party, petitions after petitions were laid upon your tables, until they literally groaned beneath their ponderous weight—while time had unfolded the fallacy of their predictions and the impolicy of their course, which none were now so hardy as to defend. Millions after millions, to the reverse of all their prophecies, are now annually poured into your Treasury, to enrich the older sisters of the confederacy, from the very soil acquired under the thunder of their anathemas. Under such a rebuke, by the lessons of experience, men, under ordinary circumstances, would pause in a career of error; but, sir, nothing daunted, the same party may be seen at work in the struggles that in 1819 or 1820 took place on this floor, and in the opposite branch of this Capitol, in the agitation of the great Missouri question, that involved the restriction of slavery. That House then had been convulsed for a whole session or more, until the Union had well nigh been despaired of. The same party had then brought this country almost to the verge of a revolution; but Missouri was admitted without restrictions, and the country was saved from the fury of the reckless and ambitious. It was the identical spirit of fanaticism, at work then as now; the same party that aspired to regulate other men's business—other men's religion and morals.

But their history stopped not there. We next had heard from them on the subject of Sunday mails. The whole country was, for months and years, in ferment about the impropriety and irreligion of running Sunday mails. Your tables were again loaded with hundreds, if not thousands, of petitions to stop your mails throughout the country on Sunday—to save your souls, and quiet their most tender consciences—until the report of his very honorable and veteran friend [Colonel RICHARD M. JOHNSON] from Kentucky had exposed so effectually their absurdity and folly, that all felt, in future, ashamed to acknowledge that they had ever had the least do with so ridiculous a subject; and thus they disappeared with that shame which has ever covered the folly of fanaticism when once exposed. Here, too, as on former occasions, one might reasonably have supposed that the lesson of experience would have had a remedial effect. But not so with the fanatics. They have ever proven themselves blind, as well to the lessons of experience as to truth and reason. This folly had scarcely been exposed by the report of that veteran statesman, [Colonel RICHARD M. JOHNSON,] which did equal credit to his head and his heart, than you find the same identical party (with some few exceptions,) conjuring up some mighty ignis fatuus against masonry. It too, like slavery, was a curse in the land, and against their tender consciences. Anti-masonry became next their watchword, on whose broad banners my honorable friends over the way, on my right, (alluding to Messrs. J. Q. ADAMS and F. GRANGER,) had figured so conspicuously. Yes, sir, at one time we would have thought every mason in the land, by this proscriptive party, would have been put to the rack; but for the good sense of the hardy democratic yeomanry of this country, who have so often proved competent to arrest the march of the fanatics, under whatever name or garb they may have associated, perhaps their unhallowed objects might have been effected. Anti-masonry, too, has had its race, and is fast becoming obsolete. The mighty bubble has burst, and shame, confusion, and reproach, are the only inheritance left to its authors. It was conceived in folly, as its discussion has been in shame.

Rebuffed and confuted in nearly every effort by the intelligence of the people, this spirit is yet sleepless in its attempts to acquire a ruling influence in the councils of the nation. They heed not defeat nor exposure. Where will you again find them? Look at the exclusive care that they would have extended to the Indians; murmurs long and loud were put up against the policy of moving the red man from the white, when every man of experience and practical knowledge must have known that there was no safety in both living and commingling together. Yes, sir, petitions after petitions crowded every portal of this House against the removal of the poor Indians, depicting in glowing colors, and advocated with all the flowers of rhetoric, on this floor, setting forth the cruelty and impolicy of this act. It was the blood of the red man that seemed to haunt their bewildered imaginations; and upon that subject, too, the whole nation for a while was convulsed to its centre, by these self-same exclusives of humanity, tender conscience, and liberty. Why, sir, the merest tyro in politics would laugh them to scorn. The just policy of the Government, as to the removal of the Indians, has been acquiesced in by every politician of intelligence, in every portion of our country; and the chimeras of fanaticism have been left to recoil alone to the disgrace and folly of its authors.

Blind yet to these lessons of experience, however, and "nothing daunted" at oft exposures, they have now seized, with death-like grip, on that ill-omened subject, abolition; and as some fallen spirits, determined, through revenge and rancor, to make one last dying struggle to regain the eminence they once had held amongst their followers. Yes, abolition is now the hobby of that same deluded sect of politicians whose history he had brought up from the primary days of the republic, and had shown it, when acted out, to have been a series of political fallacies and delusions. This abolition bubble, too, must burst, else this country will be bathed in the blood of its noblest spirits, and its rivers impurpled with its crimson gore; and generation after generation may rue the blind folly of fanaticism, spurred on either by envy, revenge, or worse ambition.

Had gentlemen not already, from what had passed at the present session, got some foretaste of the beauties of abolitionism; or was the obtundity of our intellect so great as to require a kick or a cuff to induce us to take a hint? He thought there had been evidence enough—demonstrations enough—to satisfy every thinking, enlightened man, in or out of that House, what must be the inevitable result of even an attempt here to carry out the views of the abolitionists. He repeated it, that these views could not be put in practice without impurpling the whole waters of the South with the blood of thousands. Let no gentleman deceive himself; the contrary was an idle dream. While on that subject, he would take an occasion to reply to a remark made but a few days since, and, he had thought, for his ears.

An honorable gentleman had said that "the South should best mind its own interest; that if any thing of the kind ever became necessary, the North and East had but to march an army to the South, and that they would make our own slaves conquer us." Sir, little do gentlemen know of the true feelings of Southern men and Southern tactics who harbor such sentiments as these. Little must they dream of the crimes they would become instrumental in the commission of, should such an event ever be attempted in this devoted land of freemen, which God, in his infinite mercies, arrest. Sir, would gentlemen believe, before the South would permit that or any similar advantage to be taken of their condition in that way, that they would be driven to adopt measures too appalling almost to repeat here or to contemplate—at which human nature itself would be shocked. Do gentlemen not know that the South would assemble, by thousands, those unfortunate creatures, and in shambles have them executed in cold blood!

Sir, they would be driven to adopt such a course sooner than suffer themselves to be butchered by them, appalling, shocking, revolting, as it would be to every feeling of humanity; for the laws of necessity admit of neither rule nor mercy. Have honorable gentlemen thought seriously, who thus spoke slightly of this subject? He feared not. It was the great fault common to all abolitionists. They only thought of their object, without once thinking of the means by which it was to be accomplished; and in that their leaders, no doubt, had been guilty of a practical imposition on the public mind. What was their mode in getting up these abominable petitions? He spoke from such information as he had been able to procure on the subject. A petition was handed round, sometimes at their meetings, or Sunday school, and at other times privately, pretty much, said he, in this way: The persons handing it around, who were generally of the lower clergy, addressed the signers thus: "My friend, I want your signature to this petition." "What petition?" replies the signer. "A'n't you against slavery?" says the clergyman, or his agent. "Oh, yes," says the signer; "it is a most abominable, damning crime to hold our fellow-beings in bondage!" "Sign this petition," says the applicant, "and show that you are against it; and instruct our members in Congress to abolish this heinous sin, so much against our religion and free institutions. You, sir; you, madam; you, my young friend, (to the boys;) you, my little miss;" and, without a further explanation or comment, all sign the instructions to regulate our action here. [You are right in that, said Mr. CUSHMAN, from New Hampshire, to my certain knowledge.] And in this manner, sir, (said Mr. B.,) are such petitions gotten up, and such feelings and prejudices propagated throughout that country against Southern men and Southern institutions, which are now shaking to its centre every pillar that sustains our republican freedom; while, through ignorance or design, the means by which the object of abolition is to be effected are cautiously kept concealed from their unthinking subscribers.

Sir, why do they not tell them the truth when these petitions are presented; and that, before their object can be accomplished on that subject, the youngest among them will lie cold beneath the silent sod, from the decrepitude of old age; and that the fairest portion of their fellow-companions, brothers, friends, and playmates, will be converted into soldiers, many of whose carcasses will be made a prey for the foul vulture and war-dogs of the South; nor even then would they have depicted the half part of the scene of this threatening, coming havoc. Sir, I ask my honorable friends from that region, have these deluded men, who are advocating and agitating this subject, thus informed the people, that they are producing of these consequences which must flow from their conduct, if persisted in, as certain as the radiance of heaven is reflected in the sunbeam? Sir, if they have, what demon has dared to put his hand to pen to invite such afflictions to lay waste, by kindred slaughter, the fairest fields of this mighty empire of republican freemen? No, sir; no, sir; I cannot, I will not, believe it; they have been deceived; they have deceived themselves; there cannot be such fiends in human shape, either in the North, the East, West, or South. They have not been taught "the cost of such a job," its price of blood, of treasure, of toil, and of human carnage; and all this to be brought about by the "meek and lowly followers of the Father of Peace!"

Let me entreat, said Mr. B., most kindly and tenderly, honorable gentlemen who now occupy seats on this floor, who represent districts where the moral sense of the community is rotten upon the subject of slavery, from their entire ignorance of its condition and identity with our institutions, to return home and endeavor to correct and enlighten their misguided zeal, and place before them, in their true and unalterable colors, the baleful results that must be inevitably consequent to the cultivation of such prejudices against one portion of this community by the other. Let them be taught the calamities that they invite by their acts to visit this, "their own native soil." Let the truth in relation to this subject be proclaimed, that every man in future may mistake not the evil hour of his country's afflictions, so that, with seeing eyes and hearing ears, he may embrace the dire fruits of a misguided frenzy and fiend-like fanaticism. It was due to their country's peace and safety to enter their remonstrance against the progress of doctrines so monstrous, and pregnant with such a train of evils. Let them be induced to look nearer home for objects of their sympathy and charity; and he doubted if there be not many more entitled to them near their own household than the sable Africans, whether they are to reside in Texas or the United States.

It had been remarked, by a distinguished author, that nothing was more common than to find men of ability and intelligence, from a false philanthropy, in distant lands in search of evils to reform, while around their own doors, unheeded, swarmed innumerable abuses, crying aloud for every correction and alleviation that the ingenuity of man could invent. Individuals, as well as communities, before they look abroad, should first turn their eyes towards home, and see if nothing there required the hand of reform. He had no disposition to make any invidious comparison of the poor, the wretched, or oppressed, between any sections of this country; but he doubted not that there was as little to be found at the south and southwest of this as in any section of country on the face of the globe; and, if there were tears to be shed for suffering humanity, gentlemen might find objects much more entitled to them in another quarter; perhaps these nicknamed philanthropists might find them much nearer home, if not in their own household.

He had been led to make this digression, somewhat, on the subject of slavery and abolition, because he now saw that it was the only efficient cause of the opposition to the recognition of the independence of Texas. He did not believe that honorable gentlemen could lay their hands on their hearts, at this time, and say that it was not the efficient one that prompted this opposition. We have nothing to do with the institution of slavery in Texas, unless we undertake to regulate the institutions of the world; and if the opposition arose from a jealousy that it might at some future day add political weight or influence to the Southern States, that fact, too, should be known for history's sake. The South should no longer be deceived in believing that we meet here to legislate for the general advantage of all sections of our country. If their institutions were so odious to any portion of our brethren as to induce them to withhold justice from a gallant though infant little republic, struggling to burst asunder the fetters that have hitherto bound her to the yoke of despotism, and emerge to the rank of independent nations, in consequence of the similarity of its institutions to our own, there was no longer safety nor security in relying on our councils for protection here. If such a jealousy of our weight (so entirely dependent on remote future contingencies) and prosperity was tolerated in any quarter of this republic, the South should know it, and prepare to rest on their own arms and their own resources in all future contingencies. The greatest enemies to the peace, the harmony, the happiness, prosperity, and durability of this Government, were not to be found in the South; the worst enemies to our liberty, and to humanity, were to be found in that section where the spirit of abolition and disappointed political ambition had mostly prevailed; it was where the moral sense was rotten to the core by the indulgence of a religious frenzy and fanaticism. There, and amongst them, abided the worst enemies to this Government, to the Union, and its liberty. It was there where all eyes should be turned, and which should elicit all the patriot's care; it was they that must be subdued, conquered, or reformed, or this nation was in twain; they were the true arch enemies of our peace and our Union, with a predetermined opposition to every measure with which Southern interests or the subject of slavery was connected, directly or remotely.

But, sir, said he, I will here leave this branch of the subject, and he hoped forever.

This Government and its authorities, if he had not been incorrectly informed, had already done, ex necessitate, what it was proposed in effect to be done by the amendment of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMSON,] then on the table. He had been informed, from the best authority, that the civil authorities at New Orleans had seized a Texian vessel, for some supposed or real offence committed on our commerce; and a regular judicial investigation had been gone through with, in which both the vessel and crew had been treated as belonging to the Government of Texas, and not that of Mexico. There, then, was a virtual acknowledgment of the Government of Texas, from the very necessity of the case, on the part of our authorities, which went far to establish that necessity of recognition for which he had before contended. That, he insisted, had not been all. He had learnt, from the highest authority, that since the minister of that Government, (Colonel Wharton,) from whom, and his Secretary, (Colonel Wolf,) he confessed himself indebted for much information he had on that subject, had been at that court, that one of the first officers in the cabinet of President Jackson (and it might be deemed, in part, a cabinet measure) had also called on the minister from Texas either for reparation or explanation for certain acts committed by the Texian navy or commerce, on that of the United States; treating Texas thereby, to all intents and purposes, as the de facto Government, and acknowledging, "ipso facto," her independence.

He had understood, too, that notes or communications had been received by the representative of the Government of Texas, from him then highest in authority, in which that representative had been addressed as the minister or representative of the Government of Texas. Here, then, was a virtual recognition of a fact, from the very necessity of the case, by both the heads of the department and the civil and judicial authorities of the country, which this House was about to shrink from, to, in his judgment, its eternal shame and degradation; from a spirit of pusillanimity, or what was, if possible, worse, of envy and jealousy of its redounding to the advantage of one section of this country more than another; or from some apprehension that it might directly or indirectly affect that subject which seems now to threaten us of being the Pandora's box of all our future mischiefs, infecting our whole political atmosphere with discords and "furies damned," crying aloud for havoc and civil war. But upon that subject he had said enough; he had considered the whole of it, in every variety of form with which it had presented itself to his mind; and on no subject had he ever come to a more satisfactory conclusion, as to the justice, expediency, and necessity, of the measure, than the immediate recognition of the independence of the republic of Texas, and the indication of the feelings of this body, by the adoption of the measure on the table; for which I am now ready, henceforth and forever, to throw myself upon the judgment of my God and my country.

[Before Mr. BYNUM had concluded his speech, the whole of which is given above, he gave way to

Mr. THOMPSON, of South Carolina, who moved that the committee rise; and the question being taken by tellers, the vote was: Yeas 26, nays 86—no quorum.

Mr. THOMPSON then moved that the committee rise and report that fact to the House; which was agreed to.

The Speaker having resumed the chair, and the chairman having reported the fact that the committee had found itself without a quorum,

Mr. THOMPSON moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. VANDERPOEL called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 20, nays 105.

The House again went into committee, at 10 o'clock P. M. and

Mr. BYNUM concluded his remarks.]

When Mr. BYNUM had concluded,

Mr. HUNTSMAN took the floor, and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman: I must apologize to the House for requesting their attention for a short space of time, while I attempt to disabuse the people of Texas from the vast contumely and misrepresentation (unintentional, no doubt) which have been thrown upon them by the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MASON,] and the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.] Sensible as I am that neither of the honorable gentlemen would knowingly, or intentionally, either injure or misrepresent the Government or an individual of Texas, it becomes the more necessary, on my part, to present such a body of facts to Congress as will explain the original cause of the settlement of American citizens in Texas, the inducements and guarantees held out to them, the obligations imposed upon them, and a historical detail of the rise, progress, and operation of those causes of complaint, of oppression, injustice, and despotism, which were practised by the mother Government, which created late civil wars in Texas, and which finally led to the establishment of the independence of those provinces. The high character which both of the honorable gentlemen have in this House and elsewhere, for talents and intelligence of the first order, would at once forbid the attempt, on my part, to measure strength with them in political discussions upon any subject, when such fearful odds are arrayed against me. But, sir, with one single advantage only, I will peril myself in this conflict. I hold the sword of Truth in one hand, and the eternal principles of Justice in the other. With these I will go forth, conquering and to conquer; and I will not only promise the gentlemen themselves, but all mankind, and as many of the ladies as are here to listen to me, that they have been misinformed, deluded, and wholly mistaken, in the history and facts appertaining to the connexion and final separation of Texas and Mexico. They have been misinformed in regard to the character of the emigrants to that country, the motives of their action, and the wrongs they have suffered. Many of them I know personally; many of them are my friends—have been my constituents; are equal, in point of talents, respectability, and high-souled patriotism, to any gentleman on this floor. Many who have gone to that country have been members of Congress, of State Legislatures, judges of courts, or occupied other high stations under this Government. I cannot consent to class these with the outlaws, the profligate, the banditti, and fugitives from justice, which the gentleman from Ohio seems to suppose constitute the mass of population in Texas. I ask that gentleman to distrust his information; if he has registered upon his memory the facts in relation to Texas that he has disclosed here to-night, I beg him to blot them out forever. That no trace of them be left, I solicit him to go to the other branch of this Legislature, where the expunging process seems to be in operation, and have every particle of it expunged, secundum artem, from his mind.

I live in a section of the country convenient to Texas, where the intercourse between us is quite frequent; where our communications are uninterrupted; where many of the friends, relatives, and connexions of my constituents have located themselves; and I claim the right to know something of the nature and character of the whole controversy. As time is precious, I will run rapidly over the main facts in relation to this matter, with the hope that, when the House shall be put in full possession thereof, neither the acknowledgment of the independence of Texas, nor a salary and outfit for a minister, will be withheld from that country. Antecedent to the establishment of the imperial Government under Iturbide, in May, 1822, and while these colonies were struggling for independence from the yoke of old Spain, many Americans engaged in the Mexican service, to aid and assist in achieving that independence for the South American provinces, which was achieved. For these services the new Government had nothing to give, but promised those enterprising Americans large bounties in land. Amongst others of that day (who fought in the Mexican wars) of my acquaintance, there is one deserving of particular mention; I mean Colonel Reuben Ross, of Tennessee. I believe he was a native of Virginia. He had a colonel's command in the Mexican service, and went through many hard-fought battles with the royal forces, and upon one memorable occasion, when he was in command in an engagement, the various evolutions which are frequent in battles brought him in contact with the commander of the royal forces, both on horseback. The intrepid and gallant Ross, whose soul burnt high with patriotism and noble daring, attacked the Don in single combat. The Spaniard fell, and Ross lost a finger. The Government of Mexico awarded him a large body of land in Texas. He was my constituent: he lived then in a district I had the honor of representing in the Senate of Tennessee. After the independence of the country was established, and the authority of old Spain had ceased, Colonel Ross procured his grants for the lands, and upon his return home he was treacherously murdered, with most of his company, in the Mexican dominions, by those same Spaniards whom he had so long and so nobly fought to make free. I mention this fact to show that many of the Americans fought for the Mexicans then, as well as they have fought for the Texans since—that these lands were dearly bought. I could, if time would permit, cite many daring deeds of valor performed by Ross and others, which equal the battle of Jacinto, the Alamo, or any other, against the armies of old Spain. I contend that the Mexican Government has less reason to complain of an interference by volunteers from the United States, and of the propriety of our acknowledgment of the Texian independence, than any people upon the face of the earth. It was precisely what she implored of our citizens in her contest with old Spain. She sought the aid of our citizens to fight her battles. She sought our sympathies and our prayers for her success. She sought an acknowledgment of her independence, while the royal armies were yet in some portions of the country, and in possession of some of the strongest forts. She obtained it all. And, presupposing that every word of complaint which has been so dolefully uttered by the gentlemen from Ohio and Massachusetts, in regard to our enterprising young men seeking service in the armies of Texas, is true, it is no more than was solicited, accepted, and sanctioned with great joy by the Mexicans, upon precisely a similar occasion, between them and old Spain. Mexico was extremely willing to receive the voluntary aid of our enterprising men then; but, like the lawyer's ox that was gored by the bull of the farmer, it alters the case now.

But to proceed with the history: Revolution succeeded revolution in the South American provinces and Spanish North America. In May, 1822, General Iturbide, by fraud, force, and the assistance of the Catholic priesthood, (who are in all countries more opposed to republican government and the liberty of man than any other sect,) established an imperial Government, and was chosen Emperor. The example of our Government, which lay contiguous, and the germes of liberty which began to sprout from an imperfect knowledge of our institutions, and an intermixture with a few of our men in their armies, in a short time produced another revolution. Iturbide was dethroned, a sentence of banishment was passed upon him; he went into exile, returned, was taken captive, and shot. Victoria was elected by the people; a republican constitution was formed, modelled in most of its leading principles in imitation of that of the United States; notwithstanding this, he had to encounter civil wars, conspiracies, treasons, and rebellions, during all his administration. Pedrazza, elected successor to Victoria, was in a short time deposed by Guerrero, who in his turn was deposed to Bustamante, and at length he was deposed and driven into exile by the modern Napoleon of the South, Santa Anna, who had waded through seas of blood, and mountains of carnage, and the perfidy of the priesthood, to empire. He abolished the Congress of the republic by a military decree, organized a tribunal composed of his own creatures in its place, merely to register his despotic decrees. He abolished the local legislatures, established military and arbitrary tribunals in their place, abolished the trial by jury, and settled down in a complete despotism of the worst kind, because it was a military one. To this prostration of the constitution that he had sworn and fought to support, the overthrowing of a government of liberty and laws, the abolishment of the trial by jury, and the establishment of a military despotism, the people of Texas objected. There was much of that Anglo-Saxon blood, descended from that immortal band of Englishmen who took their honor in one hand and their sword in the other, and obtained magna charta from King John.

Santa Anna being enraged at the thought of resistance to his decrees from a few thousand Texans, when he had fought and conquered through millions until the imperial diadem was ready to be placed upon his head, swore utter extermination from the face of the earth of all the inhabitants of Texas, and particularly of the North American or Anglo-Saxon race, not even sparing the women and children. With this view he started for Texas at the head of his hosts, to execute his infernal purpose. But, Mr. Chairman, it becomes necessary for me to leave him upon the road to Texas, and return to that gallant people, for the purpose of bringing up their history from where I left it, in the hands of the gallant Ross, before the establishment of the empire, under Iturbide. It will be held in remembrance that Ross and others received grants for their services, performed against the royal forces of old Spain, before the acknowledgment of the independence of Texas. During all the civil wars and convulsions, conspiracies and rebellions, that took place in the Mexican republic, from the establishment of their federal constitution, in 1824, the Government had been inviting foreigners from every country to go and settle in Texas, and carry as many families as possible; every inducement was held out to invite emigration thither; large bounties of land were offered for this purpose. The reason for this proceeding was obvious. Being torn to pieces by civil and central revolutions, which succeeded each other in rapid succession, their finances were exhausted, their armies were wasting away in civil wars, their convulsions were so quick and terrible that they could not spare either men or money to defend the frontiers against the habitual attacks of the Comanche and other hostile Indian tribes. Such a scourge had those Indians become to the frontier settlements and to Texas, that they at pleasure overran the Spanish towns and villages, took the inhabitants into captivity, and made servants of them. In other instances these hordes of barbarians would take possession of the frontier towns, compel the inhabitants, who were large owners of stock, to go and drive up their own horses, mules, and cattle, until these Indians would select all the most valuable of them, and drive them off, after committing acts of rapine and murder of the most atrocious character upon the inhabitants, and no help could be received from the Government of Mexico.

These enormities were repeated year after year, and no prospect of better things was in anticipation. To stop those lawless excursions of plunder, murder, and robbery, to beat back those ferocious barbarians, and protect the Spanish citizens who were the annual victims of rapine and violence, the Mexican Government adopted the only practicable mode of affording that relief that she had in her power to render. It was to make large grants of land to citizens of the United States, who would either pay money at a stipulated price into their empty coffers, or who would settle down with one, two, three, or four hundred families, upon those lands, and defend the country from the savage inroads.

I personally knew of some companies who were organized in Tennessee. They elected their representatives, sent them to the city of Mexico, publicly and notoriously, without any guile, fraud, or circumvention, to negotiate this business. I will mention the names of three of these representatives or ambassadors, who were despatched upon this mission: Colonel Andrew Erwin, who had been for a number of years a member of the North Carolina and also Tennessee Legislatures, and a gentleman of considerable talents and experience, together with Doctor Douglass and Colonel John D. Martin, a lawyer of high standing. They went, as well as the representatives from other companies, to the city of Mexico, and remained some months upon the business of this mission.

After a full examination of the constitution of 1824, establishing a Federal Government, with full guarantees for the perfect enjoyment of life, liberty, and property, and a toleration of their religion, and other rights and immunities similar to our own, a number of purchases were made, mostly for the consideration of obtaining settlers upon those lands. Grants were issued. The grantees procured settlers, and emigrated to the country. Immediately upon these events, the savage roamed no longer in hostile array over the plains of Texas. They were beat back into their own boundaries. The tomahawk and scalping-knife rested from their labors. The Spaniard sat down under his own vine and fig tree, and enjoyed his property and the fruits of his industry in peace. The Anglo-Saxon blood which had got into the country was a perfect guarantee against lawless depredation. The settlers furnished their own guns, their own provisions, their own ammunition; the Mexican Government did not even furnish so much as one flint to aid in this matter.

But the frontier settlements were secured, when Bustamante undertook to overthrow the liberties of his country, in one of the many Mexican revolutions. Santa Anna declared himself the champion of the constitution of 1824, the defender of the Federal Government. He had previous to that defeated the last mad expedition that had been sent out by old Spain to subjugate the South American provinces. He became the hero of Tampico. The patriots of Mexico looked to him to put down the tyrant Bustamante. The Texans hoisted his flag—it was considered then the flag of liberty—they took two forts with their rifles, and left Santa Anna to operate in the centre, without having a foe in their country. He did operate; he deposed Bustamante. But, to the great mortification and disappointment of all the friends of liberty throughout the world, he got into power under pretence of patriotism, and instantly overturned the constitution of his country. He started to rivet the chains of despotism by abolishing free government, and substituting a military one, in the manner I before related. He came. The splendid defence of Colonel Fanning, in destroying nine hundred of Santa Anna's men with less than half that number, and placing hors de combat several hundreds of others, will live immortal in story; and notwithstanding the warrior and his brave little band have sunk into the tomb by the blackest treachery, instead of the force of the Spaniard's prowess, yet ages unborn will drop a tear of admiration and sympathy upon the tombs of those immolated heroes, as they pass the fated spot.

Next in order is the Alamo, where the brave and gallant Crockett, with his one hundred and fifty compeers, headed by himself and Colonel Travis, made a defence against five-and-twenty hundred Mexicans, which would do honor to any general in any age. And although they fell, they fell like the strong man of old; they pulled down the pillars of Santa Anna's strength with them; for that immortal little band destroyed fourteen hundred of the enemies of liberty, and shed a lustre of immortality around their names which will secure them the brightest page in history. Their heroic deeds will be told in poetry and song to generations yet unborn, and the blood that was shed at the Alamo will generate millions of men, to fight the battles of freedom throughout the world.

A brilliant feat is yet to follow. Houston and his army were alive, and the God of battles was with them. The battle of San Jacinto soon followed, which sealed the tyrant's fate, redeeming a country from bondage, and proved to the world that tyranny and oppression cannot prevail against that indomitable Anglo-Saxon spirit which is now pervading the whole earth.

I have, Mr. Chairman, given a brief history of the rise and progress of the Texas settlement and revolution, and placed the relations in which Texas stood to Mexico in a fair point of view, so that it may be understood by the House. I shall, as briefly as possible, answer some of the objections that have been made by the honorable gentlemen from Ohio and Massachusetts to any immediate action upon this subject. The gentleman from Ohio seems to suppose, first, that the people of Texas should have waited longer, and petitioned the Mexican Government for a redress of grievances; and, secondly, that our Government should give notice to Mexico, before we acknowledge the independence of Texas. I will examine these points in the order they are presented. The Texian Government selected one of her favorite sons, Austin, whose father had obtained large grants in Texas, to go to Mexico, for the express purpose of petitioning for a redress of grievances, and such modifications in the local Government as suited the condition of the people, and which it would have been honorable to Mexico to grant. But, behold, she placed the agent in irons, kept him near twelve months in confinement; and no person could carry a petition, unless at the risk of his life, or incarceration in a dungeon. An order had already been issued to disarm the people of Texas, preparatory to their overthrow. The approaching crisis was too manifest and plain; and if I had been a Texian, I should not have carried a petition for a redress of grievances, when the certain reward was a pair of handcuffs and the four walls of a prison.

The second point my friend from Ohio has presented for our consideration is, that we should give notice to Mexico that we intend to acknowledge the independence of Texas. This is certainly a new theory. There is no precedent upon earth for it. The United States acknowledged the independence of all the South American provinces, without giving any notification to old Spain in regard to it. France, Spain, Holland, and the balance of the European Governments, acknowledged the independence of the United States, without notifying England thereof. We have only to look to the Government de facto, as has been most abundantly proven by my friend from North Carolina, [Mr. BRUNN,] and are only bound to consult our own interest, discretion, and honor. Whenever we conclude that a Government is, in fact, independent, and is capable of fulfilling its obligations, as a nation, to the rest of the nations of the earth, we can acknowledge her independence without violating the law of nations or any moral obligation. France, Spain, and Holland, acknowledged our independence before it was achieved entirely, and we acknowledged the independence of Mexico while the royal armies of Spain were in possession of the strongest forts in the country. I assert, sir, there is not now a Mexican foot that can tread upon the Texian soil. There is not one opposing man in the country. Texas, at this day, is more free than Mexico was when she received our acknowledgment, or than we were when we received that of France, Spain, and Holland. But the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MASON] complains that it is too soon—that Texas has not been independent long enough. I answer, that I have read much in the law books about the statute of limitations barring certain remedies respecting private rights, and sometimes in relation to public concerns of a municipal character; but I have never read in any book that the statute of limitations can be brought to bar an acknowledgment of the independence of a nation; and I will venture to assert that it can be found nowhere unless it is in Mason's reports. The gentleman is mistaken in another position. The President of the United States did issue orders to all the proper authorities of the Federal Government to see that the laws of neutrality were executed, and which prohibited the American people from engaging in the war between the Mexicans and Texans. So far as he was concerned, he fulfilled the law; but if the adventurous men of the West had thought proper to engage in this war, five hundred thousand men could not have guarded all the passes on a coast which is, by land and sea, a thousand miles long. It is useless to think of it. If adventurous men thought proper to engage in this revolution, without the authority of Government, there is not a man in the United States, I apprehend, who supposes that to be a cause of war with Mexico. Are not large armies of volunteers, both from England and France, at this moment engaged in the civil wars of Spain? How many foreigners engaged in the late revolution in Greece? Have not the Swiss troops been hired by every nation in Europe who would employ them? Yet this is no cause of war against their Government. It is true that war might grow out of that, or any thing else; but it might grow out of any thing else as well as that. It cannot be seriously contended that, by the law of nations, it is a cause of war; and will not, I am sure.

I will now take up the objections of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and dispose of them in their order. I have always listened to that gentleman with pleasure, and often with profit. I am confident that his ear has been greatly abused by the slanderers of Texas. He supposes that an unauthorized set of freebooters or outlaws have seized upon Texas; that the profligate and the spendthrift and fugitive from justice constitute the population. I might have mentioned that the colonies settled by Austin, Robertson, Leftwick, and many others, which were purchased in the manner I have before related, are men of the first respectability in this or any other country, some of whom would do honor to a seat on this floor, and will rank high as the benefactors of the freemen of Texas. These men carried many families of respectable standing to that country, to comply with the conditions of their respective grants. It is understood to be a fine soil, delightful climate, and admirably adapted to the cultivation of sugar, cotton, and many of the tropical fruits. It is a country where a man of industry can better his condition; and, therefore, these settlers and granters went there by express contract with the Mexican Government, and not as usurpers in any respect whatsoever.

It seems, however, that the gentleman from Massachusetts has learned from some source, which he considers satisfactory, that Texas has not, of her own soldiers, more than three hundred men, and that it was impossible for her to support her independence without foreign aid. I think that gentleman has been greatly misinformed as to this matter. At this time, she has five thousand men; but, for the present, I will consider it in that point of view. I lay it down, as a position that is incontrovertible, and which has been demonstrated by all history, that it does not depend so much upon the number of men to defend their rights, as it does upon that intellectual and moral force, and indomitable spirit, which determines that it will not submit to oppression and tyranny. Three hundred men, imbued with this spirit, are equal to a host. It was three hundred men who marched with Leonidas to the pass of Thermopylæ, and met, and, for days, defied Xerxes at the head of four millions of men; for days they arrested the progress of the greatest army Asia ever saw. This little Spartan band destroyed multitudes of their enemies, and, but for treachery, would have destroyed multitudes more. Alexander the Great, with thirty-five thousand men, became master of all Asia, containing three hundred millions of people. The celebrated retreat of the ten thousand Greeks has been the theme for poetry and song for many centuries past. The battle of the Alamo, of San Jacinto, and others, will be ranked by posterity as the marvellous events of the age, and will take their station in the chronological events of the times. But my friend from Massachusetts seems to entertain a contemptible opinion of these three hundred Texian soldiers. As contemptible as they may be, I declare, most solemnly, that I had rather be in their situation than in that of the eleven thousand Massachusetts militia who marched all around their own capital, during the last war, and would not fight at all. I should now, notwithstanding the gentleman and myself are getting to be old men, like right well to be placed at the head of these three hundred Texans, and place the gentleman at the head of the same eleven thousand militiamen, and let us take a bout or two. I am of opinion that, while his eleven thousand would be philosophizing upon constitutional scruples, and upon boundary lines, my men could play the game of decapitation to such an extent as to solve all constitutional scruples upon the subject. I would learn him not to despise numbers; for we are taught that the battle is not always to the strong, nor the race to the swift, but that the Lord of hosts has some direction in these events; and, so far as human eyes can see, there has been a most signal manifestation of it in favor of Texas.

It appears that the gentleman from Massachusetts is dissatisfied with the number of ships and guns that constitute the army and navy of Texas. I shall try to prove, by a physical rather than a logical process of reasoning, that Texas has a thousand ships and fifty thousand guns. I go upon the principle that enough is equal to a million, and that a part is equal to the whole. With the three ships and twenty-nine guns, which the gentleman from Massachusetts assigns to Texas, they have whipped and taken all the Mexican vessels that dared to venture upon the coast: therefore, they have precisely enough; and enough is equal to one thousand ships and fifty thousand guns.

What I have said, Mr. Chairman, has been for the ear of those who have thought less, and perhaps examined less, upon the subject of Texas than I have. Many have gone from my district, and settled in that country; some of them have laid down their lives in battling for their rights; others have relations yet remaining, who feel intensely for those who have gone there. This question must and will be disposed of at this session in some way. We cannot expect to satisfy all; it is needless to wait for that. If we were to wait until the morning of the resurrection, many here would not vote for the recognition. Other and far different motives than the situation of the contending parties will govern the action of a portion of this House. There are some who feel somewhat aristocratic by nature, and have no right good will for republican forms of government any how; there are others in the North and East who think that an annexation of Texas to the United States might probably follow a recognition of her independence, and that the balance of power would be thrown in that direction; others are fearful it will be a slaveholding country. We may as well meet the question at once; it has to be met, and that shortly. No one can possibly suppose that Mexico can ever reassert her power in Texas. If I were permitted to use the language of the heathen mythologists, I should say that an assembly of the gods had congregated for the express purpose of taking into consideration the wrongs and oppressions inflicted upon Texas; and that a decree had been registered in high heaven that Texas shall henceforth be free, sovereign, and independent.

Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill.

[H. OF R.]

When Mr. HUNTSMAN had concluded, The question was taken thereon, and disagreed to: Yeas 40, nays 82.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved that the committee rise; and the vote being yeas 7, nays 101—no quorum—

Mr. CAMBRELENG said there was doubtless a quorum in the hall, from the preceding vote, and he hoped the committee would, by general consent, agree to report the bill to the House. He had no amendments to offer, and any reductions of the appropriations might be made in the House.

The CHAIR then directed the House to be counted, and one hundred and twenty-five members (a quorum) were found to be within the hall.

Mr. BYNUM moved that the committee rise; and the vote being yeas 10, nays 106—still no quorum—

Mr. PARKS said he would assert that the gentleman who made the motion that the committee rise, and insisted upon dividing the House, had not himself voted either one way or the other.

The committee then rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman of the committee reported the fact to the House of their finding themselves without a quorum.

Mr. PARKS moved a call of the House.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD would suggest to the gentleman from Maine, towards whom he had the kindest feelings, that it would be better, he thought, not to press that motion at so late an hour, but to adjourn. [It was then half past twelve o'clock.]

Mr. PARKS. Would the gentleman allow him to make one observation? He would make this declaration from his own knowledge, that, when the committee decided, by tellers, on the motion to rise, the gentleman who made the motion—

The CHAIR interposed, and reminded the gentleman that this was not a debatable motion.

Mr. DOUBLEDAY said it was a question of privilege.

Mr. CALHOON, of Kentucky, moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. HANNEGAN asked for the yeas and nays, but they were not ordered; and the motion to adjourn was lost: Yeas 25, nays 96. But no quorum voting.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved a call of the House; which was ordered; and, after proceeding a few minutes,

Mr. ELMORE moved to dispense with all further proceedings thereon. Lost.

The roll having been gone through, and one hundred and twenty-four members answering to their names,

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved that the House adjourn. Lost: Yeas 37, nays 78.

The doors of the hall were then closed, and excuses having been rendered for a number of absent members, on account of indisposition,

Mr. STORER (at half past one) moved to dispense with the further proceedings of the call. Lost, without a division.

After proceeding some time further in rendering excuses,

Mr. PARKS moved the execution of the 51st rule of the House, which orders, at this stage, the absent members "for whom no excuse or insufficient excuses are made, may, by order of those present, if fifteen in number, be taken into custody, wherever to be found, by special messengers, to be appointed for that purpose."

Mr. UNDERWOOD suggested that, if that rule should be enforced, a great deal of time must necessarily be wasted in waking up the members, and bringing them to the House; and though he was as anxious to expedite the public business as any one, he really thought nothing would be gained by enforcing this rule. He therefore moved an adjournment. Lost: Yeas 43, nays 61.

The motion of Mr. PARKS, to enforce the rule, was then agreed to, without a division.

The SPEAKER then directed the Sergeant-at-arms to proceed to the execution of the duty above, and to employ as many assistants as might be necessary.

Mr. WISE moved to dispense with the further proceedings in the call. Lost.

Mr. McKAY said, understanding that there was a quorum within the hall, (124 members having answered to their names,) he moved to reconsider the vote by which the Sergeant-at-arms had been directed to execute the order.

Mr. LEWIS hoped the motion would not prevail; for those who could come there ought to be compelled to come, when others were willing to stay to transact the public business.

The motion to reconsider was disagreed to. [It was then two o'clock A. M.]

After waiting for some time,

Mr. G. LEE moved to dispense with the further proceedings of the call; and the yeas and nays having been ordered, the question was taken, and decided in the negative: Yeas 29, nays 86.

On calling over the roll this time, notwithstanding that 123 (one gentleman having been excused, from indisposition) members were recorded as being present, and the doors being locked—

Mr. CAMBRELENG said there were a number of gentlemen who had answered on the first call, but who had left before the doors were closed; and he therefore moved that the roll be again called, to see who were the absentees, as those gentlemen had not been since sent for under the 51st rule.

[It was then a quarter to three o'clock.]

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, protested against being detained in that House as a prisoner; and also insisted that the motion of the gentleman from New York was out of order, since it would be making a second call pending the first; and one call could not be made to ride over another.

Mr. CAMBRELENG insisted that the call was indispensable, for the reasons before stated; and made some further remarks on the propriety and necessity of the call.

Messrs. UNDERWOOD, WISE, VANDERPOEL, WHITTLESEY of Ohio, and PARKS, made some remarks on the subject, generally.

Mr. WISE moved to dispense with the further proceedings in the call; which was disagreed to, as was also a motion to adjourn.

Pending the foregoing proceedings, (from half past three to a quarter past four o'clock,) several gentlemen came in, and were excused on paying their fees.

Mr. HANNEGAN then renewed the motion indicated above by Mr. CAMBRELENG; but, after some remarks from Messrs. GARLAND of Louisiana, HAYNES, and HANNEGAN, the motion was superseded by another of

Mr. PATTON, to suspend all further proceedings in the call; which, after a few remarks from Messrs. McKAY, GRANGER, and ELMORE, was itself superseded by the motion of

Mr. EVANS, who moved an adjournment; which was lost; and the question recurring upon Mr. PATTON's motion, after several suggestions by Messrs. BRIGGS, LANE, and THOMAS,

Mr. TAYLOR demanded the previous question, but subsequently withdrew it.

Mr. ADAMS moved that the fines be remitted. Lost.

A number of suggestions and some desultory conversation ensued, which occupied another hour; and at length, at about half past five o'clock, the further proceedings were dispensed with, and the House again went into committee, and resumed the consideration of the civil and diplomatic bill.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON submitted an amendment proposing an increase of the salaries of the clerks in the different departments, of from 12 to 20 per cent.

Mr. CONNOR submitted an amendment to the amendment, proposing an increase of clerks in the Post Office Department and Auditor's office. Lost: Yeas 30, nays 96.

The amendment of Mr. JOHNSON was also disagreed to.

Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, moved appropriations for salaries and outfits of ministers to Prussia and Russia, and also for a plenipotentiary, when necessary, to Mexico.

Mr. EVANS moved another, for surveying the North-eastern boundary line, establishing monuments thereon, &c.

Both amendments were severally agreed to.

Mr. INGHAM submitted a proviso, that collectors of customs should receive certain fees in cases where their annual salaries do not exceed $1,000. Lost.

Mr. JARVIS moved an item of $8,000 for four historical paintings for the panels in the rotundo of the Capitol; which was agreed to.

Several other amendments were introduced pro forma, to be renewed in the House, by Messrs. PHILLIPS, JOHNSON of Virginia, PATTON, UNDERWOOD, and CONNOR; when,

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the committee rose, and reported the "harbor bill," and the above bill, to the House, as amended.

It being now six o'clock in the morning,

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved that when the House adjourn this day, it adjourn to meet at twelve o'clock.

Objection being made, Mr. J. moved a suspension of the rule. Lost.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG,

The House then adjourned, having been in session about twenty hours.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 28.

After transacting the morning business, the House proceeded to the orders of the day, and took up the

HARBOR BILL.

The amendments were read and concurred in.

Mr. PARKER renewed his motion, made in Committee of the Whole, to amend the bill by adding an appropriation of $6,963 for the improvement of the harbor of New Brunswick, New Jersey; which was rejected.

Mr. CRANE renewed his motion, made in Committee of the Whole, to amend the bill by adding an appropriation of $20,000 for the improvement of the Miami of Lake Erie.

Mr. SUTHERLAND demanded the previous question, and the House seconded the call: Yeas 71, nays 52. And the House ordered that the main question should now be taken.

And the main question, being on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, was then taken, and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 108, nays 41.

And the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading at this time.

The reading of the bill was dispensed with, and the bill, having been immediately read a third time by its title, was passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House took up the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1837, which had been reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with certain amendments; and the question was on concurring with the Committee of the Whole in their said amendments.

The amendments having been read through, the question was taken on all those to which exception had not been taken, and the same were concurred in.

The question came up on concurring with the amendment made in committee to the following item:

"For salaries of ministers of the United States to Great Britain, France, Spain, and Russia, in addition to the balance remaining of the former appropriation for 1836, $27,000;" which was amended in committee by adding after the word "Russia" the words "and outfit and salaries for ministers to Prussia and Austria," and by striking out "$27,000," and inserting "$63,000."

Mr. MERCER inquired of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means if the President had recommended a mission to Austria—that to Prussia he (Mr. M.) had no objection to.

Mr. HOWARD (chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs) said that he could answer the question probably better than the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and would do so. The proposition emanated from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and was adopted by them, to aid, as far as they could, the views of a select committee of the House, who had made a report as to the best mode of increasing the consumption of tobacco in foreign countries, and particularly Germany. He believed that the gentleman from Virginia represented in part a tobacco interest, or at least he must feel anxious for its prosperity. After the Committee on Foreign Affairs had decided on the propriety of the measure, he (Mr. H.) had inquired at the Department of State if there existed any reasons why the plan should not be carried out; and was informed that, on the contrary, our Government was, at the present time, engaged in the discussion of a delicate question, with both Austria and Prussia, arising out of treaties which we had with those Powers. What this question was, it is not now necessary to state. Mr. H.'s only object was to say, that although the proposed measure met with the concurrence of the Executive, he (Mr. H.) wished the responsibility of it to rest upon the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

TEXAS.

Mr. W. THOMPSON moved to amend the amendment by adding "and for the outfit and salary of a diplomatic agent, to be sent to the independent republic of Texas, ——— thousand dollars."

On that amendment Mr. GRIFFIN called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was loudly called for, when

Mr. CUSHING said he had but a single observation to make. This question lay in the compass of a nutshell, as a diplomatic question, in which relation only he should speak of it. He admitted and asserted that the United States possessed in all cases the right of recognising the independence of a foreign State. He admitted and asserted the right of recognition; but he maintained the time of recognition to be a question of discretion, and that discretion was to be exercised according to our own conviction of our own interest. In his judgment, the time for recognition had not arrived. He should therefore vote against the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON.]

Mr. ADAMS said he would add one word more. He objected to this proposition, on the ground that the act of recognition of a foreign Power had heretofore always been an executive act in this Government. It was the business and duty of the President of the United States;

FEB. 28, 1837.]

Texas.

[H. OF R.]

and he (Mr. A.) was not willing to set the example of giving that recognition on the part of a legislative body, without the recommendation of the Executive.

Mr. JENIFER said he hoped his friend from South Carolina would withdraw his amendment, and move it at some other stage of the bill. He felt desirous that each of those questions should stand upon their own merits. The period was too late to discuss the propriety of the appointment of a minister to Prussia and Austria. But after what had been done by the House in relation to a great interest in this country in the adoption of the report and resolution in favor of the tobacco interest, the appointment of a minister to each of those courts would go far to effect the object contemplated by the resolution, and be the means of forwarding the interests of the tobacco planters in those countries. He regretted that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEXGER] should object to the recommendation by this House of a salary and outfit for such a minister. It would not in any manner whatever interfere with the powers of the Executive, but was an expression of its opinion of the necessity of the measure. If any thing is to be done, now is the time to urge upon those Governments, as well as others, the interest which is felt on the subject of duties and restrictions on this great staple. Nothing had been done heretofore in its behalf; and when it is seen that so large a portion of our citizens, as well as the States of the Union, are interested in placing it upon a proper footing, we have a right to believe that the most favorable consequences may result. Mr. J. said he trusted that the amendment, if adopted, would not prejudice the pending motion for a salary and outfit for ministers to Prussia and Austria.

Mr. HAMER said that he hoped no one would suppose that he rose at this late period of the session to debate this question. But as he was a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which reported the resolutions in favor of the independence of Texas, and had supported those resolutions in the committee, and as no formal report, showing the condition of Texas, had accompanied the resolutions, he claimed the privilege of expressing, in a few words, the reasons for his course in relation to this matter.

He had heard several reasons urged here against recognition, which he thought were not entitled to much consideration from the House. Some gentlemen seemed to think that if we recognised Texas as an independent republic, her annexation to the United States must necessarily follow. This was not so. They were separate and distinct questions. The subject of annexation might never come before Congress; but if it should, at any future period, come up, it would be time enough to discuss it, and make a decision, when it should be presented. It ought not to be considered now. Let each of these questions stand or fall upon its own merits.

It had been said that we ought not to act in this affair, but leave it entirely to the Executive. The honorable gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] had answered that argument. The Executive had referred it to us, for the expression of an opinion on our part. He did not choose to act without some such expression. Why, then, should we send it back to him, without action on the part of Congress? Let us give an intimation of our wishes upon the subject, which will respond to the call of the President, and serve as a guide to his proceedings in future.

Gentlemen had said that the Texian army and navy were small in numbers and force, and that the population of the country was less than a hundred thousand; and for these reasons their independence ought not to be acknowledged. As to population, there was no limit in the law of nations. No writer had said how many persons it required to constitute an independent nation.

It was a matter for the exercise of our discretion, without any positive law or rule to control us. We could as well recognise fifty thousand as fifty millions; and he would not dwell upon that position.

In regard to the navy, however small it might be, it was large enough to command the seas, and to drive the Mexican navy into port; blockading the harbors of Mexico and destroying her commerce. If Texas could thus overpower her enemy on the water, her navy was large enough, until that of her adversary should be augmented.

How was it upon the land? Her army had conquered all the forces sent against her. She had triumphed over a selected army, organized for the express purpose of reducing her to subjection; had made a prisoner of the Chief Magistrate of Mexico, who headed the invading forces in person; and had been ever since in the full enjoyment of national independence. Her army was therefore large enough to maintain her independence, and there could be no necessity for its increase under existing circumstances. It was not the absolute amount of force we were to consider, but the relative force. We must look at the power of her enemy. In that point of view we should perceive that her resources and means were ample; that she was stronger than Mexico, and had, at that moment, undisturbed and undisputed control of both land and sea.

But there was another and more weighty consideration still, which demanded the attention of the House and of the country. At the last session of Congress we had passed a resolution, almost unanimously, declaring that the independence of Texas ought to be recognised whenever the citizens of that country should have an organized Government in full operation. Now, why should we go behind this resolution, and inquire into all the circumstances of the revolution, the condition of the country, and the character of the people? These subjects had been examined last year, and we had decided upon them. The House then put the recognition upon a single fact, to be ascertained thereafter. We had given to them, and to the world, a pledge that whenever they should satisfy us they had a Government, we would recognise them as an independent nation. We had encouraged them to put such a Government in motion, and to present us the evidence of its existence. They had done so. Did any gentleman doubt their having such a Government? Was not their constitution copied, in a great measure, from our own, and their public functionaries all engaged in the successful discharge of their respective duties under that constitution? Did we mean to keep the public faith inviolate? Should we redeem our pledge, which had been solemnly given? Texas had performed the condition. She presented us the proof of her having done so, and asked the fulfilment of our promise. It was for this Government now to say whether it should be faithfully and honorably fulfilled or not.

Another objection, and a most singular one, was, that a majority of the people of Texas were originally from the United States; that they were our former neighbors and friends, and some of them our kinsmen. The honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HUNTSMAN,] in one of the best speeches he had ever heard upon that floor, had explained fully the manner in which these people had become citizens of Texas. They were invited there by the Mexican Government, at a time when all their rights and privileges were guaranteed by the Mexican constitution, upon nearly the same terms as they were in the United States. They had purchased lands, and made the country their home; and it was only when an attempt had been made to wrest from them their liberties that they took up arms.

After securing their independence, organizing a republican Government, and putting it into successful operation; after a pledge given last year, by our Government, that they should be recognised, whenever this was done and shown to exist, they are now to be told that we cannot recognise them, because they were once our neighbors and friends! If they were of some other race of men; if they were Spaniards, or Frenchmen, or Turks, or of any other race than Anglo-Americans, they would be entitled to recognition! Is this fair, or reasonable, or generous? Should we deal more kindly by a stranger than by our own flesh and blood? No. If gentlemen were prepared to act upon that principle, let each one take the responsibility for himself; but, for his part, he would go for his friends in preference to either strangers or enemies.

The people of Texas, he said, were entitled to a recognition of their independence; and, so far as his vote would go, they should have that recognition promptly and freely given.

Mr. CHILTON ALLAN said that it appeared plain enough that the only question for inquiry now was whether a regular Government was established in Texas. Now, this was a fact which, he apprehended, no one could deny. It was a fact which the documents laid before the House by the Executive went clearly to establish; and this, in his opinion, was enough. He (Mr. A.) thought that, if ever the independence of Texas was to be recognised, now was the time that it ought to be done. We ought now to conciliate that people, because they were our bone and our flesh. Texas was destined to be independent, and to become a great country, and therefore no delay ought to be interposed on our part to their being recognised as independent. Why, he would ask, should we treat them worse than we should do if they were a people of a different race? There might be certain prejudices at the bottom against this just measure; but it was manifestly the will of Providence that they should be independent. Nothing could possibly resist the growth of that population; no power could possibly put them down. We therefore ought not to delay in acknowledging their independence. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] seemed to dread the possible event of annexation, as intended to follow our recognition of Texas. He (Mr. A.) must say that he exceedingly regretted to perceive the excitement of any prejudices on this point. He was free to confess there were prejudices peculiar to the North in connexion with this subject, and there were also prejudices in the South. He would not pretend to say that both sides were wise; but he (Mr. A.) would put his foot on all and every prejudice, and would take this infant nation by the hand.

Mr. HOAR explained, in reference to his remarks of the preceding evening. He denied that his opinion on this question was founded on the circumstance that the settlers in Texas were originally from this country. He held the right as strong as any man, that, if they pleased, our citizens may expatriate themselves, and become the citizens of another country. But he contended that the fact was in evidence before the House that Texas was not per se an independent country, and that it could not sustain itself for one moment without the aid it derived from this country. What a spectacle, he would ask, would be exhibited to the world, if we should acknowledge Texas as an independent nation, which derives all its claim to independence, and almost even to existence, from ourselves—whose battles are fought by us, whose ships are supplied by us, and who derive all their means and resources from us? It would be rather acknowledging ourselves as independent masters of a country which yet we recognise by treaty as appertaining to Mexico. With respect to annexation, he (Mr. H.) could only speak for himself. He knew not what was the opinion of the North; but he sincerely hoped, and firmly believed, that the North would have but one unanimous opinion in opposition to any such annexation, whenever it should be contemplated. He (Mr. H.) hoped we should never annex another foot to the territory of the United States, whether to slave States or not. We already had sufficient territory; and, if there was any thing to regret in regard to that matter, it was that we already had too much.

Mr. WHITE thought that it could be denied by no one that Texas had organized a regular Government. He differed from the honorable gentleman [Mr. HOAR] in his view of this matter, and thought our sacred honor was pledged to recognise Texas. When Mexico was recognised by the United States, she (Mexico) was not in such a good condition as Texas now is. Her Government was not so well organized; her independent existence was not so well assured; and yet we did not then hesitate to recognise her. Much more, therefore, now ought the independence of Texas to be recognised.

Mr. W. B. SHEPARD asked the gentleman from South Carolina to accept the following modification of his amendment:

“Whenever the President of the United States shall receive satisfactory evidence that Texas is an independent Power, and that it is expedient to appoint such a minister.”

Mr. SHEPARD said he moved the amendment because he thought it the most correct and proper mode of attaining the object which the gentleman from South Carolina as well as himself desired. Mr. S. was unwilling to do any thing which would seem ungenerous towards the neighboring republic of Mexico, or which would widen the breach which now exists between this country and Mexico. There is not sufficient evidence before this House to act understandingly on this subject, and precipitancy might be of no aid to Texas, and finally involve us in war with Mexico. Mr. S. said he would not yield to the gentleman in kind feelings towards the people of Texas, but he wished to make his good feelings efficient and productive of good.

[Here Mr. THOMPSON accepted the amendment as part of his proposition; and Mr. S. said he was satisfied.]

Mr. CAMBRELENG remarked that the phraseology of the amendment involved an incongruity, as it was now modified, inasmuch as the first branch set forth that “Texas” was an “independent republic,” and the second left the “evidence” of that fact to the “satisfaction” of the President, and limited his sending the agent to that fact.

Mr. MERCER moved to strike out the words “the independent republic of.”

The CHAIR ruled the motion to be out of order.

Mr. THOMPSON would compromise the difference between gentlemen, and modify the amendment by striking out the word “independent.”

After some conversation between Messrs. HOAR, THOMPSON, and CAMBRELENG, the question was taken on the amendment of Mr. THOMPSON, as modified, and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 121, nays 76.

So the amendment to the amendment of the Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The amendment of the Committee of the Whole, as amended, was concurred in, and the whole appropriation was increased to meet the charge involved in the amendment.

Mr. HARLAN then proposed, as an amendment, to add to the amendment which had been carried, a clause providing for the expenses of running the boundary line between the United States and Texas.

Mr. HARDIN said, in the treaty of 1819 between the United States and Spain, and in the more recent treaty with Mexico, the boundary line in question had been accurately defined. Surveyors were to have been appointed both by the United States and Mexico, for the purpose of running the line which had thus been defined in the treaty referred to, but, to the present day, this line had never been run. The reason which, at the time the first treaty was made, interposed to prevent the execution of this business, according to the treaty, was, that at that very period Mexico was in a state of revolt against the mother country, and it was evident that the stipulations of the treaty, as regarded this boundary line, could only be carried into effect with the Government which held de facto the sovereignty of the territory through which the line must run.

After the independence of Mexico was recognised by the United States, and the same article of the treaty was renewed in a treaty made between Mexico and the United States, still the stipulations of that treaty have, from various delays, not been carried into execution. He (Mr. H.) now wished to inquire, what power had we to send commissioners there, for the purpose of running this boundary line? With whom were our commissioners to act? What Government is de facto in the territory adjoining the United States? What Government is at this moment in the exercise of sovereignty over the territory in question? Is it Mexico, or is it Texas? He (Mr. H.) would not hesitate to say that it was Texas, because Texas has de facto full control over that territory, where her power and authority is in full operation. Such being the case, how can we at this time undertake to send commissioners to run this boundary line, when the Government with whom the treaty was made for this object is no longer master of the country, and when we have no treaty for this purpose with that Government which is de facto in possession of the territory? From these considerations, he (Mr. H.) felt bound to oppose the amendment of his honorable colleague, [Mr. HARLAN.] When the independence of Texas is acknowledged by the United States, and negotiations for this specific object shall have been entered into, then (but not till then) would be the time to send commissioners to run the boundary line.

But the Government of the United States appeared unwilling to step into the struggle between Texas and Mexico, and intended to leave them as they are. For his own part, if it was left to him, (Mr. H.) he would recognise Texas at the moment she maintained her sovereignty, for her territory was large enough to constitute a separate and a great empire. She possessed more territory than Portugal or than Holland; less, it might be, than Spain and France, but certainly more than Great Britain and Ireland. Thus her territory was large enough to form an independent nation; and, as to her Government, that also was organized and in full operation, as much as was the Government of these United States. He (Mr. H.) thought, therefore, we ought not to wait to make this recognition until Mexico consented to the act. In our own case, France acknowledged our independence four years before Great Britain abandoned her pretensions over us; and, at a posterior period, we ourselves recognised the republican Government of France, when all Europe was in arms against her, refusing to acknowledge her, and asserting, sword in hand, the claims of that worn-down family of Bourbons. Also, in after periods of the French revolution, we acknowledged, from time to time, the different Governments to which France was subjected; and why? Because they were Governments de facto.

Mr. H. then concluded by moving to strike out the appropriation for running the boundary line, because we could not run the line with Mexico while Texas was in possession of the country.

Mr. HOWARD briefly replied, explaining the provisions of the treaty, and urging the necessity for the items proposed.

Mr. HARDIN's motion was disagreed to.

Mr. McKAY moved a proviso to the clause, that the commissioners should be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Agreed to.

The original amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

The amendment moved in Committee of the Whole by Mr. STORER, for a medal to Morgan Neville, was agreed to; and the amendment moved therein by Mr. JARVIS, for filling the four panels in the rotundo of the Capitol with historical paintings, was concurred in.

VIRGINIA BOUNTY LANDS.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, offered the following amendment to the bill:

"And be it further enacted, That four thousand acres of land shall be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to satisfy military bounty land warrants issued, or to be issued, by the State of Virginia and by the United States, or either of them, on account of services in the revolutionary war, to include warrants not heretofore satisfied in full; which scrip shall be received at the several land offices of the United States, in the manner and for the purposes provided in the laws heretofore passed authorizing the issuing of certificates of scrip in satisfaction of warrants for similar services."

Mr. J. addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker: I regret the existence of a state of things which would seem to call upon me to tax the time and the patience of this House, while I attempt, in a very few remarks, to assign some of the reasons which have influenced me in offering the amendment which is now pending. Before I proceed further, I beg leave to call the attention of the House to the fact that the Committee on the Public Lands, composed as it is of some of the most experienced and vigilant members of this House, after having given to the subject that calm deliberation which its importance demands, have reported a bill, which is now in progress in this House, appropriating 500,000 acres of land to satisfy the various claims yet due to officers and soldiers of the Virginia line and upon continental establishment. Entertaining a belief that, from the quantum of business before us, that bill cannot be reached during the present session, and feeling the great injustice that will be done to the holders of those warrants by further delay, I have been induced to move the amendment now under consideration.

Mr. Speaker, in urging this subject on the attention of Congress at this time, let it be distinctly understood that we come not here to solicit a boon from your generosity; we come not here to moot a new and doubtful question; but we come with unshaken confidence, and ask you in strict justice to discharge in good faith those obligations which, from a sense of justice, you have voluntarily assumed and bound the Government to pay. What is it that Virginia asks at your hands? Is it to indemnify her for the blood and treasure so lavishly poured out and expended upon the altar of liberty during the revolutionary struggle? No, sir; these were generously and patriotically made in common with her sister States, the blessings and benefits of which continue to be enjoyed by all, and which are above all price. Sir, she comes, and, with becoming deference, asks you to discharge a debt adjudicated, defined, and settled, so far as principle is concerned, and for the payment of which she holds you bound, duly executed, and acknowledged, by the various departments of this Government. I would say, with due deference to the opinion of the gentleman opposed to this amendment, that his effort to prove that the claim ought not to be paid is made too late—the day has gone by—the Government has generously and magnanimously assumed the debt; and the only question which remains for this House to decide is, has she discharged in good faith the whole amount of the debt which she has agreed and bound herself to pay? Sir, if I can keep the attention of this House, I think I can demonstrate that she has not; that a portion of this debt remains unpaid; that it is now due; and that every consideration of justice and patriotism calls upon us to discharge it, and to discharge it now.

H. OF R.]

Virginia Bounty Lands.

Mr. Speaker, it is said, by gentlemen opposed to this bill, that the claim set up by Virginia has been settled to an amount far beyond that which was anticipated, and therefore it ought not to be paid. Sir, has not the list of pensioners, under the several pension acts, swelled far above the estimate made by the best calculators, and based, too, upon the best data which the times afford? As well might gentlemen contend that, for that reason alone, the laws should immediately cease to operate, and that the small pittance allowed to the war-worn soldier should be withheld, and that the remnant of that veteran band should be doomed to pass over the short but rugged path which remains between him and the grave in penury and want.

But, sir, I deny that the claim has been thus settled above the estimate made by a board of commissioners, who assembled to adjust and settle the claims of the respective States with the United States, as early as the year 1793. By reference to estimates there exhibited, it will be found that there were in the service of Virginia no less than twenty-one regiments, viz: sixteen on continental establishment, three of the State line proper, and two called the western regiments, besides those engaged in the navy, which amounted to some twenty or twenty-five vessels. Computing the number at five hundred to each regiment, which is believed to be below the proper estimate, and the number of persons entitled to land bounty would be found to exceed eleven thousand, all of whom were entitled, under the various laws of Virginia, passed previous to the act of 1781, which ceded to the United States the Northwest Territory. I will not detain the House by referring to the several acts of Virginia relating to bounty lands, further than to remark that, upon a reference to them, it will clearly appear that there was a most solemn engagement, on the part of the States, to remunerate her officers and soldiers, as also her seamen, in lands, of which she possessed an abundance. From the peculiar and exposed situation which Virginia occupied during that arduous and eventful struggle, she was imperiously called upon to put in requisition all her means to meet the impending danger. She not only promptly furnished her quota of men and money on continental establishment, as is well attested by her brilliant victories, attained in different and distant parts of this Union; but, in order to guard her distant limits of her own territory, she pushed her victories into the far West, thereby extending her frontier to an immeasurable distance, which could only be defended by a large military force. What, I would ask, were her pecuniary means? Without commerce or fiscal resources, without money or credit—for, like the debtor whose pecuniary embarrassments render him desperate, she had approached the verge of bankruptcy, and involved herself almost beyond the hope of redemption. What were her means for sustaining the contest? I answer, it was her vast Western domain; and, in the very nature of things, it was well understood by the State and the soldier that the fulfilment of the promised reward depended entirely on the successful termination of the contest; and hence it became necessary to promise a liberal reward in Western lands, in order to fill her ranks, and to induce her soldiers to persevere in a contest which, to say the least, was of doubtful issue.

I have said that Virginia had in the service twenty-one regiments, consisting of five hundred each, which, added to her marine and naval force, amounted to at least eleven thousand men, to whom she promised bounty lands; and, to prove this, I beg leave to send to the Clerk's table a statement from General Porterfield, and the corroborating statement from the late Chief Justice Marshall, which statements were made as early as 1793, by those distinguished individuals, whose important services, and intimate knowledge of all that appertained to the movements of the whole country, but more particularly of Virginia, place their statements beyond the hazard of contradiction:

"SEPTEMBER 16, 1822.

"Taking into consideration the number of officers and soldiers who died in the service, and thereby became entitled to land bounty from Virginia, the number who served three years, and thereby became entitled, and the number who were entitled for services to the end of the war, I think it probable there were a thousand to each regiment who were so entitled; but I state the opinion with confidence, that there were at least five hundred.

ROBERT PORTERFIELD.

"Teste: THOMAS GREEN."

"DECEMBER 8, 1834.

"I should not think there were a thousand to each regiment entitled to land bounty; but the number cannot, I think, have been short of five hundred. I allude to the regiments actually raised in the Virginia line on continental establishment.

"J. MARSHALL."

Then, sir, taking this proposition as granted, (and I think it will not be contested, even by the gentleman from New Jersey,) and how does the account stand? From a statement which I hold in my hand, it appears that, on the 16th of December, 1834, the number of warrants issued was 6,146; and that subsequent to that, and up to the present time, the additional number is 600, which, together, makes 6,746; which, deducted from 11,000, leaves a balance of 4,254 warrants due to Virginia from the United States; which, admitting them all to be due to private soldiers, at 200 acres each, would require an appropriation of 650,000 acres to cover the claim of Virginia alone; and if we add to this the fact that many of those claimants were officers, and entitled to a much larger quantity than is the soldier of the line, and the further fact of the deficiency of 10 per cent. deducted from claimants under a former appropriation, which alone amounts to about 74,000 acres, and it will be found that there remains due to the State of Virginia alone a much larger quantity of land than that proposed in the amendment which I have offered. But, sir, assuming the ground that a large number never can be established at this late day, and that others never will be claimed, it is confidently believed that the amount now proposed will be sufficient to cover all the claims for bounty lands growing out of the revolutionary war.

But it is said that the claimants have failed to prosecute their claims in due time; that, having deferred their prosecution for half a century, it is prima facie evidence that they are not well founded. To this I answer, that the claimants are not in fault; but that they have been tied down and deprived of their rights during that protracted period by the action of the Government, and have never ceased to urge their claims, at all times, when a ray of hope was presented. As early as 1784, an attempt was made to survey the lands in the military district in Kentucky; but, sir, they found them in possession of the Indians, by whom they were claimed. Upon representing those facts to the Governor of Virginia, he issued his proclamation in the following year, by which he suspended the surveys, and thereby prevented the officers and soldiers from taking possession of their land—their promised reward, and with which they would have been entirely satisfied. What next, sir? At the treaty of Hopewell, made in 1786, the whole of the country below the Tennessee river was guarantied to the Indians; the provisions of which treaty continued in force until the year 1818, when the Indian title was extinguished; after which, we all know, Kentucky would not permit the soldier to locate his warrant. Sir, the above facts are abundantly sustained by documentary evidence, and go to prove, beyond the shadow of a doubt, that their claims have been deferred by the action of the Government, over which the claimants had no control, from the year 1784 to 1818; had it been otherwise, the claimants and their heirs would not have been supplicating at your feet at this late period. It is true that a number of those claims have been located upon the Northwestern reserve; but it is equally true that the good lands in the reserve between the Miami and the Scioto rivers were very soon exhausted, and the remnant of poor lands which remained, estimated at from 5 to 25 cents per acre, was indeed no compensation at all, and not equal to the expense of procuring the title papers. Various other reasons exist which account for the delay, amongst which I will enumerate only one or two. The first is, that many of the officers and soldiers either died in the service or were slain in battle; their heirs were minors, and many of them settled in the Western wilds, remote from the seat of Government; and, with little means of information, they did not know that they were entitled. Others, more fortunately situated and better informed, did not deem it worth their attention; while another class, who attempted to prosecute these claims, were unable to establish them, in consequence of the loss of the rolls and documentary evidence, which had been unfortunately mislaid, and was not recovered until 1832. This document contained much useful information, supplied a vacuum in the testimony, and once more revived the long-deferred hopes of the war-worn soldier. But, says the gentleman from New Jersey, who stepped aside the other day from a very earnest argument on a private claim, to give us a learned disquisition upon the land laws of Virginia, the reservation made by Virginia, in her deed of cession, applied only to those regiments engaged in the conquest of the British posts of Kaskaskias and St. Vincent, and other troops upon the continental establishment. Sir, though I admit the words “upon her own State establishment” have been omitted in the deed of cession, yet it is clearly proved, by William H. Herring and others, that these words were omitted by clerical error in copying the original resolution passed by the Legislature of Virginia on the 2d January, 1781; which resolution contains the words “upon her own State establishment,” and which I ask the Clerk to read:

“That in case the quantity of the good lands on the southeast side of the Ohio, upon the waters of the Cumberland river, and between the Green river and the Tennessee river, which have been reserved by the law for the Virginia troops upon the continental establishment and upon her own State establishment, should (from the North Carolina line bearing in further upon the Cumberland lands, those were excepted) prove insufficient for their legal bounties, the deficiency shall be made up to the said troops in good lands, to be laid off between the rivers Scioto and Little Miami, on the northwest side of the Ohio river, in such proportions as have been engaged to them by the laws of Virginia.”

Thus, sir, it is shown, most obviously, that Virginia intended to make ample provision for all her troops; and although the fastidious economist may tax his ingenuity to husband a dollar, and the technical lawyer, by his special pleading and forensic eloquence, may attempt to induce the House to avail itself of advantages growing out of a limited and narrow construction, or clerical errors, yet I cannot believe that those efforts can be made available when addressed to the Congress of the United States. Sir, will any gentleman believe, who has made himself acquainted with the policy pursued by Virginia in regard to her troops, the liberal course of legislation, and the fatherly care with which she watched over their interest, that she would in a moment, as it were, have forgotten all the sacred pledges made to her soldiers, and that, too, when about to divest herself of all her vast and incalculable means? Sir, she did not design to do it, and the records of the day prove it. But, Mr. Speaker, suppose, if you please, that I am wrong in this position; and that Virginia, in her great anxiety to promote the general interest, at a period of doubtful issue and awful hazard, when our lacerated country was bleeding at every pore; suppose, I say, that she did omit to make provision for her soldiers on State establishment, is this the time to urge those quibbles? Has not Congress long since adjudicated and settled that question, by a payment of all but a remnant of the claim, and that, too, at a time when our Treasury was embarrassed and our country in debt? Are we now to be told, at the time when the country is prosperous beyond all example, with our Treasury overflowing by the proceeds of those very lands which were generously surrendered by Virginia as a sacrifice upon the altar of her country, are we now to be told that the whole course of legislation on this subject has been woong; that the pledged faith of the nation is to be forfeited, the claims of Virginia rejected, and the last hope of her soldiers annihilated? If so, we have indeed fallen upon unpropitious times. Sir, it was the army of Virginia, commanded by General Clarke, that secured to us the Western country; by the capture of the British posts at Kaskaskias and St. Vincent the way was opened which led to the far West, to that country the territories of which extend from the Alleghanies to Oregon, and from the Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico—a country combining advantages of soil, climate, mineral wealth, and commercial facilities, unequalled by any known to civilized man; the proceeds arising from the sales of which have already swelled the amount in your Treasury to an extent which, according to the theory of some gentlemen, endangers the very existence of our political system. Sir, I repeat that this country was conquered, inch by inch, by the Virginia troops, a remnant of whom still linger on the brink of the grave, and ask you to attend to their long-deferred claims. I will only add, in conclusion, that if aught is done for them, it should be done quickly; the ravaging hand of time waits not upon the tardy movements of this Legislature. Almost every newspaper received announces the fall of some one of these old veterans, and every such announcement is but the record of a nation's ingratitude. While we are engaged in a mercenary scramble for the surplus revenue, and a dividend of the public lands, we permit the war-worn veteran, at the expense of whose blood the treasure was acquired, to pass down to the grave, unwept, unhonored, and unsung. Sir, could the traditions of those days be developed, could the story be now told, we would hear of scenes of thrilling interest, and disinterested chivalry, which would place in the shade many of those acts of heroism on the part of our country, at the recital of which every bosom is warmed with pride for our country and gratitude for our soldiers.

Mr. CHAPIN now moved the previous question.

Mr. STORER inquired if the effect of the previous question would cut off all his amendments.

The CHAIR replied that it would cut off all amendments except those which had been ingrafted on the bill by the House.

Cumberland Road—West-Point Academy.

[FEB. 28, 1837.]

The demand for the previous question was seconded by the House: Yeas 60, nays 65.

The question recurring upon ordering the main question to be put,

Mr. VINTON inquired of the Chair the effect of this motion being decided in the negative.

The CHAIR replied, that if the House refused to order the main question to be put, it would put the subject from before the House for this day.

Mr. STORER and Mr. HAWES severally asked for the yeas and nays, but the House refused to order them; and the question was carried, without a division; and the bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading this day.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

On motion of Mr. CORWIN, the committee took up the bill to provide for continuing the construction and for the repair of certain roads, and for other purposes, during the year 1837.

The bill having been read through, Mr. CORWIN proposed a substitute; which the committee agreed to.

Mr. CRARY moved, as an additional section, an amendment providing for the payment to the proper authorities of the State of Michigan of the sum of five per cent. on the nett proceeds of the sales of the public lands lying in the said State, from the 1st of November, 1835, to the 1st of November, 1836, to be applied to the completion of public roads, &c.

After some remarks from Messrs. CRARY and VINTON, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CRANE moved, as an additional section, an amendment providing that the construction of the said road should be placed under the direction of the board of public works in the State of Ohio, with power to change the location of the said road in certain places.

After some remarks from Messrs. CRANE, LANE, and CORWIN, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KENNON moved an amendment, as an additional section, appropriating $150,000 for building a bridge, &c., across the Ohio river, at Wheeling, to connect the said road in the States of Virginia and Ohio; such bridge not to be erected till it has been ascertained, by competent engineers, that the navigation of said river would not be obstructed thereby.

The subject was debated by Messrs. KENNON, HARDIN, MERCER, DENNY, and VINTON.

Pending the question,

The hour of three having arrived, the House took a recess.

EVENING SESSION.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the engrossed bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1837, having been read a third time, and the question being on its final passage—

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to recommit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with instructions to strike out the following: "Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to extend to collectors at such other ports where a surplus of emoluments has been accounted for and paid into the Treasury in 1832, the privilege granted to the collector of New York, to take effect from the same period, of distributing among their clerks the surplus fees."

After some remarks from Messrs. CAVE JOHNSON, CAMBRELENG, and A. H. SHEPPERD,

Mr. HAYNES demanded the previous question; which was seconded: Yeas 82, nays 49.

And the main question was ordered to be put.

And the main question, being on the final passage of the bill, was taken, and decided in the affirmative. So the bill passed.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

The House then again went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. PHILLIPS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill to provide for continuing the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, and for other purposes.

The amendment pending was an appropriation of $150,000 for the erection of a bridge, on the line of said road, across the Ohio, at Wheeling, moved, as an additional section, by Mr. KENNON; and,

After some remarks from Messrs. VINTON, CHAMBERS of Pennsylvania, STORER, MASON of Ohio, VANDERPOEL, KENNON, HARDIN, and DENNY, the amendment was disagreed to, without a division.

Mr. WEBSTER moved an amendment, having reference to the location of the road from Springfield, Ohio, to Richmond, Indiana, through Dayton and Eaton, Ohio, and addressed the committee at some length in support of the proposed route; when the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. CORWIN moved the usual provision, that the expenditures for said road should be deducted from the two per cent. fund of the States through which it passes. Agreed to.

Mr. GRAVES moved an amendment making an appropriation of $220,000 for the purchase of the Louisville and Portland canal, and addressed the House at some length in support of the amendment; when it was disagreed to.

Mr. MARTIN moved an amendment providing that the two per cent. fund out of the proceeds of the sales of public lands in Alabama shall be hereafter expended under the direction of the Legislature of said State.

After some remarks by Messrs. MARTIN and CHAPMAN in its support, the amendment was disagreed to.

The bill was then laid aside, to be reported to the House.

WEST-POINT ACADEMY.

The committee then took up the bill to provide for the support of the Military Academy of the United States for the year 1837.

Several verbal amendments were made, on the suggestion of Mr. INGERSOLL.

Mr. SMITH moved to strike out the following appropriation, which, he said, was a new item in the bill:

"For forty horses for instruction in light artillery and cavalry exercises, $10,000."

After some remarks from Messrs. SMITH, INGERSOLL, CAMBRELENG, HAWES, and BUNLAP, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKAY moved to amend the bill by striking out the following item:

"For the erection, as per plan, of a building for recitation and military exercises, in addition to the amount heretofore appropriated, $30,000." The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRANGER moved a reconsideration of the vote, having voted in favor of the amendment to strike out under an apprehension that the appropriation was for a different purpose.

Mr. SMITH said he could not, in justice to the committee and to the country, consent to have the remarks of the honorable gentlemen from New York and Pennsylvania [Messrs. CAMBRELENG and INGERSOLL] go forth without a few words of reply, even though it were late in the evening, and all of the committee are anxious to avoid discussion upon this and all other subjects. I will be brief as practicable, and confine myself to such suggestions only as the remarks of the two gentlemen, to whom I have adverted, have rendered absolutely proper to be now made.

And first, sir, I beg leave to call the attention of the committee to the paragraph of this bill proposed to be stricken out. It is an appropriation of thirty thousand dollars, in addition to the amount already appropriated, for the erection of a building within which to exercise and drill the cadets at West Point. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. INGERSOLL] who reported this bill, and who never engages himself in any subject without making himself entire master of all its parts, will do the committee the justice, I trust, to inform them, when he shall next take the floor, what the amount heretofore appropriated for this same building, in which to exercise the cadets, actually has been; that, if we decide on the propriety of having such a building, we may also know how much we have heretofore taken from the public Treasury for its erection, and to what sum the thirty thousand dollars now proposed will be an addition.

The honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] says this proposed building is to protect the cadets during the inclemency of the winter season, when the snow is from two to six feet deep; and has urged upon the committee the extreme hardship of requiring the cadets to perform their exercises in the open air in such an inclement and cold region as that where West Point is situated. Sir, if the gentleman would extend his inquiries somewhat further North or East, he would find that at points where the winters are still more inclement than at West Point, and where the snow lies for months in succession from two to eight feet deep, a very large and useful and respectable portion of the citizens not only incur the snows and storms of winter by day without workshops or buildings to protect them, but actually pursue the business of months amid such snows and storms, without a roof, or board, or so much as a shingle to cover and protect them by either day or night, and do not dream of murmuring. But, forsooth, the young cadet at West Point, who goes there to acquire an education for himself, who is clothed and fed, and even paid for his time, by the Government while acquiring his education, cannot endure the atmosphere of West Point, without a magnificent building to shield him during the few hours in the week, while in the act of being drilled, as part of his education! The Government is called upon to appropriate thirty thousand dollars, in addition to what has already been appropriated for the purpose, to protect the young cadet, who is preparing to be a soldier, against this temporary and yet most salutary exposure, as I esteem it. Sir, is Congress prepared thus to pamper the effeminacy of these young gentlemen, at such an expense, too, upon the public Treasury? Is it not enough to educate them for nothing, and to pay them for their time while you are educating them, and that you provide for their comfortable subsistence, comfortable lodgings, and all the ordinary comforts, not to say numerous luxuries of life, without attempting to keep them forever within doors, to be raised like children? I am opposed to it; and I think, whenever the people of this nation shall be made acquainted with the fact, they too will be opposed to it.

The gentleman from New York says the exposure of the cadets is very great, and that, among other duties, they are required to perform camp duties for three months in the year. It is true, sir, that the law of Congress imposes three months' camp duty upon the cadet. But the same tender spirit of guardianship which has suggested the expediency of housing the cadets from the atmosphere while performing their drill duties and exercises has in some way construed away one third of the law of Congress upon this subject; and, instead of three months' camp duty, as the law requires, the cadets are required, by the rules and regulations of the institution, to camp out only two months of the year; and for this purpose, sir, every species of camp utensils and camp furniture that Government money can purchase is provided for them; and this same duty, thus pictured forth here by the gentleman from New York as a severe hardship, is in fact so tempered to the cadets as to become a mere luxury—a matter of absolute preference among the cadets. The gentleman from New York will find, by the rules and regulations of the Academy, the months of July and August, or of August and September,* are selected for this camp duty: seasons of the year, sir, when it is absolutely a luxury and privilege for the cadets to leave their close quarters and confined rooms, to perform duty out door, and to spend the nights in their well-furnished camps. Sir, the hardships and exposures of the cadets are nothing compared with those of the generality of our fellow-citizens in the North, in their ordinary pursuits; and yet we are called upon to add to their luxuries—two hundred and fifty dollar horses to ride, splendid camp equipage to protect them from the dews and damp air of summer, and magnificent buildings to shield them in their winter exercises. I think it is high time for Congress, and for the people of this nation, to reflect seriously upon these matters, and to inquire with somewhat of particularity into the character of this institution.

But the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. INGERSOLL] has volunteered to put the reputation of the West Point Academy for morality in issue at this time, and sets it out in eloquent description, as pre-eminently pure and irreproachable in this respect.

Sir, does not the honorable gentleman know that the history of this institution, within a few years back only, bears quite different testimony upon this subject? Does not the gentleman know the fact—a fact well substantiated by the Register of Debates in your library—that only a few years since the Government was forced into the necessity of purchasing up, at an expense of ten thousand dollars, a neighboring tavern stand, as the only means of saving the institution from being overwhelmed and ruined by the gross immoralities of the cadets? Is not the gentleman aware that the whole argument urged to force and justify the Government into this purchase was, that the moral power of the Academy was unequal to the counter influences of the neighboring tavern? And are we to be told, sir, that this institution stands forth in its history pre-eminently pure, and above comparison with the institutions that exist upon the private enterprise and munificence, and thirst for knowledge, that characterize our countrymen? I make these suggestions, and allude to these facts, not voluntarily, and from a wish to create a discussion upon either the merits or demerits of the Academy. When I made the proposition to strike from this bill the ten thousand dollars proposed to be appropriated for the purchase of horses, I neither intended nor desired to enter into a discussion of the institution. I have not now spoken, except upon the impulse given by the remarks of the gentlemen from New York and Pennsylvania; and now, instead of going into the facts that do exist in relation to the Academy, I can assure gentlemen that I have but scarcely approached them. I have been willing, and am now willing, to have these facts brought to light at another time, and upon a proper occasion that will occur hereafter, and leave the people of this nation to judge of them dispassionately. A report upon the subject of this institution will be made shortly, as the honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HAWES] has assured the House. From that report, all will be able to form an opinion as to the policy of the institution in its present shape and under its present discipline. That some grave objections exist to both its shape and discipline, I think all will agree. But I wish not to discuss either at this time. Let us know, however, and let the country know, something about the expensive buildings now in progress at West Point, before we conclude to add this further appropriation of thirty thousand dollars to the expenses of the institution; and, while I am up, I will call the attention of the honorable gentleman who reported this bill to another item in it, which embraces forage for horses among other matters; and I wish him to specify to the committee what proportion of the sum of over thirteen thousand dollars, contained in this item, is based upon the proposed supply of forage. We have stricken out the appropriation for purchasing horses, and another part of the bill provides forage for the officers' horses; hence a portion of the item now adverted to should probably be stricken out.

After some remarks from Messrs. HAMER, CAMBRELENG, INGERSOLL, McKEON, and JENIFER, the question was taken, and the House determined to reconsider the vote: Yeas 68, nays 62.

The question recurring on the motion to strike out the clause, Mr. DUNLAP moved to amend the clause by providing that the sum to be expended for this purpose should not exceed the amount appropriated.

After some remarks by Messrs. DUNLAP, HAWES, VANDERPOEL, HAMER, INGERSOLL, and HUNTSMAN, the question on the amendment of Mr. DUNLAP was taken, and rejected.

The subject was further debated by Messrs. GHOLSON, HUNTSMAN, and G. LEE;

When, the question being taken, the motion to strike out was decided in the negative: Yeas 56, nays 79.

So the clause was not struck out.

Mr. BOND moved to amend the bill by striking out the following:

"For the erection of a barn and public stables, $1,000."

Which motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. McKAY, at the suggestion of Mr. HAWES, so much of the item (lines 17 and 18) as was for the forage of horses was stricken out.

Mr. PATTON moved to amend the bill by adding an appropriation of $1,000 for the purchase of law books for the Congress Library.

Mr. P. explained that his reason for proposing the amendment here was, that it had been cut off from the civil list bill, to which it properly belonged, by the previous question.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DUNLAP moved to strike out the words "as per plan," in the 46th line. Rejected.

Mr. McKAY moved to strike out the appropriation of $2,000 for the expenses of the board of visitors to said Academy. Rejected.

There being no further proposition to amend this bill, it was laid aside.

INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the bill making an additional appropriation for the suppression of Indian hostilities for the year 1837.

After some remarks from Messrs. BELL and CAMBRELENG, the bill was laid aside without amendment.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the committee rose and reported the three last-mentioned bills to the House.

The House concurred with the Committee of the Whole in their amendments to the Cumberland road bill.

Mr. WEBSTER renewed his motion, made in Committee of the Whole, in regard to the direction of a portion of this road.

Mr. HANNEGAN demanded the previous question; which was seconded by the House: Yeas 74, nays 51.

And the main question was ordered to be now taken.

And the main question, being on the engrossment of the bill, was taken, and decided in the affirmative.

And the bill having been ordered to a third reading at this time, and the question being on its final passage—

Mr. BOND said his attention had been called to the journal of the House in relation to the bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road, passed at the last session. He said his name there appeared recorded in the negative, but that he had not so voted. Mr. B. said he did not attach any blame to the Clerk, as the error was no doubt accidental; but he felt himself bound to notice the mistake, and he thought this the appropriate moment to do it.

Having done so, Mr. B. expressed the hope that the House would now indulge him with the yeas and nays on the present bill; and they were ordered accordingly.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill, and it was decided in the affirmative: Yeas 89, nays 59.

So the bill was passed.

The House then took up the bill making appropriations for the suppression of Seminole hostilities, which was ordered to a third reading at this time.

And the bill was read a third time, and passed.

WEST POINT ACADEMY.

The House took up the bill making appropriations for the Military Academy at West Point. The amendments made in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

Mr. CHAPIN demanded the previous question; which the House seconded; and the main question was ordered to be now taken. And the main question, being on the engrossment of the bill for a third reading, was taken, and carried. And, having been ordered to a third reading now, the bill was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. BRIGGS moved an adjournment, but withdrew the motion at the request of

Mr. RENCHER, who moved that the engrossed bills on the Speaker's table be taken up and read a third time; which motion was agreed to.

The first bill in order was the bill to provide a uniform rule for the pay and mileage of members of Congress.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, moved to lay the same on the table.

Mr. RENCHER called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. VINTON said it was very evident that the rule in relation to the transmission of bills from one House to the other would have to be suspended, and that the House must do to-morrow the business which it could not get through with to-night. He moved an adjournment; (it being now ten o'clock.)

Mr. REED asked the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 55, nays 80.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Some bills were received from the Senate; and, on motion of Mr. SLADE, at a few minutes past 10 o'clock, The House adjourned.

last, to inquire whether the several banks employed for the deposit of public money have employed an agent, to reside at the seat of Government, to transact their business at the Treasury Department; also, the character of such business; the compensation received by said agent; whether employed at the request or through the procurement of the Treasury Department; whether he receives compensation from the Treasury Department, &c., reported thereon at length, concluding with the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, (as the opinion of this committee,) That the several banks employed for the deposit of the public money have not all, or any of them, by joint or several contract, employed an agent, to reside at the seat of Government, to transact their business with the Treasury Department.

2. Resolved, (as the opinion of this committee,) That no agent for the transaction of business between the deposit banks and the Treasury Department has been employed at the request or through the procurement of said Department.

3. Resolved, (as the opinion of this committee,) That the business of the deposit banks with the Treasury Department is not conducted through any agent, but is transacted directly with the Secretary of the Treasury or some officer of the Department.

4. Resolved, (as the opinion of this committee,) That no agent, in any way connected with the public deposits, since the removal of said deposits from the Bank of the United States, has received any compensation from the Treasury Department.

5. Resolved, (as the opinion of this committee,) That several of the deposit banks have employed an agent, to reside at the seat of Government, for the purpose of receiving and transmitting information affecting the interests of said banks, both from the Treasury Department and other sources, and transmitting public documents; that agent is Reuben M. Whitney, who receives such salary from said banks as they annually deem his services worth.

Which said resolutions lie upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. H. JOHNSON, from the same committee, believing that the committee has drawn erroneous conclusions from some of the testimony, presented the grounds of his difference in writing, and his reasons for not concurring in the report of the majority, remarking that, agreeing with the views of the majority in the greater part of their report, he regrets the difference of opinion on points to which he has alluded.

Mr. PEYTON, from the same committee, submitted, at length, the views of the minority, accompanied by a resolution that the same, with the accompanying documents, be inserted in the journal of the House, as containing the views of the minority of this committee; and moved that the report of the minority of said committee be committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with instructions to report a bill prohibiting in future, under sufficient penalties, the communication of secret intelligence, by the Secretary of the Treasury, for the benefit of the deposit or any other banks, which concerns all banks alike.

In presenting the above report,

Mr. PEYTON rose and said: I rise, Mr. Speaker, to present a report from the minority of a select committee of which the honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARLAND] is chairman. I offer the paper which I hold in my hand, as containing the views of the minority of that committee, from a majority of whom a report has just been made by the chairman. In reference to the report of the minority, I wish to submit a motion to the House, directing that it be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with instructions to report a bill prohibiting in future, under sufficient penalties, the communication of secret intelligence, by the Secretary of the Treasury, for the benefit of the deposit or other favorite banks, which is withheld from others, and which concerns all the deposit banks alike.

The CHAIR said the gentleman from Tennessee must obtain the leave of the House.

No objection being raised in any quarter,

Mr. PEYTON was proceeding. Mr. Speaker, upon the proposition—

The CHAIR. The gentleman will forward his proposition to the Chair.

Mr. PEYTON having done so, was again about to proceed, when

The SPEAKER inquired if the gentleman included the report of the majority also in his motion to commit.

Mr. PEYTON replied in the negative, and proceeded. Mr. Speaker, upon the proposition which I have sent to the Chair, I wish briefly to state the reasons which have influenced me, as one of the minority, to make the motion.

It appears, sir, from the evidence taken in this case, that there is resident in this city a secret agent of many of the most important of the deposit banks, who is in the habit of communicating to those banks secret information which he obtains from the Secretary of the Treasury, and from the Treasury Department, which, in my opinion, is unauthorized and unjustified by any law, principle, rule of reason or of justice, and tends, also, in an eminent degree, to jeopard the safety of the public money, to encourage corrupt combinations for the purpose of speculation, and to destroy the equality of benefits which should be extended to all the citizens and all the banks of the United States alike. I will name one instance, which must force itself strongly upon the mind of the most incredulous, as well as upon that of the most prejudiced partisan.

This agent, Reuben M. Whitney, obtained information of the expected issuance of the Treasury order of July 11, requiring specie payments for the public lands, and communicated that information, as a matter of favor and indulgence, to his distant friends; while, sir, Congress, then in session, and every individual member of it, as far as we have any information, were permitted to remain in profound ignorance of the intention or design of issuing such an order! Yes, sir, this "Treasury familiar," as he has been appropriately styled, obtained possession of this cabinet secret about the last of June or first of July—Congress adjourning upon the 4th—and informed, for one, the cashier of the Girard Bank, at Philadelphia, of the intended issuance of that order. And what makes the case still more aggravated and suspicious is this: that when the question was propounded to the witness, who communicated to his friends and partners in speculations in the public lands, and bank stocks, and Treasury certificates, whether he was not a party interested in these transactions, the witness stood mute, and refused to answer the question! And, sir, shall it be tolerated in this land, shall it be sanctioned by this House, that a man irresponsible to the laws and unknown to the country, a secret spy in the Treasury, shall obtain information of an intended measure, which was at least a doubtful exercise of power on the part of the Executive, involving the currency, trade, and commerce of the country, and the value of every species of property of the citizens of these United States; and that he shall use that information as a matter of speculation, in connexion with others, and those others high officers of this Government; and yet the American Congress not have the independence, not have the political honesty, to interpose its shield and protect the Treasury of this nation, and the people of this country, from such abuses of power? Why, sir, when it was proposed to forward interrogatories to the deposite banks and the receivers of public money, as to the secret emoluments of this agent, I propounded, or proposed to be propounded, a question to this effect: whether the said agent was not engaged, directly or indirectly, with any officer or officers of the Government, in speculations, and whether he did not derive the larger part of his emolument in that way, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HAMER,] one of the members of the committee, moved to strike out the words "any officer or officers of the Government," wherever they occurred; which motion was sustained by a majority of the committee, but only by a majority of one, the honorable chairman [Mr. GARLAND] voting, as he did on almost every occasion, for the most liberal investigation into what we were directed to inquire; a most important branch of which was, as to the amount of the agent's compensation. Yet the majority of the committee chose to give so rigid and technical a construction to the resolution under which we were authorized to act, that we were denied the right of proving to this nation that Whitney, in connexion with high officers of the Government, was engaged in speculating upon this very Treasury order of the 11th of July, by drawing specie from the deposite banks, and selling it as a matter of merchandise, instead of applying it to the purposes of Government. That inquiry was suppressed by the majority of the committee, upon the motion of the gentleman before referred to, because, no doubt, the majority thought they had not the power to reach any gentleman connected with the Government, unless he was in the Treasury Department! notwithstanding that every individual may have formed a partnership, a league of alliance, offensive and defensive, in this war upon the public treasure, with R. M. Whitney. That, sir, was the construction given to the resolution of the House by the majority of this committee.

Mr. CUSHMAN here sprung up, and announced that he rose to a question of order.

Mr. PEYTON. Did the gentleman move the previous question? because, if not, I call him to order.

Mr. CUSHMAN said he understood the majority of the committee had made their report, which was ordered to be printed and lie on the table. The minority of that committee, he understood, wished also to present their views, and, having the leave of the House, had done so, making a different motion for its disposition. Now, the point he raised was this: whether it was proper that the minority of the committee should go into facts laid before them, until the whole proceeding, as contained in both reports, should come up before the House.

The CHAIR decided against the point, and that the gentleman from Tennessee was strictly in order.

Mr. CUSHMAN again rose, and was about to proceed, when

Mr. PEYTON said, Mr. Speaker, I shall object to the gentleman's being heard, because I have always understood the previous question is debatable. [Laughter.]

Mr. CUSHMAN. I ask the gentleman if he intends to insinuate any thing from my course in this House?

Mr. PEYTON. Mr. Speaker, I do not know the operation of the previous question as well as that gentleman does. I had supposed that the sphere of its operations was circumscribed to the limits of this House; but, sir, I am just informed that the gentleman moved the previous question on my friend from North Carolina, [Mr. GRAHAM,] in the late election in the Buncombe district. [Mr. C. sent documents, under his frank, during the canvass between Graham and Newland, in behalf of the latter.] But, sir, the previous question was cut off in that instance by my friend from North Carolina.

Mr. CUSHMAN. The gentleman is mistaken; I have not moved the previous question.

The CHAIR. Order! The gentleman from Tennessee is on the floor.

Mr. PEYTON. Mr. Speaker, if the previous question is settled, I will—

The CHAIR. The previous question is not before the House.

Mr. PEYTON. But its personification just has been: [Much laughter.] This will be understood by a word of explanation. A distinguished gentleman from Virginia last session described Mr. C. as the "very personification of the previous question," and he has ever since gone, in the House, by that name. The gentleman is generally on the look-out for the eye of the Chair on particular occasions, and it has been whispered aside that, &c., vice versa.—Rep.

Mr. P. proceeded. Mr. Speaker, I was proceeding, as well as I could make myself understood, and it is very difficult for me even to speak so as to be heard; owing to a severe cold and accompanying hoarseness, in consequence of attending your night sessions—I say, sir, I was proceeding to show that there was an agent here; that he was vested with great power; trusted with secrets; suspected of being engaged in heavy speculations, and in all probability, from the evidence, connected in those speculations with the officers of this Government; all of which tended to corrupt its purity and to squander the treasure of the nation; and that such abuses required and called aloud for the exercise of the power of the House to shield the public treasure from further loss and speculation.

Sir, we have established that this agency exists; that Reuben M. Whitney is the principal agent; we have also shown the nature and objects of this agency, and I have just glanced at some of the duties which appertain to his station. What is the amount of his compensation? This is a question which, it will be seen, is difficult if not impossible to answer, because the agent himself and those connected with him refuse to disclose the facts. What is the character of his business? It is no easy matter to give a specific response to this inquiry, his powers are so broad and his business so general. I have alluded to one or two branches of his business, such as giving information of the forthcoming of the Treasury circular of the 11th July; joining his friends at a distance and officers of the Government in converting that circular into a matter of merchandise, &c. I will now allude to another branch of said agent's business, independent of his speculations for himself and his friends: that Reuben M. Whitney has friends and partners high in office, high in power, who are so strongly linked with him, so closely allied to him, that to separate them would be like separating the Siamese twins—it would be death to both; and hence they are bound to make common cause with him—compelled to protect him. Of this there can no longer remain a doubt. Look at the facts, sir.

I propounded to Mr. Whitney this interrogatory while he was on his examination before the committee: In drawing up your protest, were you aided by, or did any member of this committee, or of the House, give you any advice, assistance, or opinion, in relation to said protest? The witness answered that, so far as the members of the committee were concerned, he was not assisted, aided, nor counselled. But, when I came to press the other branch of the inquiry upon him, in all its forms and shapes, he shrunk from the investigation, said the question was "inquisitorial," and therefore would not answer it. He could not deny but that his protest was drawn up in full consultation with some members of this House; else why did he answer one branch of the interrogatory, and refuse to respond to the other?

Again, sir: when called upon to disclose who were his partners in these speculations, derivable, and derivable alone, through his power, as an agent or officer of the deposite banks, he demurred, and refused to answer.

When questioned as to whether he had or had not, since this investigation commenced, written to those at a distance, who were supposed to be in possession of facts which might lead to important developments, making important communications to them on public matters, affecting the treasure of the country and the legislation of Congress, and whether he did not, in conclusion, mark these letters as "confidential," and holding up threats of ruin if they dared disclose them; to that question he also stood mute, and refused to answer.

But, sir, there was one gentleman of the committee which the delicacy of Mr. Whitney, though on oath before the committee, would not suffer him to mention, whom he seems to have consulted; but it eked out in the investigation before the House. When asked whether any members of the committee, or of the House, did or did not counsel him in drawing up his protest, he swore that, from motives of delicacy, he would not approach the members of the committee, and had carefully abstained from all conversation with them. Yet, sir, how does it turn out in evidence? Why, it was disclosed by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FAIRFIELD,] in his evidence before the House, that, upon a certain occasion, he called upon the gentleman from New York, [Mr. GILLET,] and found him and Reuben M. Whitney in close conclave together, after night, in the room of the gentleman from New York, and that he [Mr. FAIRFIELD] thereupon went away, leaving them alone in their glory! Now, Reuben must have pretty suddenly changed all his ideas of propriety, or "delicacy," as he himself terms it, to have become bold enough to force himself upon a member of the committee.

Why, Mr. Speaker, I unhesitatingly assert that he may have employed counsel most learned in the law, and skilled in all the rules of criminal jurisprudence, deeply read, and pre-eminently acute and ingenious in quibbles and technicalities, but he never could have got one more true to him than has been that very gentleman from New York, [Mr. GILLET,] a member of the select committee. And I will say for him that he has been consistent throughout the whole of the investigation. Why, sir, I propounded a question of this character, to which he objected. Having been informed by a gentleman, well known here, of the first respectability and highest honor, residing in Philadelphia, that the cashier of the Union Bank of Tennessee, coming to the city of Washington to transact business in relation to his bank with the Treasury Department, had better sense than to call upon the Secretary of the Treasury, the mere man of straw, like Maelzel's automaton, in the hands of Reuben Whitney, but that he passed him by, and, approaching the source of power in that Department, went directly to Whitney, taking care to deposite to his credit or in his hands a bill or check for a thousand dollars, or some large amount of money. That he called in the morning, and Whitney told him he had arranged his business to his satisfaction; that the favors which he sought were extended. Unfortunately there was not time from the 28th of January, when the information reached me, to get Mr. Van Wyck's (the cashier of said bank) testimony. This, however, I do know, from the highest sources, that he (Van Wyck) has said that he gave Whitney a check or note to pay him for his services. Now, sir, is or is not this a case of bribery? It must be so, sir. It could not have been otherwise; for his influence he received the money. I do not reflect on Mr. Van Wyck. I asked him, (Whitney,) is it true or false? But when I propounded the question he was mute—he was dumb.

[Mr. P. being called on by a member, [Mr. BEALE,] here explained how he came in possession of the above facts, by a letter received on the 28th of January, from a gentleman in Philadelphia, and that he drew out the facts conveyed in that letter in a series of interrogatories which he propounded both to R. M. Whitney and to the late cashier of the Union Bank of Tennessee, A. Van Wyck.]

Now, sir, what does this establish? Does it not establish Whitney's power, and his abuse of that power, by receiving a bribe of a thousand dollars for the exercise of it? Whitney could not, dare not, attempt to gain-say the fact. I instantly, sir, proposed the inquiry to be sent to the witness at Nashville, and have him examined upon the facts, but the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILLET] objected, and recorded his vote against it upon the yeas and nays, as did the gentlemen from Maine [Mr. FAIRFIELD] and New Hampshire [Mr. PIERCE,] suppressing, or attempting to suppress, that important branch of the inquiry; but we succeeded. Nor was this all. When it was agreed that the interrogatories I had framed should be propounded to Mr. Van Wyck, the gentleman from New York was found alone voting against his being summoned. I have since received a letter from a gentleman of known honor and integrity, at Nashville, confirming the statements contained in the letter from Philadelphia, and expressing the regret of the writer at Mr. Van Wyck's absence at New Orleans. I have, however, the letter from the gentleman to whom I have alluded, confirming the facts in every particular, and stating that the cashier (Mr. Van Wyck) expressed his surprise that the other bank at Nashville did not employ Mr. Whitney.

Mr. P. continued. Sir, the Secretary of the Treasury travels a long way out of the issue, particularly according to the strict construction put upon the resolution of the House by the gentleman from New York, and passes a high eulogium upon Reuben M. Whitney with regard to political transactions. He says, in substance, that justice to that gentleman (Mr. Whitney) requires him to state that he always held political considerations of no influence whatever in the selection of deposite banks. That is what the Secretary says of Reuben. Now, what does Reuben say to the officers of these banks themselves, when they make their application for the public money? Why, sir, he writes a letter to the president of the Planters' Bank at Natchez, James C. Wilkins, then a candidate on the White ticket for Congress, beginning as follows:

"WASHINGTON, Sept. 30, 1835.

"DEAR SIR: When I wrote you last, I did not inform you that it had been represented here that you were, or would be, the candidate for the Senate in opposition to Walker. This I then considered was a tale for the purpose of operating prejudicially to the interest of the Planters' Bank, got up by some one who was striving to direct a part of its Government agency to another institution," &c.

Yes, says he, when he first heard it, he believed it to be a calumny, a "tale," got up by "some one who was striving to direct a part of its Government agency to another institution." Was it then a crime to run for the Senate in opposition to Walker? He then goes on to lay down his doctrines, some of which are very sound, but winds up by stating that he would consider it proper to remove the deposites from any institution employed as the fiscal agent of the Government which should be hostile to the administration. This is no interference in politics! Reuben M. Whitney is entitled to all praise on account of abstaining from such interference! So swears your Secretary.

Take, Mr. Speaker, the case of the Illinois Bank. His conduct in that instance was the most outrageous, impudent, overbearing, reckless exercise of power which was ever perpetrated by any man in office—and this known to and confided at by the Secretary of the Treasury. An application was made by the Illinois

Bank to become one of the depositories of the public money; and then began a fair test of Whitney's power, politically speaking, for this was altogether a political contest. I believe I can say that the evidence is in existence showing that every one of the Representatives in Congress from Illinois recommended the bank of that State to be employed as a depository of the public money. I think the two Senators also united in the request. These gentlemen were governed, as I hope and believe, by higher considerations than party politics. They looked alone to the interest of the country in which the bank was located; and, rising above all sordid and selfish views, recommended this bank to be selected, notwithstanding its officers were known to be politically opposed to the administration. Well, what was the result? Whitney opposes it, and puts his veto upon it. He stands up against the bank. The cashier applies to him; no, I am wrong, one of the directors applies to Reuben M. Whitney, the cashier having written to the Secretary of the Treasury, who had not, it would seem, answered his letter; but he appeared to be disposed to decline any correspondence on the subject, because it would have to be placed on file in the Department. Correspondence is often carried on through this dark and suspicious organ of communication, Reuben M. Whitney, though the final consummation, the mere matter or form, is transacted through the Secretary of the Treasury. One of the directors writes to Reuben M. Whitney, offering him a large reward, as much as the other banks gave him, and asked him to obtain from the Secretary of the Treasury a reply to the cashier's letter. Reuben replied, "I must be frank with you; candor compels me to say that charges of the most serious character are brought against your bank." And what are these charges, Mr. Speaker? Why, Whitney says the charter has been violated by the manner in which the stock was taken. This is one allegation—a mere pretext. But then he proceeds mainly to charge that some of the officers connected with the "Ohio Life and Trust Company" are stockholders in the Illinois Bank, and that these are known to be hostile to the administration, and that their object was to produce a political change in the States of Illinois, Missouri, Indiana, and Ohio. And, in a letter to Mr. Tillson, a director, he says, "there are serious charges against your bank; and I must tell you that, with any pecuniary sacrifices to myself, I will oppose your application, unless you can clear your bank of all these charges." And yet, sir, the Secretary of the Treasury says that Whitney abstained from all political influence whatever! The result was, that the bank did not get the public money, was turned out of competition with the other banks, and the moneys arising from the sale of public lands in that State were transferred from it to the bank at St. Louis, Missouri, and the Commercial Bank of Cincinnati, of which he, Reuben M. Whitney, at a salary of $1,000, was the agent!

Take another case. The Bank of Michigan, at Detroit, says: "This bank desires to co-operate with the Treasury Department in its measures for the general good; and with that view solely, the proposition received from you (to become its agent) will be acceded to in due time."

Take again the case of the bank at Burlington, Vermont. There, sir, you will find the most flagrant and palpable influence and exercise of political power, through Reuben M. Whitney, upon that State during the late elections. Whitney applied to become the agent of that bank, and they implored him almost on their knees to spare them from the tax he had exacted from other banks. "Look," say they, "at our insulated situation, cut off, as it were, from trade and commerce; you cannot expect to receive the same from us as from the other banks in the large commercial cities. We are willing to co-operate with the Government, and pay for all the services you may render us." Whitney, however, renewed his application for an annual salary in the most imposing form, sending—what think you, Mr. Speaker? why, sending a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, and from "a distinguished gentleman residing here, high in the confidence of the Executive," without a name, but who speaks for the President and the Secretary, pledging both to Reuben's scheme, and both answering for Reuben's fitness, and recommending his employment. And yet, sir, when I moved in committee (he having been discharged before that letter came to the committee from the bank) to have Whitney summoned, to testify in reference to its authorship, a majority of a committee appointed by this House to ascertain and report facts shrunk appalled from the investigation, and suppressed the truth of that most important inquiry. But, sir, what did this House itself do? I appealed from what I conceived to be an unjust exercise of power, on the part of the majority of the committee, to the fairness, justice, and duty, of the House. I offered a resolution requiring the Speaker to summon Whitney to appear, either before the committee or before the House itself, and answer as to the authorship of that letter, and let us see whether the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, or the Postmaster General, wrote it, or whether it was a forgery of your Treasury pet. And what course did the House take? Having the day before humbled itself upon its knees to Reuben Whitney, it dared not ask him to come to its bar! Having just before appeared at its bar, and gone away in triumph, it refused to summon him either before the committee or before the House. Have I not a right, therefore, Mr. Speaker, to say to the American people, (I will declare it to my constituents,) that this inquiry was suppressed, that the truth was suppressed by the majority of the investigating committee, backed by "the party" in this House? The people will see and appreciate the craven spirit which has governed it.

Mr. Speaker, you have not only humbled yourselves to the President, and pocketed in silence his rebuke for appointing these committees, but you have humbled yourselves to the meanest and vilest instrument in the hands of the slaves of the President. Sir, you have humbled yourselves to Reuben M. Whitney! Now, in all bodies, heretofore, that had any regard even to the forms of justice, or the slightest regard to the expectations of the people, in the appointment of committees raised for the purpose of carrying out any measure, but more particularly to carry on investigations like the present, which are always unthankful, and more or less perilous to those charged with them, the Speakers of all deliberative bodies have heretofore never failed to appoint majorities in favor of the inquiries. How is the case here, sir? Two committees have been appointed at the close of this Congress, for which we have been battling for years past, but so near the close of the session that we have only twenty-nine days remaining in which to collect testimony from all parts of the country, and six members out of nine of the committee opposed to the very investigation they were raised to carry on! Such an appointment by a Speaker is unprecedented in the history of the civilized world. But how can it be otherwise, sir? The price, in these days, which must be paid for power is the sale and prostration of every principle of honor, patriotism, and independence; and, I fear, sir, the day is distant when we shall see the Speaker of an American Congress dare to appoint investigating committees a majority of whom will be in favor of inquiry, how important soever it may be to the preservation of the institutions and liberties of this country. No, sir. He who obtains place in these days, upon the conditions annexed to it, will look down from his lofty height, from the Tarpeian rock on which you are tottering, and knowing he was lifted there as a party instrument, to do the bidding of those who placed him there, he will not dare to act independently; feeling conscious of the means and motives of his elevation, and the little claim he had on the score of merit, he would shrink back amazed and terrified at the prospect of his fall. It would be too great a sacrifice, for it would sink him into the abyss of nothingness out of which he sprang. Why, sir, for a small great man to look down from that height upon which you sit, would be like the immense precipices over which the guide of the poor old blind man in the play of Lear seemed to be looking, at the cliff of Dover. The members upon the floor would appear to him no larger than mice, smaller than Gulliver's Lilliputians. And would he hazard such a fall? Oh, no, sir, never! Any man who crawls up to that point, in these days, will never hazard the consequences of a patriotic, a generous, or a noble action; it would be fatal to him. How, then, could it be expected otherwise in the appointments of the investigating committees? But, while I think of it, candor, honor, justice, require of me that I should say, and I do so with the utmost pleasure, that the chairman, [Mr. GARLAND,] although opposed politically to the inquiry, has, like an honest man, in spite of your party tactics and party technicalities—his honest bosom, swelling with patriotism, elevated him above all other considerations—he has given a latitude of interpretation to the resolution under which we were authorized to act, for the fullest inquiry. Sir, it is honorable to him, and he has risen higher in my estimation. I wish I could say it of all the members of the committee. He has raised a monument to his honor and patriotism higher than the dizzy height upon which you sit, sir.

[Mr. BOON here interposed, and called for the orders of the day. There were loud cries of "go on! go on!" But Mr. B. insisted on his motion, and Mr. PEYTON was consequently compelled to give way without concluding.]

SUSPENSION OF RULES.

Mr. WHITTLESEY moved to suspend the 16th rule, by which no new bills should be sent from one House to the other during the last three days of the session. Lost.

Mr. W. moved that the bills from the Senate lying on the Speaker's table be taken up and referred to the appropriate committees. He said that, unless this was done, they must lie over until the next session. If the House refused, he should ask the yeas and nays, so that it might be known who were opposed to taking up those bills.

CURRENCY BILL.

Mr. PATTON moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose of taking up the Senate's bill designating and limiting the funds receivable for the revenue of the United States; which was agreed to: Yeas 116, nays 28. This bill had been reported back to the House, with the following amendment:

"And be it further enacted, That no part of this act shall be construed as repealing any existing law relative to the collection of the revenue from customs or public lands in the legal currency, or as substituting bank notes of any description as a lawful currency for coin, as provided in the constitution of the United States; nor to deprive the Secretary of the Treasury of the power to direct the collectors or receivers of the public revenue, whether derived from duties, taxes, debts, or sales of the public lands, not to receive in payment, for any sum due to the United States, the notes of any bank or banks which the said Secretary may have reason to believe unworthy of credit, or which he apprehends may be compelled to suspend specie payments."

Mr. CAMBRELENG said that, at any other period of the session than the present, he might have addressed some remarks to the House on this subject, but he would now forbear. The Committee of Ways and Means, for the purpose of preventing a misconstruction of the act, and securing the public revenue from serious frauds, had brought forward this amendment. It was, however, for the House to adopt or reject it, as they thought proper; but he hoped those gentlemen who were so solicitous about this bill would grant him the privilege of recording his vote upon the amendment. Mr. C. then called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. LAWRENCE said he would not occupy the attention of the House more than a moment. The amendment, he apprehended, was new to most of the members upon this floor. He had examined it carefully, and he believed that the effect of it, if it passed, would be to legalize powers that were claimed and exercised by the Secretary of the Treasury, which were before, to say the least, very doubtful. Its effect would be to destroy the bill, to neutralize and to nullify every valuable provision in it. He stated this to the gentlemen of the West; for, if he understood the amendment, its effect, if carried out, would be the same as the Treasury order, viz: to bring the whole country, in the region of the land offices, down to a specie basis; to drive from circulation every bank note, which could be converted into specie, issued by the banks in the neighborhood of the land offices; and, in place of their own paper, have in circulation the notes of distant banks—those of Pennsylvania, New York, and New England.

He did not give his assent to all the provisions of this bill; it was not one which he would have offered, nor was it the best bill that could have been presented and matured. He took this occasion to say that he deemed the whole system of banking, the whole financial operations of the Government, so far as the currency was concerned, as in a distracted condition, and such as did not meet his concurrence. He believed it was a system which, sooner or later, would inflict, must inflict, on the country a calamity which now was probably little anticipated. He believed that the currency of this wide-extended country never could be properly regulated without some great central controlling power over the State banks. But he would not now go further into the subject, because he knew that the time of the House was too valuable, at this period of the session, to be occupied by him.

Mr. MANN, of New York, said gentlemen looked upon this bill as a repeal of the Treasury order. This was not so; because at last it left the matter with the Secretary of the Treasury; and he ventured to say, if the bill was now passed, the specie order would not be repealed. It did not require the Secretary of the Treasury to receive the notes of specie-paying banks for the public revenue, but left it discretionary with him to do so or not. The amendment proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means merely declared the effect of the provisions of the constitution, which were paramount to all the laws which could be passed on the subject. If the bill went to legalize the notes of any banks in payment for the public revenue, he ventured to assert that it would receive but few votes in that House.

Mr. MERCER made some remarks in opposition to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MANN,] and in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. BOULDIN merely rose to say that he should vote on the various bills, propositions, and amendments, relating to the currency and money in which the public dues were collected, as it might seem best, or rather least mischievous. By these votes he did not wish to be understood to mean that any remedy could be found for the evil proposed to be cured or affected—pretended to be designed by these measures to be cured. He meant the evil arising out of having in, or passing through, the Treasury of the United States such vast sums of money as are, and have been, and probably will be for some time.

The evil (he said) consisted in having the money. The sore evil of the gathering this money has been felt by all in the South—the selling of a man's property for half its worth, to raise money that is not wanting. The same has been felt by all in the North, except a few rich monopolists; but the eyes of the people have been blinded by these monopolists, who have felt the benefit of the collecting of it. A few rich owners of stock in the manufactories are the only persons benefited by the collection, except the officers through whose hands the money is to pass, and those who have received the ill-gotten gains by favor of those officers.

Now, sir, said Mr. B., who is to be injured by the fact that we have these sums? All, all, sir, (there is no general rule without an exception, however,) except those same stockholders in manufactories, and the same officers in whose hands the money is remaining, or through which it is passing, and those whose ill-gotten gains have made them feel the advantage of large sums of money—so large—in the hands of men who have the power to distribute it, and have their own ways and means and benefits in the choice of those hands into which it is to fall.

It was said that some charged that it had been urged that people might be corrupted by their own money. No such belief had been entertained or suggested by him. Sir, the people got none of it back. It corrupted the agents of the people; not the people themselves. It corrupted those into whose hands such large sums were gathered; not those out of whose hands those sums were taken, never again to be returned.

Some, he observed, said that a continued distribution was a high tariff measure. Mr. B. knew it was. Some urged one distribution would be an example for another. Mr. B. knew it would, and that consideration brought him to a stand on the engrossment of the deposite bill last session.

Some said we would then reduce the tariff, (at the last session,) but there was not time then. Mr. B. waited to see; had his doubts. At the commencement of this session, his colleague [Mr. MERCER] moved to introduce a resolution to relinquish all claim to the money deposited with the States. Mr. B. voted to lay it on the table; not that he doubted his right and duty to return to the people any money, or any part of any money, that we, or any body, had unjustly or illegally taken from them.

Still waiting and hoping to see the revenue taken down to the wants of the Government, or some serious and efficient means and steps taken to bring it to that point, it is now within a day or two only of the close of the session, and the rules, perhaps, would not allow of the introduction of a new bill, and passing it. He had taken an oath to support the constitution, not the rules of the House, and would gladly see any bill introduced, or brought forward, which was likely to bring the revenue down to the wants of the Government.

Mr. Speaker, how is this to be done? By drying up the fountains only—no other way. What are they? Imposts and sales of public lands. He would cast off either, or half of either, or both of them, and be in debt, sooner than endure this state of things. Why not cut down the tariff? It will kill the monopolists. Why not stop sales of public lands? It will produce some inconvenience to the settlers. Why not remedy this, by giving pre-emption before instead of after settlement, and sell when you want the money; and it will do no harm to any body, giving the settlers the benefit of their improvements. It will kill the speculators in public lands. Sir, if the present system is to go on, it will kill us all.

As to the bill from the Senate, it will stop but little of the accumulation. We are told that there will be no surplus. We were told last year there would be none—a slight mistake of thirty-seven and a half millions; (some one said forty-two;) Mr. B. said, perhaps, some trifle! Such a mistake might happen again! He was pleased that it then occurred to him to do (what he had hardly ever thought to do in any speech of his) justice to a meritorious officer. He was sure that the Secretary of the Treasury (Mr. Woodbury) was as honest, able, industrious, and courteous an officer as he ever saw. Some one remarked that he had made a mistake of thirty-seven millions. Mr. B. said that might be true; a great many had, besides him, if he did. He made a great mistake, and was an honest man. He might make it again; and a worse man might make a worse mistake. He might overlook the propriety of paying it over or putting it into safe places of deposite. Mr. Woodbury had kept safe—lost none—paid over—so far as it appears yet.

Suppose this mistake is made again? He was told, he said, by some, that if it did, there must be no provision made to divide—that tended to tariff and consolidation. Mr. B. knew it. But what is to be done with it? Let it stay, is the only answer. What is the consequence of that? Corruption of the officers, and all the fountains of truth and justice, is the answer. But (said Mr. B.) some proposed to appropriate money enough to cover it. Certainly you can appropriate money enough to cover any sum. But will that remedy the evil? Will not the money laid out, and passing through the hands of the officers, corrupt as much as any thing? And is not this the very evil we wish to cure?

When evils of this magnitude are before us, can we be in earnest in saying we will remedy them, when we are spending weeks and months and years upon vain disputes and trifles, and descantations upon the relative merits and demerits of particular men in office, or out of office, seeking to get in?

If we wish to reduce the revenue, the means are simple and the way is plain; and the time is ample now, and has been more ample than it is now, and has been wasted; and why do we not do it? There can be but one answer. We do not wish to do it.

Well sir, (he said,) if we will not, he would send as much of it back to his own State and people as he could. This disturbs the constitutional sensibilities of some gentlemen desperately. Where are their constitutional difficulties when they are raising and holding it against all right and all constitution?

He said he did not mean to advocate distribution, tariff, breach of constitution, consolidation; nothing like it. All this thing is done. The money has been raised almost at the point of the bayonet, or rather the sums that paid off our debts, and left this balance under protecting duties; against which he had labored all he could, and all in vain. What should be done with them? He knew they corrupted the people's agents, in the States as well as here. Those agents are neither better nor worse than they are here. This is the reason that we cannot find out and agree upon what shall be done with the money. They that have it there, as well as they that have it here, do not wish to part with it.

We can reduce the amount by stopping the sales of the land—but we will not. We can bring it down by giving the lands away to the States and Territories but we will not. I think either preferable to this state of things. As to the idea that we shall sell the lands to the people for less money than we can get for them,

MARCH 1, 1837.]

Currency Bill.

[H. of R.]

it is preposterous in the statement. Would we do so with our own lands? Certainly not. Why, then, do so with the public property?

If we give any, let us say so, and tell to whom we give it. If we sell, let us sell as we sell our own property. When we give, if we have any right to give, let us tell the people to whom we give it.

He had no idea (he said) that there was any prospect whatever of reducing the income, and had, at the same time, no belief that, while these vast sums were collected and kept either in the State or United States Treasury, the currency could be kept steady. There was but one way to keep that steady. Let every man mind his own business, take care of his own money, and pay his own debts, and that promptly, in any money that his creditors will take, as soon as they fall due; and let the Government do the same, and take care to collect no more than it needs, and spend no more than is necessary, and I will warrant the currency to be kept steady. The Government and its officers, having under their control these vast sums, can unsettle the currency, and they will do it, whoever may be at the head; and neither act nor proviso, nor the great central controlling money power, (the Bank of the United States,) can prevent it. All such things serve rather to shield the officer than to expose him to responsibility. If, then, I vote for any of these bills, or provisos to them, I wish now to notify the House, and particularly my constituents, that I have little faith in any measure in regard to regulating the currency, or providing a better, or any thing else that is good in public matters, until the revenues of the Government are greatly reduced, and these vast sums already accumulated, and held, directly or indirectly, it is immaterial which, under the control of the officers of the Government, either State or Federal, be returned to the people, or actually spent.

Mr. PATTON supported the bill, and opposed the amendment, which he insisted went to nullify the bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND, remarking that the House and the nation well understood the whole subject, demanded the previous question.

Mr. GALBRAITH inquired if the previous question would cut off the amendment of the Committee of Ways and Means.

The CHAIR replied that such would be the effect of the success of that motion.

The House seconded the demand for the previous question: Yeas 32, nays 66.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then said, as this previous question was one of the most important ever taken in that House, he must ask for the yeas and nays on the question, "Shall the main question be now put?" which were ordered.

Mr. ELMORE said, as he had voted, under a misapprehension, for the second to the previous question, he would move a reconsideration of that vote.

The CHAIR. The motion was a novel one, but he had no doubt of its not being in order.

The question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 126, nays 71, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, C. Allan, H. Allen, Anthony, Bailey, Bond, Boon, Borden, Bouldin, Bovee, Buchanan, Bunch, J. Calhoun, Campbell, Carter, Casey, G. Chambers, J. So the House ordered the main question to be now put.

Mr. McCARTY asked for the yeas and nays on the main question; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 143, nays 59, as follows:

So the bill was ordered to a third reading, and was then read a third time and passed, (after some remarks from Mr. HARDIN, explanatory of his reasons for voting against the bill.)

A joint resolution was received from the Senate, suspending the operation of the 16th joint rule, so as to authorize bills which passed either House on the 28th ult. to be sent to either House.

H. OF R.]

Land Bill.

[MARCH 1, 1837.]

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved to postpone the further consideration of the resolution until after the recess.

After some remarks from Messrs. GARLAND of Louisiana, ADAMS, C. JOHNSON, MERCER, and SUTHERLAND, the motion to postpone was agreed to.

LAND BILL.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the Senate bills, on the Speaker's table, coming up on the question of reference.

The first in order was the bill from the Senate entitled "An act to prohibit the sales of the public lands except to actual settlers, in limited quantities, and for other purposes," which bill had heretofore been read a first time, and was arrested in its further progress by an objection from Mr. HARDIN to the second reading; which objection brought the question directly before the House, "Shall this bill be rejected?"

Mr. HARDIN was entitled to the floor, and concluded his remarks in opposition to the bill. After which, he withdrew his objection to the second reading.

Mr. UNDERWOOD renewed the objection.

And, pending the question, the hour of three having arrived, the House took a recess until half past four o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill from the Senate entitled "An act to prohibit the sales of public lands except to actual settlers, in limited quantities, and for other purposes."

Mr. BOON was entitled to the floor, but, after some conversation, gave way to

Mr. UNDERWOOD, who renewed the motion made by his colleague, [Mr. HARDIN,] and withdrawn, to reject the bill.

Mr. U. then made an argument of considerable length against the provisions of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, then obtained the floor, and moved the previous question.

Mr. LOVE moved to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. GHOLSON moved a call of the House. Lost.

Mr. GARLAND called for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table; which were ordered.

Mr. McKENNAN moved a call of the House, and, on that motion, called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 62, nays 124.

So the House refused to order the call.

The question was then taken on the motion to lay the bill on the table, and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 107, nays 91, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, Heman Allen, Bailey, Beale, Bond, Briggs, Buchanan, Busch, John Calhoun, William B. So the bill was laid on the table.

A number of Senate bills, on the Speaker's table, were then read twice by their titles, and appropriately referred to the standing committees.

The Senate bill for the relief of the executrix of R. W. Meade coming up on its first and second reading,

Mr. A. MANN moved to lay the same on the table.

Mr. LANE demanded the yeas and nays, but withdrew the motion.

And the question being taken, the motion to lay the bill on the table was agreed to: Yeas 82, nays 61.

The Senate bill to remit the duties on certain goods destroyed by the late conflagration in the city of New York coming up on the question of reference,

Mr. HAWES moved to lay it on the table.

Mr. CAMBRELENG asked for the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

The motion to lay the bill on the table was rejected: Yeas 71, nays 79.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved the commitment of the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. C. JOHNSON moved its commitment to the Committee of Ways and Means, but withdrew the motion on the suggestion of Mr. McKEON that a bill similar to this was now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was then taken, and the bill was committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The bill from the Senate entitled "An act to organize the several fire companies in the District of Columbia" was read twice by its title; and, on motion of Mr. W. B. SHEPARD, the bill was ordered to a third reading at this time, and was passed.

The bill to charter the Firemen's Insurance Company of Washington and Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, was read twice by its title; and, after a few remarks from Messrs. WARDWELL, W. B. SHEPARD, LAWRENCE, and WASHINGTON,

The bill, on motion of Mr. WARDWELL, was so amended as to add a proviso that it should be lawful for Congress, at any time, to alter, amend, or repeal the same.

And, thus amended, the bill, on motion of Mr. W. B. SHEPARD, was ordered to a third reading to-morrow.

The Senate bill entitled "An act to amend the several acts imposing duties on imports" coming up on its first and second reading,

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved its commitment to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. ADAMS moved its commitment to the Committee on Manufactures.

And, the question being taken, the motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG prevailed.

Several bills from the Senate were severally read a first and second time, and then read a third time and passed.

The joint resolution from the Senate, authorizing the purchase and distribution of a number of copies of Macomb's Tactics, coming up on the first and second reading,

Mr. HAWES moved to lay the resolution on the table; which motion prevailed: Yeas 78, nays not counted.

Mr. HOWARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution of the Senate, authorizing the purchase of Macomb's Tactics, was laid on the table.

Mr. HAWES moved to lay that motion on the table; which last motion, after an ineffectual effort, on the part of Mr. THOMPSON, to induce Mr. H. to withdraw it, prevailed.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. HOWARD, the House took up, considered, and concurred in, the amendments of the Senate to the bill repealing the discriminating duties on Dutch and Belgian vessels and their cargoes.

Mr. CAMBRELENG made an ineffectual motion again to go into committee on certain bills.

On motion of Mr. RENCHER, at nine o'clock, The House adjourned.

THURSDAY, MARCH 2,

NAVAL APPRENTICES.

The bill authorizing the enlistment of boys in the naval service of the United States being under consideration,

Mr. McKIM moved, as an amendment, a bill, reported during the last session of Congress, which defines the number of men and boys to be shipped in the merchant service, and authorizing the owners and commanders of vessels to take boys as apprentices, &c.

After some remarks from Messrs. CAMBRELENG, JARVIS, McKIM, PARKER, HOWARD, HAYNES, and G. LEE, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRENNELL moved an amendment providing for the education of the said boys in the naval service, under certain restrictions.

Mr. JARVIS requested the gentleman from Massachusetts to withdraw this amendment. The education of the boys would be regulated by the Navy Department.

Mr. GRENNELL said the enlistment of boys was a new policy, and he wished to make it as efficient as possible, by giving them such an education as would fit them not only for the duties of sailors but for those of civil life.

The amendment was rejected.

And the bill, having been ordered to a third reading at this time, was read a third time and passed.

INVESTIGATION REPORTS.

On motion of Mr. GARLAND, the report of the minority of the select committee of which he is chairman was ordered to be printed.

Mr. GARLAND moved to print 5,000 extra copies of the two reports, without the evidence.

The House having agreed to consider the motion at this time,

Mr. HAWES moved to amend this motion by adding 5,000 copies of the report of the select committee on the West Point Academy. Agreed to: Yeas 64, nays 48.

Mr. VANDERPOEL moved to amend the motion by adding 5,000 copies of the report of the select committee on amendments to the constitution.

And the original motion, as amended, was then agreed to.

Mr. PEYTON, by leave, presented certain additional views of the minority of the select committee of which

Mr. GARLAND is chairman; which were ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House proceeded to the orders of the day.

SUSPENSION OF RULES.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House proceeded to the consideration of a joint resolution suspending the 16th joint rule of the two Houses, so as to authorize the sending from one House to the other such bills as passed either House on the 28th ult.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved to amend the resolution by adding "that the 17th joint rule, which prohibits the sending of bills to the President on the last day of the session, be also suspended."

Mr. PARKER moved to amend the amendment by adding at the end thereof "until to-morrow at twelve o'clock."

After some remarks from Messrs. PICKENS and MERCER, the question on the amendment to the amendment was taken, and the same was rejected.

And, after some further remarks from Messrs. MERCER, CAMBRELENG, CRAIG, CAVE JOHNSON, and VINTON, the question on the amendment was taken, and carried.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, moved to amend the resolution by adding that the 16th joint rule be suspended, if the Senate concur, for the purpose of receiving certain bills from the House, (therein enumerated,) and to receive from the Senate such bills as may be designated by that body.

After some remarks from Messrs. PICKENS, GHOLSON, and VINTON, the question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

On motion of Mr. WARDWELL, the words "joint resolutions" were inserted after the word "bills."

Mr. McKAY proposed to strike out the first portion of the resolution, which suspends the 16th rule.

Mr. PICKENS raised the point of order, that a vote of two thirds would be required to decide the question.

The SPEAKER decided that the rule which required a vote of two thirds for the suspension or postponement of the order of business applied to the rules of this House, and not to the joint laws of the two Houses.

Mr. PICKENS appealed from the decision.

The appeal was debated by Messrs. SUTHERLAND and PICKENS.

The SPEAKER stated, in full, the words of his decision, referring to the precedents in the House in such cases.

Mr. WARDWELL called for the previous question; which the House seconded.

And the main question was ordered to be now taken.

Mr. HAWES demanded the yeas and nays on the main question; which were ordered.

And the main question, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?" was taken, and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 134, nays 43.

So the decision of the Chair was affirmed by the House.

The question then recurring on concurring in the joint resolution, as amended,

Mr. TURRILL demanded the previous question; which was seconded by the House.

And the main question was ordered to be now taken.

Mr. GRAVES asked the yeas and nays on the main question; which were refused.

And the main question, being on concurrence with the Senate in their joint resolution as concurred in, was taken, and decided in the affirmative.

So the resolution was concurred in.

After some conversation as to priority of business, between Messrs. CAMBRELENG and BELL, the House proceeded to the consideration of the

Fortification Bill.

[MARCH 2, 1837.]

FORTIFICATION BILL.

The bill making appropriations for certain fortifications for the year 1837, and for other purposes, had been returned from the Senate with an amendment, striking out that portion of the bill which provides that the money which may remain in the Treasury of the United States on the 1st of January next, reserving five millions of dollars, shall be deposited with the several States, according to certain provisions of the act to regulate the public deposits, passed June 23, 1836; and the question was on concurring with the Senate in their amendment.

Mr. BELL said he would make but a remark or two upon the motion which he proposed to make in relation to the amendment of the Senate.

The House had incorporated the clause for a distribution of any surplus which might be in the Treasury at the end of the year, among the States, into the fortification bill, by a large and decisive majority. The Senate amended the bill by striking out this most important provision; and this House, upon a reconsideration of the subject, reaffirmed their first decision, and disagreed to the amendment of the Senate, by a majority equally decisive, and one which, under the circumstances, I might say was overwhelming. The Senate has thought proper, nevertheless, to insist upon its amendment; and the question is now presented, whether we shall recede from the ground we have taken, or firmly adhere to a measure which we believe to be of vital interest. The question is one of the first magnitude, of the greatest importance, and connected directly with the permanent interest and welfare of the whole country. We have now to decide whether this, the popular branch of the National Legislature—whether we, the representatives of the people, to whom the constitution has intrusted, in an especial manner, the guardianship and the duty of preserving the public treasure—shall surrender up our trust, abandon our own views of public duty, and conform to the wishes and will of the Senate. A principle of deep interest is thus involved in this question, besides that of mere expediency in relation to the particular measure under consideration. Can any one doubt the line of duty thus plainly marked out to us? Are we not bound, in justice to ourselves, in justice to the constitution and to the best interests of the country, firmly to adhere to our first resolve? Upon the point of expediency, whatever doubt may have existed in the minds of any, whether there would be a surplus of any considerable amount at the end of the year, when this proposition was first submitted, surely now, since the land bill has been laid upon the table, and not the slightest prospect remains of reviving it at the present session, there is no longer any ground of uncertainty as to that question. All must now admit, not only that there will be a surplus, but that it will be a very large one; and the question is now presented, and must be decided by the vote which we are about to take, whether the fifteen or twenty millions in the Treasury, over and above the demands of the public service, will be more secure when deposited with and distributed among the several States of the Union, or in State banks over which we have no control, whose condition at this moment is inflated, uncertain, and perilous in the highest degree. Those who think the States less safe or trustworthy than the numerous State banks which hold the public moneys in deposit will of course be against us.

Another great question is presented, and must be decided by our present action. It is, whether we shall suffer a surplus revenue, the unavoidable and unforeseen result of past legislation, to remain in the national Treasury to tempt the next Congress, as it has done the present one, to swell the expenditures of the Government in a degree and in a manner wholly inconsistent with every idea of economy. I do not intend to enter further into the argument. I have observed, at another step of the progress of this measure, that I considered the argument, both for and against it, fully before the country; and I conclude by moving that this House do insist upon its disagreement to the Senate's amendment.

The SPEAKER said that motion, if rejected, would be equivalent to a motion to agree to the amendment.

Mr. MERCER submitted some remarks in favor of the motion of Mr. BELL, in which he referred to some statistical statements, showing the probable amount of surplus revenue which would be in the Treasury on the 1st of January next.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said that this was a motion to disagree, and he had understood the Speaker to decide that the motion to disagree, if rejected, would be equivalent to a vote of agreement.

The CHAIR said such would be its effect.

Mr. VANDERPOEL then said that, as he believed every gentleman had made up his mind, he would move the previous question.

Mr. CHILDS moved a call of the House.

Mr. GRAVES asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 71, nays 113.

So the call was refused.

The question then recurred on the demand for the previous question, and was decided in the affirmative.

So there was a second.

Mr. HOWELL demanded the yeas and nays on ordering the main question; which were refused. And the House determined that the main question should be now taken.

Mr. BELL asked for the yeas and nays on the main question; which were ordered.

And the main question, "Will the House disagree to the amendment of the Senate?" was taken, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

Whittlesey, Wise, Yell—94.

So the House disagreed to the amendment of the Senate.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. PEARCE, of New Hampshire, in the chair,) and, on motion of the same gentleman, took up the amendments of the Senate to the "Indian annuity bill," which having been concurred in—

Mr. CAMBRELENG submitted several additional items, which he said had undergone the revision both of the Committee of Ways and Means and the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The principal of these were as follows:

For carrying into effect the treaty with the Menomomies, of September, 1836, $288,540.

For carrying into effect the treaty with the Pottawatimies, of August, 1836, $73,423.

For the same with the Ioways, of September, 1836, $65,590.

For the same with the Sacs and Foxes, of September, 1836, $138,240.

For the same with the Missourias, $3,000.

For the same with the Omahas, $2,470.

Several other additional items were also proposed, together with a proposition for an inquiry into the depredations committed by the hostile Indians of the South, (the latter slightly modified on motion of Mr. E. WHITELEY,) all of which were agreed to.

Mr. BELL, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, submitted several additional items and amendments; which were agreed to.

Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, submitted an amendment proposing an appropriation of $17,000 to defray the expenses of holding treaties with all the Indian tribes east of the Mississippi, and of examining the country to be assigned to them, &c.; which was agreed to.

The bill was then laid aside, to be reported to the House.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee then, on motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, took up the amendments of the Senate to the "bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1837."

All the amendments of the Senate, with one exception, were concurred in.

The amendment appropriating the sum of $100,000 for launching the ship of the line Pennsylvania was taken up.

Mr. FRENCH moved to amend it by inserting a provision authorizing the President to select and cause to be purchased, for the use and benefit of sick seamen and boatmen on the Western waters, suitable sites for marine hospitals, &c., not exceeding three upon the Ohio, three upon the Mississippi, and one upon Lake Erie; which, after some remarks from Messrs. FRENCH, PHILLIPS, DUNLAP, DENNY, and JARVIS, was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, proposed an item of $70,000 for the erection of a marine hospital at New Orleans; which, after some remarks from Messrs. JOHNSON, HUNT, SMITH, and WILLIAMS of North Carolina, was rejected.

Mr. HARPER then adduced a letter from an officer of the navy, in support of the propriety of ordering the Pennsylvania to be launched forthwith, and said a few words himself in support of the amendment of the Senate; and, after some further remarks from Messrs. INGERSOLL, REED, and WILLIAMS of North Carolina,

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to insert $400,000 in place of $100,000.

Mr. CAMBRELENG resisted this increase, and said the appropriations in this bill were already large enough for the present year—larger, by far, than met his approbation.

The amendment of Mr. INGERSOLL was then disagreed to, only 45 voting for it; and the question recurring on agreeing to the amendment of the Senate, as amended by the committee,

Mr. MERCER moved to reconsider the vote by which Mr. FRENCH's amendment had been adopted, but subsequently withdrew it.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, moved further to amend the Senate's amendment by appropriating the sum of $15,000 for the erection of a marine hospital at Portland, Maine; $10,000 for one at Wilmington, North Carolina, and alike for a similar object at Newport, Rhode Island; when, after some remarks from Messrs. PEARCE, JARVIS, and SUTHERLAND, the amendment of Mr. PEARCE was disagreed to, and the amendment of the Senate, as amended, was agreed to: Yeas 77, nays 57.

Mr. LYON moved an amendment making an appropriation of $15,000 for a marine hospital at Mobile. Lost.

The committee then rose and reported, and the amendments of the Committee of the Whole to the Indian annuity bill having been agreed to by the House, the amendments of the Senate, as amended, were severally concurred in.

The House then took up the amendment of the Committee of the Whole, moved by Mr. FRENCH, to the amendment of the Senate to the naval service bill; but, before any action was had thereon, the hour of three having arrived, it took the usual recess till half past four.

EVENING SESSION.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The "bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1837," returned from the Senate with amendments, being under consideration; the question pending was on concurring with the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union in the following:

The Senate had amended the bill by inserting a clause appropriating "$100,000 for launching and securing the ship of the line Pennsylvania;" and the Committee of the Whole had amended the same by inserting an additional item, authorizing the President to select and cause to be purchased, for the use and benefit of sick seamen and boatmen on the Western waters, suitable sites for marine hospitals, &c., not exceeding three upon the Ohio, three upon the Mississippi, and one upon Lake Erie.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON called for a division of the question on the amendment, so as to take it separately on that of the Senate and that of the Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIR ruled that such a division was out of order, but suggested to the gentleman from Tennessee that he might attain his object by a motion to recommit the bill to the Committee of the Whole, and, if that motion should prevail, then moving a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment to the amendment had been agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON accordingly made that motion.

Mr. WARDWELL moved the previous question, but

H. OF R.]

Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill.

[MARCH 2, 1837.]

the House refused to second it; and the motion to recommend was disagreed to, without a division.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, moved an amendment making appropriations for marine hospitals at New Orleans, Mobile, Portland, Newport, and Wilmington, North Carolina, amounting in all to $115,000.

After some remarks by Messrs. JOHNSON of Louisiana, SMITH, REYNOLDS of Illinois, PEARCE of Rhode Island, and PARKER, the amendment of Mr. JOHNSON was agreed to: Yeas 79, nays 56.

The question then recurred on the amendment of the Committee of the Whole, as amended.

Mr. RENCHER called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. BOND opposed the amendment, on the ground that it had been introduced with the expectation of carrying it through by a bargain. He was opposed to all bargains of this kind, and would take the responsibility of voting against this amendment.

Mr. LANE would say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BOND] that he made no bargains; that he did not belong to the bargain and sale party; that he was not surprised to hear that gentleman denounce the amendment in such unmeasured terms; it was an appropriation for the West, and connected with Western interests, so uniformly opposed by that gentleman.

After some remarks by Mr. SUTHERLAND, in support of the amendment,

Mr. JARVIS moved an amendment providing that no greater sums should be expended on said hospitals than the amounts herein appropriated. Agreed to.

The question was then taken on the amendment of the Committee of the Whole, as amended, and decided in the negative: Yeas 72, nays 110.

So the House non-concurred in the amendment of the Committee of the Whole.

The question then recurred on the amendment of the Senate making an appropriation of $100,000 for launching and repairing the ship of the line Pennsylvania.

Mr. JARVIS called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

After some remarks by Messrs. GRAVES and SUTHERLAND, the question was taken, and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 89, nays 86.

So the amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

All the other amendments of the Senate were then concurred in, without a division.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WISE asked leave to present a report from the select investigating committee of which he was chairman. Mr. W. remarked that it would not occupy ten minutes.

Objection being made, Mr. W. moved a suspension of the rule; but the motion was disagreed to, without a division.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House, went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. Prentiss of New Hampshire, in the chair,) and took up the "bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1837," which had been returned from the Senate with various amendments.

The first amendment of the Senate was, that the annual salary of the Recorder of the General Land Office shall be $2,000, and that the sum of $100 shall be paid to Charles Gordon, for services rendered under the resolution of the Senate of July 2, 1836.

Mr. BRIGGS moved an amendment to this amendment, making the salaries of the three Assistant Postmasters General the same as the Auditors of the Treasury and Commissioner of Patents.

Mr. BOND addressed the House at some length, in opposition to the amendment.

After some few remarks by Mr. CAMBRELENG, Mr. BRIGGS withdrew his amendment.

The amendment of the Senate to increase the salary of the Surveyor General of Arkansas from $1,500 to $2,000, being taken up separately, was discussed by Messrs. YELL, LOVE, CAVE JOHNSON, and JOHNSON of Louisiana; after which, the committee non-concurred in the amendment.

The amendment of the Senate making an appropriation of $30,000 for the purchase of certain manuscripts of the late James Madison, being taken up separately, was, after some remarks by Messrs. DAWSON, HUNTSMAN, and CAMBRELENG, concurred in.

The amendment of the Senate to increase the fund for the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse, being taken up separately, was, after some explanations between Messrs. CAMBRELENG, A. H. SHEPPERD, HOWARD, and CAVE JOHNSON, non-concurred in.

Mr. CUSHING moved an amendment appropriating $15,500 for the purchase of Gales & Seaton's Register of Debates, for the use of members; which was agreed to.

The amendment of the Senate increasing the salaries of the clerks in the executive departments being taken up separately,

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, moved an amendment, also increasing the salaries of the messengers and assistant messengers; which was agreed to.

Mr. G. LEE moved an amendment increasing the salaries of the collectors, naval officers, and surveyors, &c., twenty-five per cent. Lost.

After some remarks by Messrs. JOHNSON, THOMPSON of South Carolina, R. GARLAND, and LAWRENCE,

Mr. VINTON moved an amendment providing that said increase shall not be allowed to any clerk who now receives more than $1,200.

After some remarks by Messrs. VINTON, ANTHONY, CAMBRELENG, and HAWES, the amendment of Mr. VINTON was disagreed to: Yeas 21, nays 103.

Mr. PEYTON moved an amendment excepting the clerks in the quartermaster general's office. Lost.

Mr. GRENNELL moved an amendment including the first clerks to commandants in the navy yards at New York, Boston, and Norfolk.

After some remarks by Mr. GRENNELL, the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. THOMPSON, of South Carolina, moved an amendment to increase the pay of the officers of the army twenty-five per cent. Lost.

The amendment of the Senate, as amended, was then concurred in.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved an amendment appropriating $8,200 as compensation for commissioner, secretary, and contingent expenses of the commissioners under the convention with Spain. Agreed to.

Mr. LEWIS moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment of the Senate, increasing the salaries of clerks, was concurred in; which motion was disagreed to.

Mr. PEYTON submitted the following amendment, [on which he concluded his remarks in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, not having an opportunity to do so in the House on the night of the 1st of March:]

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint an officer, to be called the superintendent of the public depositories, whose duty it shall be to manage and superintend all the correspondence, business, and interests, connected with the deposite banks, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury; and whose correspondence and all other proceedings shall be deemed official, and regularly filed and kept with the other papers of the Treasury Department.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That said superintendent shall receive a fixed annual compensation of three thousand five hundred dollars.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That no bank shall be continued or hereafter selected as a depository of the public money, unless such bank shall expressly stipulate that all correspondence and other proceedings, between said bank and the Secretary of the Treasury, or between said bank and said superintendent, or any other person or persons, touching the public deposits, their custody, use, or disbursement, shall at all times be open for the inspection or examination of any committee of either House of Congress.

Mr. Chairman, I offer that amendment, sir, with the assurance to this committee that I am serious when I propose it for its consideration. Sir, this unknown, illegitimate, secret agent should no longer exist. This minister extraordinary near the Treasury Department should have a salary and an outfit; his character should be known; his credentials should be received; his compensation provided for by law; his correspondence should be public, inasmuch as it appertains to the public interest; and this secret, collusive, and fraudulent intimacy, which has so long existed, should be broken up.

Sir, there is an agent, or an officer of the deposite banks or of the Treasury, now living in this city, with a salary, as has been proven, of near seven thousand dollars per annum; and yet, sir, the amount of his salary and the extent of his power are unknown, and the sources of his revenue have scarcely been touched or fathomed; for, from upwards of ninety deposite banks, the select committee have not received returns from half the number; yet his direct compensation is now proven to be near the sum, over or under, of $7,000 per annum, from eleven or twelve institutions.

Mr. Chairman, the question arises, is there a necessity for such an officer of your Government? If so, there must be a necessity for making provision for his salary. If there be no such necessity, this House ought to declare it by rejecting the amendment I have offered.

Sir, for the broad investigation which has been attempted to be made into the nature of this agency, the character of the agent's business, the amount of his compensation, the time has been, as you know, [Mr. PIERCE, of New Hampshire, one of the select committee, then occupied the chair,] short and limited, so much so indeed that it was impossible to ascertain the nature or extent of either. On the 20th of January, as you well remember, in the committee, resolutions were proposed, calling upon all the receivers and officers at a distance to furnish the committee with such information as they were possessed of touching the subject of our investigation. They passed upon that day; and upon the 18th February you will remember that a motion was made and carried in the committee that no further testimony be taken; allowing, therefore, only twenty-nine days to carry on this most extended correspondence. But, sir, the want of time was the smallest difficulty with which we had to contend. We had to contend with the whole power of the Executive, which was interposed; at every step and stage of the inquiry, to shield this agent, to suppress inquiry; and, with such encouragement, such countenance, and such support, that agent treated the committee itself with contempt day after day, and time after time. Sir, we passed resolutions requiring that the witness should answer all questions of a public nature propounded to him; he responded by demanding that we should decide upon the preliminary question, his application for a week's delay. Even that the committee yielded to him, and then he finally refused to answer at all; and he was not only supported by a majority of the committee in these refusals, but he was supported also by a majority in this House; the same body, sir, which appointed the committee, professing to confer upon it the power, and requiring of it the duty, to ascertain all that he or any other witness might know or had done in reference to the subject proposed to be inquired into. He persists in his refusal, and is sustained in it by the majority of the committee and of the House. Again he is summoned to appear at the bar of the House, to answer upon the most important subjects of the inquiry, but the majority again sustain him in his contumacy.

How changed are the notes of these gentlemen! Upon the 9th of April, 1836, when my friend, who sits before me, from Virginia, [Mr. Wise,] alluded to this agency and official connexion as possibly existing, as now proven to have existed, the official organ came out with an authorized denial, emanating from the Secretary of the Treasury, of any official connexion between that Department and this agent; and volunteered a readiness upon the part of Whitney to respond to any and all questions which that gentleman might choose to ask! Then was the gauntlet thus thrown down.

Again, when the President was in the State of Tennessee, during the last summer, in a public speech to him at Jonesborough, he was called out to testify upon this subject; and what position did he then take? Why, that no such agency existed; that the allegation was false; a slander got up by the partisans of the bank to calumniate an injured man, who was persecuted by the Bank of the United States! And yet now, sir, when a committee is appointed to investigate these charges, and when the agent himself has an opportunity to testify to his innocence, and prove the falsehood of these charges against him, what position do the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, the official organ, the innocent man, all take? Why, that it is "inquisitorial," and that we deserve to be punished for calling upon an innocent man to disprove his own guilt!

Mr. Chairman, I feel authorized to say, upon the authority of one of the members of this House from Pennsylvania, also a member of another select committee, [Mr. McALESTERO,] not that he has himself told me, but I have it as coming from a gentleman who was present with him on the occasion, of which I have no doubt, that the President of the United States did say "that Peyton and Wise were the men (or fellows) who should be punished, and that innocent man (Whitney) should be discharged." Have I been misinformed? The gentleman can answer. Did not that gentleman, in company with a gentleman from his own State, perhaps one of his constituents, visit the President a short time since; and, in that visit, did not the President denounce my friend and myself in strong terms, and say we ought to be punished, and Whitney discharged?

Now, sir, what was the course of the witness himself? This innocent man! Why, he avails himself of that protection which authorizes a man to refuse to testify against himself; a provision made for felons and malefactors, and never sought to be pleaded by any man who is not conscious of guilt. Let me, sir, allude to an illustrious example in history. When the Governor General of Hindostan, the celebrated Warren Hastings, was arraigned at the bar of the British House of Commons, upon charges impeaching his character, his official conduct, and his honesty, what did he say? Why, sir, even a man standing in the high and elevated position of Governor General of Hindostan dared not assume the high ground this Whitney has taken in defiance of the American Congress, and in the face of the American people. "Mr. Hastings said he had only five days in which to make the refutation of charges it had been the labor of his accusers, armed with all the powers of Parliament, to compile during as many years of almost undisturbed leisure."

Yes, sir, the British Parliament armed its committees with all its power. Whatever power the one had was bestowed upon the other; and so should it be in the American Congress. Yet, sir, here was a committee of investigation, with a majority of six to three of its members politically opposed to the very object for which the committee was raised. I am not, however, to be understood as including the honorable chairman of that committee [Mr. GARLAND] in any thing that I may say. My allusion is to the appointment of the committee by the Speaker of the House. Now, let me ask, what power have three against six? Even when our honorable chairman, in his patriotic, just, and upright feelings, voted with us, which he very generally did, we were then only as four to five; and what could we do?

Sir, Warren Hastings further observes: "If truth can tend to convict me, I am content to be myself the channel to convey it."

Yes, sir, that was his language: "If truth can tend to convict me, I am content to be the channel to convey it." Warren Hastings, if guilty, knew the importance of assuming at least the semblance of innocence.

What a contrast does this conduct present to Whitney's! When we propounded questions to him, as to his connexion with the public treasure, his connexion with the deposit banks, and his fraudulent speculations in stocks and lands, he declined to answer. He then changes the position he had assumed in the Globe. He had advertised himself as an injured and innocent man, ready and willing to answer all and every thing he knew; but, when he is brought to the test, he shrinks and skulks under what he conceives to be his privilege—a privilege always assumed by a man conscious of guilt—of not being his own accuser. Why, this very plea is tantamount to an acknowledgment of his guilt, and will be so held by the American people.

I will allude, sir, briefly to only one other evidence to the same effect, in which the majority of the committee made a similar interposition, calculated to suppress inquiry, and I will then proceed to the consideration, more directly, of the amendment I have offered. Here was a question I propounded to William D. Lewis, cashier of the Girard Bank of Philadelphia, and he took the same ground that Whitney did with regard to disclosures of correspondence.

"3. In the evidence of the president of said bank and yourself, you state that his (Mr. Whitney's) annual compensation was, and is, $500; and that upon each of two occasions, as I understand the evidence, he received a gratuity of $500, in addition to his regular compensation. Will you have the goodness to explain to the committee for what extra or other services said allowance was made, if said services were rendered for the said bank as a fiscal agent of the Government, in and about the public money on deposit, or to be on deposit in the same.

"Mr. Gillet objected to this question, which was decided in the negative by the following vote:

"Ayes—Messrs. Garland, Martin, Peyton.

"Noes—Messrs. Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet, Hamer."

"5. The president of the Girard Bank, of which you are cashier, expressed a willingness to annex to his statement, heretofore sent to the committee, copies of every thing contained 'in books, papers, letters, orders, resolutions, contracts, correspondence, and memoranda,' referred to in the interrogatories upon which his testimony was taken, from '1 to 10, and from 18 to 21, inclusive, and 25, 26, and 31,' but abstained from doing so, because he was aware that the cashier (you) was about being examined as a witness under the same commission, and upon these identical interrogatories,' &c.; and he further says, that he (meaning yourself) will annex to his deposition all the copies called for, and which it would be in his power to give, except of the correspondence directly from and to the Secretary of the Treasury, which is voluminous, &c. State if you are willing, at this time, to give copies, or answer questions as to the purport of the memoranda, letters, &c., above referred to. If yes, annex copies, or state the purport of the same, if in your power.

"Mr. Gillet objected to this question, which was decided in the affirmative by the following vote:

"Ayes—Messrs. Garland, Pierce, Fairfield, Peyton, Hamer.

"Noes—Messrs. Gillet, Martin.

"The question was put to the witness, who replied as follows:

"Answer. I am not.

"6. Does or does not the correspondence, copies of which you have heretofore, in your testimony, and still decline to lay before the committee, between yourself as cashier of the Girard Bank, and R. M. Whitney as agent of that bank, relate to the public money in or out of said bank, its use, or the expected use of the same? And state, further, whether the said correspondence, upon the side of said Whitney, is marked confidential; and, further, whether you have reasons to apprehend injury to the pecuniary interest of said bank, if you were to make a disclosure of the same.

"Mr. Pierce objected to this question, which was decided in the negative by the following vote:

"Ay—Mr. Peyton.

"Noes—Messrs. Garland, Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet, Martin, Hamer.

"7. Do you know the facts upon which the president of said bank differs with you in relation to the propriety of producing said correspondence? If yea, state what are the facts.

"Mr. Pierce objected to this question, which was decided in the negative by the following vote:

"Ayes—Messrs. Garland, Fairfield, Peyton.

"Noes—Messrs. Pierce, Gillet, Martin, Hamer.

"8. Has or has not R. M. Whitney been compensated, directly or indirectly, for services rendered, or supposed to be rendered, to any deposit bank, or company, or individual, in procuring the use of money for or from any deposit bank, since he has been acting as agent for the deposit banks, or some of them? Speak from information which you may have received from him, said Whitney, or any agent or officer of said banks, or within your own knowledge, if any such exists.

"Mr. Gillet objected to this question, which was decided in the negative by the following vote:

"Ayes—Messrs. Garland, Martin, Peyton.

"Noes—Messrs. Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet, Hamer.

"9. Is not R. M. Whitney a stockholder—if yea, to what amount—in any of the deposit banks at this time?

"Mr. Pierce objected to this question, which was decided in the negative by the following vote:

"Ay—Mr. Peyton.

"Noes—Messrs. Garland, Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet, Hamer.

"10. Who wrote the original, of which the letter exhibit A is substantially a copy? At what time did Mr. Amos Kendall, if ever to your knowledge, come to a knowledge of the existence of such or a similar plan as is therein contained?

"Mr. Gillet objected to this question, which was decided in the negative by the following vote:

"Ayes—Messrs. Garland, Peyton.

"Noes—Messrs. Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet, Hamer.

"11. Has or has not the bank of which you are cashier derived information from R. M. Whitney which enabled it to use public money on deposit advantageously for itself, or its friends, in speculation?

"Mr. Gillet objected to this question, which was decided in the negative by the following vote:

"Ayes—Messrs. Garland, Peyton.

"Noes—Messrs. Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet, Hamer.

"12. Did you hold a conversation with R. M. Whitney on the subject of the issuance of the Treasury circular of July 11, before its issuance? If yea, what information did he possess and communicate on that subject?

"Mr. Fairfield objected to this question, which was decided in the negative by the following vote:

"Ay—Mr. Peyton.

"Noes—Messrs. Garland, Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet, Hamer.

"13. Could or could not large speculations have been made by banks, companies, or individuals, in consequence of knowing in advance that such a circular as that of July 11 last would be issued? If yea, state the modus operandi.

"Mr. Fairfield objected to this question, which was decided in the negative by the following vote:

"Ay—Mr. Peyton.

"Noes—Messrs. Garland, Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet, Hamer.

"14. Do you or do you not know that R. M. Whitney did communicate that information to his friends, and that large speculations were made by them in consequence of that information?

"Mr. Fairfield objected to this question, which was decided in the negative by the following vote:

"Ay—Mr. Peyton.

"Noes—Messrs. Garland, Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet, Hamer."

My friend from Virginia being absent, as he was almost all the time, at this period, engaged in the labors of the other committee.

This, sir, affords a pretty fair sample of the views and the construction given by the majority of the committee to any power of inquiring into the indirect compensation derived by this agent in speculations with companies or individuals; and, taken in connexion with the course of the President, and the House itself, as well as the witness and some of the deposit banks, an imperfect idea may be formed of the difficulties with which the minority of this committee had to contend. But, Mr. Chairman, I will call the attention of the committee for a short time, for I do not mean to trespass on its patience, to the first resolution adopted by this majority, and then I will take up the testimony of Mr. Woodbury, and of one of his clerks. I will show, sir, and convince any man in this House, of whatever party he may be, who will give his ears to my statement, and do himself the justice to think, that the testimony and the resolution are in the direct face of each other. If I fail in doing so, I will surrender every thing like judgment in the case. Here is the resolution:

"Resolved, (as the opinion of this committee,) That the several banks employed for the deposit of the public money have not all, or any of them"—mark that word "any," Mr. Chairman—"have not all, or any of them, by joint or several contract, employed an agent, to reside at the seat of Government, to transact their business with the Treasury Department."

Well, sir, here is a declaration sufficiently explicit. The deposit banks have not, "any of them," employed an agent here to transact business with the Treasury Department.

I will now read a single clause from the testimony of the chief clerk of the Treasury Department, Mr. McClintock Young. Here is what he says on oath:

"1. State all you may know upon the subjects of inquiry contained in the resolution of the House which is now before you.

"Answer. There is an agent of some of the deposit banks residing in Washington, R. M. Whitney. My information on this subject is derived partly from letters from banks on file in the Treasury Department, and partly from having heard Mr. Whitney say he was employed by some of them as their agent. I know nothing of any agreement or contract he may have with any of those banks. The character of his business I believe to be to attend to their interests, so far as relates to their connexion with the Department; that is, he attends generally to all matters in which their operations are required in relation to the keeping, disbursing, and transferring of the public money. Those operations sometimes operate, as the banks say, injuriously to their interests, and he has frequently called on the Secretary, and other arrangements have been made, I presume and believe, on his representations. I know not what compensation he receives. I am under the impression that I have heard him say that the three first selected banks in New York paid him one thousand dollars each."

And yet, Mr. Chairman, this resolution, which was introduced by you, sir, [Mr. PENCE,] and adopted by the majority of the committee, expressly says that not "any" of the deposit banks have employed this agent to transact their business at the Treasury Department! How can that resolution stand with the testimony of the chief clerk of that Department?

But, sir, it is possible to make this inconsistency still more apparent. I will quote the testimony of Levi Woodbury himself; and although his answers are elaborate arguments, page after page, yet, sir, when we come to the answering part of them, he is compelled to admit this official connexion between him and his friend Reuben M. Whitney. He is compelled to show the nature of the business transacted personally by the agent, Whitney, as the authorized agent of some of the deposit banks, with the Department; and by the Department through the agent, Whitney, as an "organ of communication" with the deposit banks. I will show it all, Mr. Chairman. Let any man attend to the testimony of Mr. Woodbury, and disbelieve it if he can. I will first read a short sentence or two, to show the "official connexion."

In speaking of Whitney and other agents he says:

"With all these agents before named, as well as many others, when transacting business for their principals, the official connexion of the Department has, in all other respects, as well as in these, been similar."

Again he says:

"They have access to papers and every species of public information." "But, in the case of the agent of the bank, no indulgence of any kind is known or believed to have been granted, which, if requested, has been withheld from the agents on other subjects, and especially the agents of corporations or persons in public employment; nor any withheld which, in other like cases, has, on request, been granted."

"I can think of no further explanation desirable as to the official connexion between the agent for some of the deposit banks and this Department."

Now, sir, I will show you what that "official connexion" is.

"44. In the cases alluded to in your report of the 11th instant, where the Planters' Bank, Natchez, and the Commercial Bank, Cincinnati, confided authority upon said Whitney, as shown to you in a written communication, what was that authority, what were the claims or requests made by him, what was the case of the Commercial Bank at New Orleans?

"Mr. Gillet objected to this question, which was decided in the affirmative by the following vote:

"Ayes—Messrs. Garland, Pierce, Wise, Johnson, Hamer, Martin, Peyton, Fairfield.

"No—Mr. Gillet.

H. OF R.]

Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill.

"Answer. The cases referred to in my report of the 11th instant, where differences of opinion occurred, and an authority was produced, but not found necessary to be filed, were those of the Commercial Bank at Cincinnati and the Commercial Bank at New Orleans. I mentioned the Planters' Bank only as one in which a general notice had been given, and was on file, as to his agency, and a copy of which was annexed. The particular case of the Commercial Bank at Cincinnati was, so far as I recollect, a letter which he held in his hand and read, wishing him to request the Department to change the place to which some of the transfers outstanding against it were to be made, such as from other parts of Ohio or Kentucky, to New Orleans or Philadelphia; and stating the reasons for the request to be, that the banks in Ohio and Kentucky would probably demand specie, or be less accommodating as to the payments than those at a distance. I think it stated, further, that an extension of some of the transfers was desirable, if the Department could conveniently grant it, and complained that the time already allowed was too short. The agent also urged both these requests, assigning similar reasons, and that the time granted in several cases was less than that formerly allowed, under like circumstances, to the United States Bank to make transfers. I declined to change the places from Ohio and Kentucky, as requested, because, under the late deposit law, I felt bound to confine to the neighborhood those particular transfers, till about money enough was placed in Ohio and Kentucky to meet their share of the anticipated division of the surplus and the current expenditures, rather than send it to a distance; but the time for some of the transfers, which seemed too short, I proposed to extend as long as seemed to me proper. He, however, declined taking such extension in behalf of the bank, unless I could make it longer, thinking it would not be useful so little extended; and, therefore, I wrote to the bank itself what had been proposed to him, and his declining it, and that I should, notwithstanding, give the extension which to me seemed suitable, and the bank, if not accepting it, might pay the money over at the time originally fixed. In respect to the Commercial Bank at New Orleans, the application by the agent was, according to my recollection, with a letter, setting out that the Department had, by transfers and warrants, drawn out, or proposed to draw out, all or nearly all the public money in its possession, and wishing him to request it to revoke some of the transfers, and possibly to postpone some to a much later day if none could be revoked. I informed him that the bank must be in an error, as, before signing a transfer, or sending one, I was always careful to see that it would not reduce a bank too low. I sent for the clerk who had charge of the subject, and examined into it critically, and declined to revoke any of them, as I felt satisfied that the bank and its agent considered the money the bank had been notified it would probably be called on to pay the State of Louisiana during 1837, but for which no transfers had then been issued, and which I told him would not be issued when the time of payment arrived, provided the bank should, before that time, be drawn down too low. I informed him, also, that the bank had, by mistake, included one transfer, in order to make out its case, which had never been issued, according to our records; and hence I could not revoke any that had been issued. He seemed to be satisfied that the bank was right. Whether any extensions of time were given in this case I do not remember, but know that none were given beyond the period of the quarterly payments to the States, for which purpose these transfers had been seasonably ordered."

Here, sir, there is the authority, conceded by the banks to their agent, he holding in his hand the written authority, "not necessary to be filed." Sir, I am sorry for the character of the majority of the committee; I regret that this resolution should be as it is.

But I have not done. Although here is evidence which shows you the when, and where, and how; it shows you the manner of these bank transactions, in all their details, as carried on through their agent. Not only has all this business been transacted by him, but Mr. Woodbury says that, upon some occasions, this agent took an appeal from his decisions, as Secretary, to the President of the United States; and, not content with that, he even went, or threatened to go, to Congress for redress. We have seen, from one of his published letters, that this private gentleman seems to have a fancy for enlightening and instructing this opaque body, these ignorant members of Congress, on his magnificent schemes of banking and legislation. That is a part of his ordinary duty; for he writes to the deposit banks, to these moneyed corporations, to use their exertions in making a concentrated movement upon this body, so as to produce some stupendous pecuniary result favorable to them and to himself, and which would enable him to fleece the people upon a more extended and liberal scale.

Having proven the official connexion, and that some of the deposit banks transact their business with the Treasury Department through Whitney, I will now show that the Department has looked to Whitney "as an organ" to transact its business with the deposit banks. Here is the position assumed by the majority in their last resolution, "that Whitney's business is to communicate information to the banks." That he is a mere correspondent, and only half a correspondent at that. He communicates nothing from the banks to the Department; mark that, sir!

Now, although this resolution declares, upon the character and responsibility of the majority, that such are the facts, Mr. Woodbury swears he is the organ of communication to and from the banks. Why, sir, if two steam engines upon the same track of railroad were to meet together, they could not come more directly and violently in conflict than does this resolution of the majority of the select committee with the testimony of Mr. Woodbury. He says, "occasionally they [communications] are made through Mr. Whitney to the banks!" Why, what more can be wanted, sir, to establish the utter falsehood of that resolution? Mr. Woodbury then says, "I am not aware of any letter on record, from or to Mr. Whitney," &c. Oh, no, sir! No letter "on record." That was one reason for my offering the resolution I did. If all be right, and fair, and honest, it ought to be there, sir. It should be "on record." I want to break up this secret, fraudulent, collusive connexion, upon which shadows, clouds, and darkness, have so long rested, between that officer and this agent. So much for the first and last resolutions of the majority, as sustained by the testimony.

But, sir, the resolutions are not consistent with each other. The first, as we have seen, explicitly declares that not "any" of the banks have employed an agent, at the seat of Government, to transact business with the Department, but the last actually acknowledges that there is an agent, for some purpose. But they say he merely transmits information to the banks from the Treasury Department, &c. Nothing is transmitted from the banks themselves, through him, to the Department! No business done by him. Why, sir, he is only half a correspondent, at that rate. A correspondent to send information to a bank from the Treasury Department, but not a correspondent to communicate any thing from a bank to that Department. Sir, is that so? Is it possible that any one can have a doubt about it? Let us see.

Here is what Mr. Woodbury says; and let us see how it agrees with the resolution:

MARCH 2, 1837.]

Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill.

[H. OF R.]

"8. Is Reuben M. Whitney the person through whom all or any of the communications, verbal or written, which are or have been made by the Treasury Department, or by you personally, to the banks of deposit of the public money of which he is agent, or which are or have been made by said banks to said Department, or to you personally?"

"Answer. In reply to this question, if properly understood by me, I would state that most of the communications received from the deposit banks, or made to them, are direct between them and the Department, though occasionally they are made through Mr. Whitney in behalf of some of them. I am not aware of any letter on record, from or to Mr. Whitney as their agent, except as named in my report of the 11th instant; though, in some instances, I think, when making some request for information, in their behalf, he has shown to me letters, or held them in his hand, which he said were from them.

"When the application in their behalf has been made by him verbally, and no letter has been written by them to the Department, it has been customary to make him a verbal reply, if the business was of little importance; but, if it was considered of much magnitude, a written communication has generally been sent by the Department directly to the bank concerned.

"Other persons, as remarked in my report to the committee on the 11th instant, have been the organ of communicating the wishes of several of the deposit banks on several occasions, and in a manner similar to that above described as to Mr. Whitney.

"9. Are most or all of the communications received by you or the Department, from the deposit banks, or made to them by you or the Department, directly or through Mr. Whitney, contained in your communication of the 11th instant to this committee? If not, where and what are they?"

"Mr. Gillet objected to its being propounded. On the question, shall the interrogatory be propounded? it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

"Ayes—Messrs. Garland, Pierce, Fairfield, Wise, Johnson, Hamer, Martin, and Peyton.

"No—Mr. Gillet.

"The question being propounded to the witness, he returned the following answer:

"All the communications made to or from the Department, whether directly or through Mr. Whitney, which have been found on record or on file, and which relate to his appointment or compensation as agent, are believed to be annexed to my report to the committee on the 11th instant.

"But there are numerous other communications on other subjects with the deposit banks, relating to their duties and requests, &c., both to and from them, and which probably fill several volumes, and are now at the Department."

"8. 'The names of the banks employing said agent' are, with the few exceptions before alluded to, unknown to me, except by rumor.

"Besides the Planters' Bank at Natchez, and the Commercial Bank at Cincinnati, copies of whose correspondence have already been furnished, I think that in one or two cases of difference of opinion as to claims made by the banks, through their agent, and in those alone, a written communication was shown to me by him concerning the authority confided by them.

"But the final question in those cases not having been one as to competent authority on the part of the agent to do any official act in their behalf, but as to the sufficiency of the reasons in favor of the claims or requests made by him, and which are believed not to have been acceded to, it did not become necessary to ask the evidence of his authority to be filed; and no names are recollected beyond those above stated, except the Commercial Bank at New Orleans."

He says, Whitney is "to be the organ, at times, of presenting their wishes to the Department in respect to subjects connected with their public obligations; and to procure here, and communicate, the best intelligence in his power on the state of the money market at home or abroad; on the condition of the currency and of the exchanges; and on the supposed legislation likely to happen in Congress, either as to the banks themselves, or as to heavy appropriations to be paid by them; and, in fine, on any other topic which he may consider interesting or beneficial to his employers."

Why not speak plainly like that? Why make use of an equivocation? Mr. Woodbury swears to the facts; and why report a resolution directly in the face of the facts, which overturns all he has affirmed on the subject? Why, it is impossible to make the case, by testimony, any plainer than he has done.

I will now, Mr. Chairman, come to the next resolution; it is as follows:

"Resolved, (as the opinion of this committee,) That no agent for the transaction of business between the deposit banks and the Treasury Department has been employed at the request or through the procurement of said Department."

How could they get Levi Woodbury to swear to that? No, sir, they could not. I brought him to the book, and he swore down that resolution, "toto celo." We always wanted men, under oath, to prove these facts; and, when we got them, we either made them disclose and prove them, or we made them skulk and shrink under the term "inquisitorial," or else they cravenly and conscience-stricken screen themselves behind the constitutional provision which protects a felon from testifying to his own guilt. Well, what are Levi Woodbury's words? Here is the question propounded to him:

"Have you ever given a recommendation in favor of Whitney, or has he been employed through your procurement?"

"None," said he, "unless that letter of the 5th of November, 1834, can be so construed."

Mr. Chairman, that was the very thing we wanted. He would not himself say but what that was a letter of recommendation for Whitney, and that it was so meant and so intended. He could not say otherwise; it would have been in the face of reason, and in direct violation of the most palpable construction of the English language, to deny that it is as strong a recommendation as was ever penned by man, for both the scheme and the agent who was applying for the office.

But, sir, what does Mr. Ela, the confidential clerk of the Secretary of the Treasury in that Department, say?

"10. Do you know of any application made by Mr. R. M. Whitney to any officer of the Treasury Department, either for a recommendation to be employed as agent for any deposit bank, or for an agency or office in that Department connected with the deposit banks?"

"Answer. I do not, further than is contained in the letter of the Secretary to him, dated in November, 1834, appended to the Secretary's answer, which I have seen."

Here, then, we see that Levi Woodbury and his clerk admit the letter of recommendation. Now, what is that letter? It was written in reply to Reuben M. Whitney's letter of the 4th of November, 1834, enclosing a copy of the celebrated letter from certain deposit banks, written by Whitney himself, proposing to convert the Treasury Department into a Bank of the United States, with State banks for its branches, and placing Reuben M. Whitney at the head of a bureau in the Department, to be assimilated to a committee in the bank, called the committee on the branches, thereby placing the whole fiscal concerns of the country under his care and supreme control. These were the propositions contained in that letter: that Whitney should be placed at the head of such a bureau, with these powers, and for this object, with a salary of $5,000 per annum. When these propositions reached the ears of Mr. Taney, he never condescended to reply in writing to them.

Here is what he (Mr. Woodbury) says in reply to the former application:

"To that application I made answer the ensuing day, stating what was my own opinion, and what was understood to be the opinion of my predecessor, (corresponding with my own,) that the Treasury Department, under existing laws, had no authority to constitute any such officer or agency; and if one was appointed, it must be done by the banks themselves."

Now, when Whitney approached Levi Woodbury with this letter, it should be remembered when it was, and under what circumstances. When he came to Mr. Duane, upon the 15th of June, 1833, almost three months before the deposits were removed from the Bank of the United States, he applied for this agency in advance; and the first sentence of his letter sets forth—

"That he having enjoyed the confidence of the President in a great degree, &c., and knowing the views of the President on the subject of the removal of the public deposits, &c., I look upon that measure as definitively resolved upon, so far as his views and recommendations have weight and influence. I have good reason to believe that the President will forward a communication from New York to you, expressive of his views and wishes upon this subject."

Whitney further says:

"I take the liberty of tendering to you my services to execute the duties and to solicit the situation."

He further states:

"I have never spoken to the President upon this subject, but circumstances lead me to think that I should not be otherwise then perfectly acceptable to him. The only persons to whom I have mentioned the subject, connected with the Government, are Messrs. Taney and Kendall—to the former gentleman a week since, at Baltimore, who replied in these words: 'I have always understood, and taken it for granted, that you were to have the situation when it is created.'"

Mr. Duane replied to this letter on the 17th June, 1833, and in that response to this impudent application he raised himself in the estimation of all honest men of every party. Whitney tried to introduce himself to Mr. Duane, to become Secretary of the Treasury de facto, and thereby save that gentleman all trouble of thinking for himself. Mr. Duane made a very polite reply, and said:

"Whenever the President shall express his wishes in relation to any subject of public concern, or with regard to yourself, I will so act, I trust, as to merit the respect of the President and preserve my own."

This array of high officers had no effect on Mr. Duane. This was the last communication that passed between Mr. Duane and Whitney.

He then, sir, comes upon Mr. Taney, backed by the recommendation of six banks, but with no better success than he met with from Mr. Duane.

Mr. Taney's conduct merits the highest praise; and I must do him the justice to say that he stated, upon his oath, that the statement of Whitney, as far as regarded himself, was false; that he never encouraged him; and, in his letter to Mr. Reverdy Johnson, he puts his refusal on the ground of that individual's notoriously bad character, saying "his appointment would be received, I am sure, with one general, universal feeling of disapprobation, by friends and foes. I will never mortify my friends by such an appointment," &c. Amos Kendall also denies, in his evidence, having been consulted by Reuben M. Whitney, as stated in his letter to Mr. Duane. This is a question of veracity between Amos and Reuben, in which no honest man should interfere; let it, therefore, stand as a family affair between them. But a year afterwards, when Mr. Taney was gone, Mr. Duane swept away, and Mr. Woodbury came into the Department, then we find Whitney there. I asked one of the clerks, when did Whitney first come amongst them? Soon after Mr. Woodbury was placed at the head of the Department, was the substance of the reply. Yes, sir, then it was that Reuben M. Whitney became a "pet"—that he was taken into the Department—into the bosom of the Secretary. Let these things be remembered, and that he was just setting out upon his grand Northern tour, to make a personal application to the deposite banks to employ him as their agent, and that he was hunting up letters of recommendation to carry with him; the letter of Levi Woodbury of the 5th of November was obtained, and was used for that purpose every where he went. Mr. Woodbury, as we have seen, did not pretend to deny it was a letter of recommendation. Sir, in what company this letter was found! Whitney also applied for, and obtained, another strong letter of recommendation from one, as he says, "high in the confidence of the President." Here is the language of the anonymous letter itself:

"The President and Secretary of the Treasury, I know, view the subject in the same light that I do, and will be gratified if the banks will establish such an agency; and, from his talents, experience, and fidelity, no appointment would be more acceptable to them than that of Mr. Whitney, who has already been recommended to the Department."

This is the letter the authorship of which has been suppressed by a majority of the committee and by this House.

That letter was not signed. It was anonymous, but was carried in company with that of Mr. Woodbury. The bank at Burlington, Vermont, before whom they were laid, said, in reply, "that, in all business transactions with the Government, they [the board of directors] have and wish to meet their views." Now, sir, what was this which the board of directors considered a "business transaction with the Government?" It was the appointment of Reuben Whitney as their agent. Sir, it is impossible to misunderstand this letter of Mr. Woodbury. Take the construction put upon it by the Moyamensing Bank, of Philadelphia, when it was laid before that bank as a recommendation of Mr. Whitney. In a resolution of the board, referring to this letter, they say: "R. M. Whitney, Esq., coming highly recommended, &c., we do therefore employ him," &c. This was the only letter of recommendation, as it appears, before the board, and they consider it a high recommendation of Whitney. Yet, in the face of all this testimony, we have a resolution from the majority of the select committee, declaring that he has not been employed at the request or through the procurement of the Treasury Department. That, sir, is the resolution. Here is the proof. How, let me ask, can they stand together? Many of our friends have manifested no little uneasiness to me, knowing the multitude of difficulties thrown in the way of this investigation; but I can tell them, Mr. Chairman, with confidence, that, when they see how much direct positive proof we have elicited, they will admit that all we have ever said, ever thought, or imagined to have existed, will fall far, very far, short of the developments which are made. I have been astonished myself at the evidence brought to light before this committee.

A few words upon the 5th resolution of the majority, and I will pass on. In effect, this is the substance of the resolution: that this agent, such as he is, is a mere correspondent, a mere channel to convey information to the banks, but never from the banks.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will call the attention of the House to one other subject upon this branch of the case. You all remember the celebrated Treasury circular of the 29th August, 1835, in which Mr. Whitney assumed upon himself the power to prescribe what bank notes should or should not be received in payment for the public lands, and which winds up with a threat that, upon any violation of his orders, he was authorized by the Secretary of the Treasury to say that "he [the Secretary!] would take prompt measures!" &c.

Now, Mr. Chairman, you recollect how this was denied, evaded, attempted to be concealed, and how the Globe published mutilated accounts of it; and yet, sir, when we get Mr. Woodbury, and even Reuben Whitney himself, upon the stand, they both acknowledge it to be genuine! that it is a bona fide order, conferring upon Whitney all the power the circular purports he possessed. Here is the question, sir, which brought it out:

"32. Have you ever used the following language in any of your circulars, letters, or instructions, to any of the public officers, to wit: 'I have forwarded a copy of this to each of the public receivers, and have no doubt that they will act with such fairness that no injustice will be done to any one of the deposit banks. Should it ever be otherwise, and any one of the banks have cause to feel aggrieved, I am authorized by the Secretary of the Treasury to say that he will take the most prompt measures to remove any just cause of complaint?' If yea, state whether you had received any such authority from the Secretary of the Treasury.

"Answer. I refer the committee to my printed letter of the 29th of August, 1835, (see appendix I 2,) in which will be found the paragraph quoted in this interrogatory.

"In effecting the arrangements informed of in that letter, a fear was expressed by some of the banks that the banks and receivers might not act in perfect fairness with each other; and that some of the banks might be subject to impositions under the arrangements they entered into. I communicated the same to the Secretary of the Treasury; who, viewing, as I believed, the arrangement an important one for the community, and for the purpose, as I supposed, of inspiring the banks with confidence that they would not be imposed upon, told me I might communicate the substance of what is contained in the concluding part of the quotation, though probably in other words.

That printed letter was forwarded to the public land receivers by me as a mere matter of information, but not of 'instructions.'"

Now, sir, that that statement of Reuben Whitney is true can be shown by the facts and circumstances of the transaction, Mr. Woodbury knowing his intention of sending the circular, and actually franked that very circular, to those receivers and those banks, knowing what it contained, as he in effect admits himself. I will cite the question propounded to Reuben Whitney himself on this subject of franking:

"34. Have you or have you not issued such circulars as are above mentioned to any other officer or officers of the Government? If yea, to whom and when? Either furnish the committee with copies, or state their purport if you cannot furnish copies.

"Answer. I do not recollect to have issued any circulars, except such as were intended for the deposit banks; copies of which, in the instance referred to, were sent to the public land receivers, and for the purpose mentioned.

"35. In forwarding to the public offices and the deposit banks the before-mentioned circulars, or making any other communications to them, have you at any time used the frank of the Secretary of the Treasury, or any other officer of that Department? If yea, state whether it has been your habit to do so.

"Answer. The Secretary of the Treasury franked, or authorized to be franked, two or three of the circulars furnished to the committee, marked A, one of which was forwarded to many, if not all, of the deposit banks, and of one of them a copy was sent to each of the receivers, also franked by him; also, tables showing the condition of the deposit banks, which I have occasionally prepared, the character of which was, in all cases, made known to him, on the papers themselves being first shown to him. Beyond these I do not recollect that he has ever franked, or authorized to be franked, any communications to the banks, or to any person whatever, of mine."

But, sir, another, and one of the strongest evidences that this illegitimate, collusive association between your Secretary of the Treasury and this deposit bank minister near your Treasury Department ought to cease. Why, sir, Reuben Whitney has access to every document, letter, and paper, in that Department, whether it concerns the public money, the deposit banks, or any other matter. Not only so, sir, but he will go to your Department, enter the rooms of the clerks, and take from the file such original papers as he sees fit, and carry them through the street to his own room, where he will keep them till the next day, or till it suits his pleasure or convenience to return them. That, sir, is the positive and direct testimony of one of the clerks, Mr. McGinnis. It occurred, he testified, during the present session of Congress. A Senator wishing to obtain some information from the Department, instead of applying himself to the Secretary, he goes at once into Whitney's room, to the fountain head of information, and Whitney goes into the clerk's office, takes down the file, and carries it to his own room. The statement of the witness is, that he said Thomas H. Benton, Senator from Missouri, wished to obtain some information from him, and he accordingly took the original files containing it, passing down stairs from the third story of the building, passed along the Avenue, and then entering at another door, took them to his own room, where he and the Senator kept them all night, and it was some time next day before they were returned, when the fact was, for the first time, made known to the Secretary, who rebuked the clerk, but had not the boldness to rebuke Mr. Whitney. No, sir; it was all right, so far as he was concerned, for neither the clerks nor the Secretary dare to resist him. You have humbled yourself to his power; he is above you; why, you all must bow to Reuben M. Whitney as well as to his master! Not a word of rebuke to him, sir; oh, no! The helpless, honest clerks are censured, but Reuben M. Whitney is retained; and, although he is not paid by the Secretary, or nominally out of the public money, yet he is under the same roof, in the same building with the Secretary, nay, they use the same wash-basin, and Reuben M. Whitney can take almost any and every liberty he pleases. Hence his power, his employment, his emoluments.

On another occasion, he goes into a store, and, seeing some handsome paper that took his fancy, he instantly orders some of it to be sent over, and to be charged to the Department. All's right, sir; it was ordered by "Mr. Whitney." The witness, Mr. Sullivan, testified to this fact, and he produced his ledger, showing the entries corroborating the fact.

Not only so, sir, but the Secretary of the Treasury has acknowledged upon oath instances where Whitney thought for the Secretary, where his talents were brought into requisition for the service of the Department, where his statements have been sent to Congress by the Secretary as his own. This is not right. We have two Secretaries—one to think and write, and another to receive the salary. Surely, the thinking one ought to be paid, and it seems the salary of the other ought to be increased, or he ought to be removed. I give my reason, sir. He must be hard run for change. Why, sir, he sent in to the committee a claim for five days' attendance, at two dollars a day, amounting to the enormous sum of ten dollars. The Congress of the United States ought certainly to increase his salary, and make it six thousand and ten dollars. But how did he get it up to ten dollars? Why, he would come to the committee room, undergo an examination of half or three quarters of an hour, or less, and then say he was compelled to leave the committee on official business. In this way, he made out seven days, and sent his account, in writing, by a confidential messenger, with authority to receive the money; but it turned out that no more than five days could be made out from the journal, by which he said he would be governed in this important affair, and so he gets his ten dollars.* This, Mr. Chairman, is Levi Woodbury, Secretary of the Treasury! It reminds me of a little incident I heard of him. As I descended the Ohio on my way home last summer, I was informed by a very intelligent gentleman who was educated at the same seminary with him. He spoke of Levi Woodbury as the stingiest boy in the whole school, who was never known to expend one cent. One day, however, (said he,) he, in company with my informant, went to a large collection of the people, (an election, I believe,) and, contrary to all expectation, he bought a ninepence worth of milk punch, and divided it with his friend. They returned to college; and when this unprecedented act of liberality, on the part of Levi Woodbury, was made known, many would not believe it. What! that he should buy a ninepence worth of milk punch, and divide it with a friend! It was incredible! And upon the establishment of the fact, there was a general illumination in commemoration of the occasion. And, Mr. Chairman, let no man disbelieve this punch story, after this ten-dollar affair.

Mr. Chairman, one great necessity for legislation on this subject is the attitude assumed both by the deposit banks and by their agent. It is this: That the deposit banks are responsible only to the Secretary of the Treasury or his agent, but that they owe no responsibility to Congress. That is the position which they assume. Notwithstanding they have undertaken the charge of the deposits under the act of Congress, yet they insist that Congress has no power of supervision or inspection over them, because it has delegated that power to the Secretary. Then how does it stand? Here is your ten-dollar milk-punch Secretary and Reuben Whitney, who have entire and unlimited control over the treasure of the nation, from which there is no appeal! Conceive the case, sir, of the whole being seized, and a division of the spoils about to take place. According to this doctrine, Congress has not even the power to interpose and save it! That is the position which they assume.

What does the Secretary himself tell you? That, notwithstanding, from the first instructions given by the President, through Mr. Duane, to Amos Kendall, special agent to visit the banks, and see upon what terms they would receive the deposits, it was expressly stipulated that an agent should be appointed, with full power to examine into the condition of them all, not, to be sure, touching their private affairs; and that, notwithstanding this power was contemplated in the first contract with the original deposit banks, and the insertion of such a provision in the recent law, yet, what does Levi Woodbury say? Why, he says "I have not, and never will appoint such an agent." What is the protection now? Why, that the banks are the principals, and Whitney their agent—a shameful perversion of terms, sir. Reuben Whitney is their dictator and their plunderer. Let me give you an instance.

Three banks in the city of New York fixed his salary at $600 per annum for each bank. The Bank of America even passed a resolution that he should have no more than that amount; but he soon compelled them to reverse their resolve, and he demanded $1,000 from each; they yielded to his demands. He is now their agent, and is in the receipt of this sum annually from each.

There is another and a still more flagrant case. The Bank of Burlington, Vermont, in reply to his importunities, almost goes on its knees, to beseech him to have mercy on it; for that, owing to its remote and isolated situation, they have no need of an agent. But he renewed and repeated his requisitions, till they were driven finally to make an unconditional surrender, telling him, "we have employed you, but have fixed no salary; we leave that to yourself." And he fixed it, sir, accordingly.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is a peculiar way of managing these matters between Whitney and the banks; and as I am in possession of it, and as every gentleman, of every party here, ought to wish to know it, I will read it for their especial edification.

President of the Bank to R. M. Whitney.

"BURLINGTON, February 12, 1835.

"Your letter, dated the 23d ult., is received, on the subject of an agency of the deposit banks. I have communicated the same to our board of directors, and am instructed to say that, in all business transactions with the Government, they have and wish to meet their views, and do the public business intrusted to them to their satisfaction.

"So far as this institution may be profited by an agency, as it respects business, public or private, they will cheerfully pay a sum commensurate to such advantages."

Cashier of Bank of Burlington to R. M. Whitney.

"BURLINGTON, January 25, 1836.

"Being located in the same place where a branch of the United States Bank was established, and as we are a deposit bank, where the branch has discontinued its operations, the public seem to expect that we could at once afford the same facilities and accommodations that they enjoyed when the branch was doing business. There has been, on the part of our directors, a desire to meet this expectation; and the consequence has been, that a very sensible change has taken place, politically, in favor of the Government; and as it is our desire to strengthen these sentiments, we feel that it is important to afford to our farmers and merchants the coming spring a pretty extensive accommodation, especially about the time of the wool clip. * * * * *

"My wish is, that you would have an interview with the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of allowing the present amount to remain, or, rather, that the warrants in favor of the pension agent should not be made upon the deposit for next spring."

* On the 10th of March, several days after this speech was delivered, Mr. Peyton called for a copy of Mr. Woodbury's account, to be published with his remarks, but was informed by the clerk that Mr. Woodbury had withdrawn his account. Ten dollars saved for distribution among the States.

Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill.

[H. OF R.]

R. M. Whitney to the Cashier of Bank of Burlington."WASHINGTON, March 18, 1836.

"I called upon the Secretary of the Treasury, and went to the Commissioner of Pensions, and can assure you that you have nothing to fear from the efforts of your neighbors. No other bank will be employed by either Department unless compelled to do so by the legislation of Congress. Mr. Everett, a member from your State, has been trying to have the pensions paid in another quarter, (Windsor, I suppose.)

"You need not fear but I will look after and protect your business."

From same to same."WASHINGTON, August 23, 1835.

"As it may be important for you to know, as a guide in your operations, I can state to you that, until January next, I feel confident you may safely calculate upon the Treasury deposits being kept up to the maximum of what your bank can hold; say three fourths of the amounts of capital."

Now, sir, does not that paper at once convince the most incredulous that this bank applied for the use of the public money for the purpose of effecting political changes in favor of the administration? It will not be denied that it did have that effect in some degree, and that the bank continued to exert its influence for like purposes, especially about the time of the elections—about the time of the wool clip—when they were told they should have liberally of the public money: the people were literally fleeced—dyed in the wool, sir; dyed in the wool. In the month of August, Whitney tells them "you shall have as much as your bank can hold" for six months to come.

I wish here to say, sir, that no man can feel more the necessity that I felt myself under, as a man and as a member of this body, to discharge what I think should be considered a solemn duty to my country, and a duty also to myself, to take the course which I have done in this investigation. And, sir, I knew well what I would have to deal with. I may well say that, considering the use made of the executive power, I am astonished we have been able to do any thing; but we have accomplished more than the most sanguine of us ever contemplated. I was assailed in the official journal, as you well remember, sir, as having made a false and slanderous statement in regard to Mr. Taney and Reuben Whitney. Mr. Taney has himself testified to the truth of my statement. But, sir, I have had more to bear, and I have borne it more patiently from others than even from Mr. Whitney. Sir, I care nothing about Whitney. If I did not think he was doing a serious public injury, neither his name nor his concerns would ever occupy my thoughts. I solemnly believe, before God and man, before this House and the country, that Reuben M. Whitney has been stimulated to treat me with rudeness and with personal violence. Hence his course in the committee, where he cast, as it were, his offensive card in my face, coupled with the most insulting frowns on account of what I had stated in relation to Mr. Taney's refusing to countenance him. Out of that transaction statements have gone forth and been scattered far and wide, comments have been made, facts have been sworn to, which, Mr. Chairman, never had an existence. I am as charitable, I hope, as any one to my fellow-men, but gentlemen have stated what I know to be incorrect.

Sir, that my friend from Virginia [Mr. Wise] on that occasion left his chair, and walked with me when I went to Whitney, and rebuked him for the manner in which he had treated me, is not only unlikely, but impossible. Sir, before God, such a thing never happened! The gentlemen gave their statements upon oath. Well, sir; that only shows, perhaps, that they might have been at the time in a condition not to recollect any thing. I was astonished at the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FAIRFIELD] stringing together such a set of oaths as he did, and that other gentleman should take a copy of them to swear to; nay, more, that there should be a concerted movement upon the subject of getting those oaths upon the journal of this House. Now, that I made use of unbecoming language, I will not deny, because I was highly excited at the time; but I instantly apologized to the committee. I would not have used such language, certainly, under ordinary circumstances of excitement. But, sir, that gentlemen should calmly and deliberately undertake to make it a matter of record in this House, is unaccountable, and wholly unprecedented. Why, sir, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FAIRFIELD] strung together a set of oaths that would prove to every body in America that I was no swearer. He has strung them like a silly country girl stringing birds' eggs, hen eggs, duck eggs, goose eggs, and turkey eggs—mixed with a little Yankee pumpkin—out of time, and out of place, without sense or meaning in them. Sir, I can account for this but in one way, as I am unwilling to attribute improper motives to that gentleman, who is one of that class of Christians who consider swearing an unpardonable sin, but can look with perfect complacency upon the robberies perpetrated upon the Treasury by Reuben M. Whitney.

I say, sir, I cannot charitably account for that gentleman's want of memory but in one way; and that was the manner in which Dr. Gloster's friends accounted for his mistake on a certain occasion. It was during the late war, on the Northwestern frontier, when the Doctor, with a small detachment, ventured out from the main army, and remained all night. About daylight next morning he was seen coming, panting and blowing. "What's the matter, Doctor?" "Matter enough, (cried he;) a thousand Indians out yonder, firing all around the camp, and have killed every one of the boys." "Is it possible? What party can it be?" "Tecumseh's party, for I heard General Tecumseh say, as plain as any thing, 'I'll have Doctor Gloster's scalp before day, by G—.'" Well, sir, all the boys soon came in, one at a time, and it turned out to be nothing but the howl of a wolf which had alarmed the excellent Doctor's fears so much.

And, sir, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. GILBERT], what was his condition, that he is able to swear with such particularity on every word which passed on the occasion? He was between a wild and a shy, peeping for a place to get out, like a wild turkey out of a pen, alarmed, no doubt, at the giant frame of Reuben. He knew about as much of what passed as the lame captain did of the battle which he did not wait to see. You recollect the case of the lame captain, sir: he was in the woods with his men, and suddenly coming upon the Indians, cried out, "Boys, here they are!" peeping under the bushes, said he, "they are very numerous, and my opinion is they'll whip us; but fight hard, retreat in good order; as I'm a little lame, I'll go now."

But, sir, I forgive these gentlemen for all they have said, or thought, or have sworn against me, because I hope they believed it.

Mr. Chairman, I have but one other question to ask, and then I take leave of Reuben M. Whitney forever—and that is, who is he? How came he in the Treasury? Why is he possessed of so much power? Why, sir, gentlemen, under the 29th interrogatory, have gotten a few favorable responses, "so far as the witness knew, individually, as to his character for integrity and capacity." They got hold of one man, a director in the Moyamensing Bank, who would not trust him with his private affairs, from his general character. When we asked Levi Woodbury whether, from his general character, he would believe Reuben M. Whitney on his oath, the majority of the committee would not let the question be put, even to him. Why, sir, Whitney invited an investigation into his character: he went to Canada, and Philadelphia, and Washington, and challenged the world to inquire into his conduct and standing. Yet, sir, whenever, in the committee, we approached his character, gentlemen shrunk back, and proclaimed that we had no power to ascertain whether this secret Treasury agent was an honest man and a patriot, or a rogue, bankrupt, and traitor.

H. OF R.]

“I, sir, propounded the following interrogatories, which were rejected:

“32. Do you know R. M. Whitney's general character? If yea, what is his character as an honest, trustworthy man? Would you, from his general character, believe him on his oath, or trust him when he was subject, by great pecuniary temptation, to err?

“Ay—Mr. Peyton.

“Noes—Messrs. Martin, Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet, Garland.

“33. Has he or has he not borne the general character, at and about Philadelphia, of having been a traitor, and one of the British emissaries who were engaged in smuggling gold from the United States of America, to pay the British troops in Canada, during the late war, and of having acknowledged and made a boast of the same to gentlemen in Philadelphia? Did he not sustain the general character in Philadelphia, after the war, of being the keeper of a gambling-house, or faro bank, in that city? Does he not now sustain the character of a bankrupt, who is defrauding his just creditors, while he is living in the prison-bounds of this city in a style of princely extravagance?

“Ay—Mr. Peyton.

“Noes—Messrs. Garland, Pierce, Fairfield, Martin, Gillet.”

Now, sir, is Reuben M. Whitney fit to be trusted with the management of your treasure? Is he not a notorious bankrupt, now living within the prison bounds of this city? I have filed with the minority report a transcript, which the committee rejected, but which I obtained myself from the records, showing the amount of judgments now in damages against him in the court of this District to be upwards of $95,000. Sir, we offered to prove, not only that Whitney was a bankrupt, but that he was guilty of the most dishonest practices to defraud his just creditors. We also offered to prove a declaration of Whitney himself, that, if his creditors would not compromise with him upon his own terms, he would take the benefit of the insolvent act. We could have proved that all that splendid and princely establishment of his belonged, or had been made over, to others, and that he did not own a dollar in his own name. And yet, sir, he gives diplomatic dinners. His Britannic Majesty's minister lives not in a more costly and magnificent style than does Reuben M. Whitney. Yes; you who have sat at his board, and feasted at his table, ate the meat and drank the wine of his honest creditors. Yes, sir, on the very night of that day when Whitney took his stand in contempt of the authority of this House, in defiance of its power, he gave a splendid dinner, and many, I know, of the members of this House attended. The President elect, the Vice President elect, and all the heads of the departments, went up to do him reverence. Why, sir, he greatly surpassed your ten-dollar Secretary. Nine hundred invited guests; 500 dollars in champagne: not Woodbury's sort, but the best which the public money could command. Sir, let me ask you, if the committee had then reported him for a contempt, what condition would this House have been in the next morning to pass on his case? Would gentlemen here, with Whitney's wine thumping in their heads, with his beef eaten the night before still undigested, have been prepared to send him to prison, as a court of justice would have done, there to remain until he was willing to answer interrogatories? Reuben, perhaps, thinks, as many others do, that the shortest way to men's affections is down their throats!

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is a little remarkable that even gentlemen who were on the bank committee of 1832, where his perjuries and his treason were proven, and who could not, consequently, have been ignorant of his character, were of that party. Many gentlemen, doubtless, went without knowing his character; some went by the force of example; others because, perhaps, they liked a good dinner more than they hated Reuben M. Whitney, though they knew his character.

Mr. PEXTON here read from the minority report of the bank committee of 1832:

“There was one occurrence, during the transactions of Thomas Biddle & Co. with the bank, which merits particular notice.

“An informer and witness, by the name of Whitney, who had formerly been a director of the bank, was produced, who declared, upon oath, that, in May, 1834, two of the cashiers of the bank had informed him that Thomas Biddle & Co. had been in the habit of drawing money out of the bank on a deposit of stock in the teller's drawer, without paying interest; and that the president of the bank had discounted two notes, one for Thomas Biddle & Co. and one for Charles Biddle, without the authority of the directors. This witness stated that he went with these officers of the bank and examined the teller's drawer and the discount book, and found the facts which had been stated to him verified by the examination. He also stated, to give additional certainty to his averments, that he made a memorandum at the time, with the dates of the transactions; which memorandum he produced to the committee. Having thus unalterably fixed the date of the transaction, as if by some fatality, he went on to say that he immediately proceeded into the room of Mr. Biddle, the president, and remonstrated with him against the irregular proceedings, and that Mr. Biddle promised him that they should not occur again.

“In the interval between the adjournment of the committee that day and its meeting the next, a member of the board of directors suggested to Mr. Biddle that he was, about the time of this alleged transaction, in the city of Washington. On examining the journal of the board, and the letter book, it was found, by entries and letters, that, for several days previous to the alleged interview between the president and Whitney, and for several days afterwards, the president was absent on a visit to this city, on the business of the bank, and General Cadwalader was acting as president in his place. Thus was this artfully devised story, which was intended to blast the reputation of a high-minded and honorable man, through one of those extraordinary interpositions by which Providence sometimes confounds the contrivances of the wicked, made to recoil upon the head of its inventor, who must forever stand forth as a blasted monument of the speedy and retributive justice of Heaven.

“The following resolution was unanimously adopted by the committee, a majority of whom were the political friends of said Whitney, and three of that majority, to wit, Messrs. F. Thomas of Maryland, C. C. Cambreleng of New York, and Colonel R. M. Johnson of Kentucky, are now members of the House of Representatives:

Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill.

[H. OF R.]

"Resolved, That the charges brought against the president, of lending money to Messrs. Thomas Biddle & Co. without interest, and of discounting notes for that house, and for Charles Biddle, without the sanction of the directors, are without foundation; and that there does not exist any ground for charging the president with having shown, or manifested any disposition to show, any partiality to those individuals in their transactions with the bank.

"The following questions were propounded to said Whitney, when examined before that committee in 1832:

"Question by Mr. Watmough. How long have you been a resident of this country?

"Answer. I was born in this country.

"Question by the same. Were you not a resident of Canada during the late war?

"Answer. I resided there from 1808 to the spring of 1816, when I removed to this city.

"Question by Mr. Adams. In what place in Canada did you reside during the late war?

"Answer. In Montreal. I went to Canada as a clerk. I afterwards became engaged in business on my own account. When the war broke out, I had a great deal of money scattered about in that country, having sold much on credit; all of which I should have sacrificed by leaving it when war was declared. I remained, therefore, having the permission of the British Government to do so.

"Question by Mr. Adams. Did you ever ask permission of the Government of the United States to remain there?

"Answer. I never did.

"Question by Mr. Adams. On what conditions did the British Government permit you to remain in Canada during the war?

"Answer. I took an oath to observe the laws of the country while I remained there.

"Question. Did you understand that to be an oath of allegiance?

"Answer. No; I did not, permanently."

Not "permanently." No, sir, he only took an oath of allegiance during the war, from 1812 to 1816.

Sir, this lame apology, which places Whitney's avarice in bold relief with his patriotism, is wholly untrue. He was a traitor, who obtained the favor of the King of England by perpetrating treason against his own country, as he did the favor of General Jackson, by perjury against the bank, of which he had been a director.

How could these gentlemen, who were on the bank committee, [Messrs. FRANCIS THOMAS of Maryland, RICHARD M. JOHNSON of Kentucky, and CHURCHILL C. CAMBRELENG of New York,] and who voted for that resolution which affixed to his name eternal infamy—how could they honor him with their presence at that dinner?

Mr. THOMAS explained, and, as a member of that committee, stated several circumstances which induced him to believe that Mr. Whitney was not perjured, but had honestly stated what he appeared to have sufficient grounds for believing.

Mr. PEYTON then called on Mr. J. Q. ADAMS, to know if what he had read from the report of the minority of the bank committee was not correct.

Mr. ADAMS said that, after the course which he had deemed it his duty to take throughout the whole of this investigation, that is, of taking no part in it whatever, he had hoped to be spared the necessity of saying one word to the House in relation to it, or having any connexion with it, or with the individual whose very name he had no disposition to pronounce. But as the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. PEYTON,] after reading a passage from the report of the minority of the committee appointed to investigate the condition of the Bank of the United States in April, 1832, to which report his (Mr. A's) name was subscribed, had thought proper specially to call upon him to confirm the statement which he had read, he felt it was no longer proper for him to remain silent; but, in what he was about to say to the committee, he should confine himself strictly within the call of the gentleman from Tennessee, with the exception of a very few remarks upon what had fallen from the member from Maryland, who had also been a member of the bank investigating committee of 1832, [Mr. THOMAS.]

There were three reports made from that committee to the House of Representatives, with a considerable mass of documents appended to each: the report of a bare majority, which had the assent of the gentleman from Maryland; a report written by the chairman of the committee, (Judge Clayton, of Georgia,) who afterwards, in a manner highly honorable to himself, and with a magnanimity as generous as it was rare, publicly retracted, in this hall, every word of it that was disparaging to the character of the president of the bank; the report of the minority, from which the gentleman from Tennessee has read the extract which he now called on Mr. ADAMS to avouch; and a separate report made by Mr. ADAMS himself, and signed by one other member of the committee. The report from which the extract had been read was written, not by Mr. ADAMS, but by a member then among the most eminent men in the House, and since that time Governor of the State of South Carolina, (Mr. McDuffie.) It had also been subscribed by Mr. ADAMS, who, in his own report, had given his own views in relation to the transactions referred to in the extract just read. That extract, he repeated, was not written by him, but he had subscribed his name to the report in which it was contained; and, as he stood in presence of God and of the House, he now believed every word of the extract to be true, as he did believe when he signed the report.

With regard to the explanations and revisions of opinions of the gentleman from Maryland, with which he had favored the committee, Mr. ADAMS would not have thought himself called upon to notice them, but that they had an appearance, he could not believe intentional, of reviving and countenancing dark suspicions of dishonesty against a man as honorable as any one that breathed upon earth; a man basely slandered and persecuted, and whom he numbered among the dearest of his friends: he meant the president of the Bank of the United States.

The resolution read by the gentleman from Tennessee, "that the charges brought against the president of the bank, of lending money to Thomas Biddle and Co. without interest, and of discounting notes for that house, and for Charles Biddle, without the sanction of the directors, are without foundation; and that there does not exist any grounds for charging the president with having shown, or manifested any disposition to show, any partiality to those individuals, in their transactions with the bank," is stated in the report to have been unanimously adopted by the committee. It was so understood at the time. But now, the gentleman seems not to know whether he voted for it or not. He says that if the yeas and nays had been taken, he should probably have voted for it then; but, after time for reconsideration and re-examination of the evidence, he has had occasion to alter his opinion. He withdraws now, at the end of five years, whatever credit his assent to that resolution may have given to the unanimous acquittal by the committee of the president of the bank from a charge maliciously and infamously false. He is not yet quite willing to assume the burden of defending the general character of the delator. He knows very little about him, and has been but once in his house; but he thinks his charges against the president of the bank were true, or, at least, not wilfully false; because, notwithstanding they were flatly contradicted and denied by every individual witness to whom he appealed for confirmation of his statements, they were yet confirmed by the entries on the books of the bank; and because Mr. Philander Stevens, then a member of Congress, did, even while the committee were at Philadelphia, obtain a loan by order of the president, and without a vote of the directors. The transaction with Mr. Stevens was not within the commission of the investigating committee, and was satisfactorily explained and accounted for at the time. But the charge affecting the integrity of the president of the bank was, that, by his direction, Thomas Biddle & Co., brokers, and his relations, were habitually allowed to take large sums of money out of the bank, giving merely their notes for the amount, or depositing mere slips of paper, or pledges of stock, in the teller's drawer, all without the knowledge of the directors, and without payment of interest, while they had the use of the moneys. This was no occasional irregularity, or incidental and inadvertent looseness of practice in the hurry and multiplicity of business; it was a direct charge of gross malversation in office against the president of the bank, and as such it was first brought forward in the committee. To substantiate this, a dirty old paper, containing a minute of two sums of money, thus alleged to have been taken from the teller's drawer, on the 23th of May, forty-five thousand, and on the 26th of May, twenty-four thousand dollars, was produced, and sworn to be minutes taken at the time; and it was sworn that, when this practice was thus detected, Mr. Whitney ordered these sums should be entered upon the books, which was accordingly done; that he immediately went into the president's room; there expostulated with him against this practice; that the president colored up very much, and promised that it should not happen again. The criminality of this charge, had it been true, consisted in the allowance to the brokers to take out money and use it without payment of interest; and the pretended interview and expostulation with the president, and his blushes upon detection, were to prove a consciousness in him of dishonesty and breach of trust. Now, all this was not only positively and most solemnly denied by the president of the bank himself, but every individual to whom Whitney appealed to sustain his allegation of facts, as flatly denied them—the teller, the discount clerk, the cashier then of the bank, every one of them, denied every part of such a transaction as having occurred within their knowledge. When every individual named as having acted in the transaction had thus explicitly denied his statements, he resorted for confirmation of his narrative to his own testimony, as he had told the story to others shortly after the dates of his minutes. He had told it to a Mr. Wilson Hunt; and Mr. Hunt was examined by the committee. Mr. Hunt stated that Whitney had spoken of certain loans which he said had been made to Thomas Biddle & Co. without the knowledge of the directors, and had shown him a memorandum which he had taken of such loans; but he denied unhesitatingly, and with a strong expression of surprise, that he had ever told him they were without interest, and said he was very sure, if he had told him so, it was impossible he should have forgotten it.

[Mr. ANTHONY interrupted Mr. ADAMS by raising a question of order, and objecting that these statements were not relevant to the subject under consideration. The chairman (Mr. PIERCE, of New Hampshire) said the debate had taken so wide a range already, that he not feel himself authorized to call Mr. ADAMS to order, but thought he might proceed, unless the committee should direct otherwise. Mr. ADAMS said he had very reluctantly risen at the sudden and unexpected call of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. PAXTON.] He had added a few remarks, which he thought called for by those of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. THOMAS,] but nothing could be further from his intention than to proceed a hair's breadth beyond the rules of order; nor would he now proceed without express authority so to do from the chairman or from the committee. Some debate then arose; the chairman referred the question to the committee, and two successive divisions, by tellers, took place; on both of which a majority of the voters were for authorizing Mr. ADAMS to proceed, the want of a quorum on the first division having rendered the second necessary. The chairman then directed Mr. ADAMS to proceed. He was twice or three times interrupted or replied to by Mr. THOMAS. The following is the substance of what he said, though possibly some of the preceding and some of the following observations may be transferred from the order in which they were spoken.]

Upon Mr. THOMAS's last replication Mr. ADAMS said: Mr. Chairman: The gentleman from Maryland is anxious to have the last word, and he shall have it. He bore an honorable testimony to the unsullied integrity of the president of the bank, by assenting to the resolution read by the gentleman from Tennessee; and now he does not know whether he voted for it or not. He has had new lights, by a re-examination of the evidence; and, above all, he believes Whitney's story, because his minute of the two sums taken from the teller's drawer on the 23th and 26th May, 1824, is confirmed by the entries on the books of the bank. Now, sir, there are two ways of accounting for the conformity of Mr. Whitney's minutes and the books of the bank: one, that the entries and the books were conformed to the minutes; and the other, that the minutes were made conformable to the entries on the books. The gentleman from Maryland chooses to believe the first of these alternatives, and thence derives all his confidence in Whitney's testimony. I believe (said Mr. A.) that the minutes were made from the entries on the books; to which Whitney, as a director, always had access. Whitney swore at first that the entries on the books of those sums taken out of the teller's drawer on the 25th and 26th of May were made by his order. The clerk who made the entries swore, not only that they were made without his order, but that, if he had assumed to give such an order, it would not have been obeyed; no single director having any right to give such an order. Whitney then, with the permission of the committee, revised his testimony, to correct what he called discrepancies, and said his impression was that he directed the two loans to be put upon the books, or that he was informed that they had been placed there, and that he confirmed their having done so. Confirmed their having done so! What was there to confirm? His charge was, that there had been no entries on the books till he had ordered they should be made. The gentleman from Maryland relies upon the confirmation of the entries on the books. There is not one tittle of evidence on the books to show that there ever was such a transaction as Whitney's going with Andrews and Wilson to the teller's drawer, and to the discount clerk's desk, nor that Whitney's memorandum was made at that time. Andrews, Wilson, Patterson, (the first teller,) and Burtes, (the discount clerk,) denied positively all recollection of any such transaction having occurred; and these are the four persons with whom, and in whose presence, he had sworn that it took place. With regard to the non-payment of interest upon the loans to Thomas Biddle & Co., of which Whitney swore Wilson had told him, Wilson denied with indignation that he had ever told him of or known any such thing. Was there any confirmation of this charge on the face of the books? Not a particle. The face of the books, and all the witnesses, proved directly the reverse; and in this consisted the gravamen of the charge. It was not the mere hasty, incautious practice of loaning money, upon deposits of stocks, for three or four, ten or fifteen days, charged as cash, and repaid, with interest, to a day and hour; it was the embezzlement of the funds of the bank by unlicensed loans, to favorites and kinsmen, without interest. That was the charge to which Whitney swore against the president of the bank; and which the books of the bank, and every witness to whom he appealed for confirmation of his testimony, contradicted and disproved.

There was not a shadow of evidence that any such a transaction as his going to the teller's drawer, or the discount clerk's desk, with the cashiers, ever occurred. They all denied any recollection of such an incident; but the remainder of his story, of an immediate private interview with the president, his remonstrance against the continuance of the practice, and the president's blushing promise that it should cease—of the falsehood of all this there was other conclusive proof besides the positive denial, upon oath, of the president himself. The dates upon the memorandum, corresponding with the entries on the books of the bank, fix this transaction, if it happened at all, upon the 27th of May, 1824. Now, it turned out that the president of the bank, on that day, and for a week before, and several days after, was not at Philadelphia, but at Washington; so that the loans and the deposits of stocks were made in his absence, and altogether without his knowledge—General Cadwalader then acting as president of the bank. The dates of the memorandum had fixed the time of the discovery and expostulation so unalterably, that if it did not happen then, there was no pretence that it could have happened at all. The whole foundation of fact upon which this fabulous fabrication was erected appears to be, that on the 25th and 26th of May, 1824, Thomas Biddle & Co. received, upon interest, from the bank, considerable sums of money, on the security of deposited stock, and perhaps at other times upon their notes. That these loans were not for definite terms of thirty, sixty, or ninety days, but for an indefinite and small number of days, after which the cash was replaced, and the interest paid for all the time they had had the use of the money. One of the occasions of this practice was, that Thomas Biddle & Co., as brokers, were agents of the bank itself for the purchase of bills of exchange, sometimes to the amount of millions in a few days. As they purchased the bills in the market, they needed the money to pay for them; and in the process of such negotiations the money for payment may be wanted before the equivalent can be delivered. In such cases, moneys to a very large amount might appear to be borrowed by the brokers, when their real debt to the bank would be little or nothing; and such was the amount of all the charges against the bank which formed the subject of inquiry to the investigating committee of 1832.

Especially was every charge against the integrity of the president of the bank, at that time, signally defeated and confounded, notwithstanding the candor of the gentleman from Maryland; that candor of which he now makes such liberal profession, and of which that committee had abundant demonstration throughout the whole course of their labors. Even a majority of that committee, hostile as they were to the Bank of the United States, did, in the resolution read now by the gentleman from Tennessee, bear their unequivocal testimony to the integrity of the president of the bank, upon the very point with regard to which it has been impeached. The gentleman from Maryland accepted that resolution as a substitute for one of non-committal, which he himself had offered; and now he withdraws that acceptance, and does not know whether he voted for the resolution or not.

It is not, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of interposing in the good offices of the gentleman from Maryland in behalf of the individual whose character and conduct have recently occupied so much of the time of this House, that I have said thus much. Of them I have no disposition to discourse, or to open my lips: I rose merely to answer to the call of the gentleman from Tennessee, and to vindicate the untainted honor of my friend, which I am not disposed in silence to hear assailed in this place, either by open assault or by insidious insinuation.

Mr. THOMAS reaffirmed his statement, to the effect that the testimony of R. M. Whitney on the occasion referred to was apparently corroborated by the documents and the books of the United States Bank, and that the charge of perjury was not made out against him.

Mr. PEYTON resumed. I will not, Mr. Chairman, repeat what is better understood, and much more ably expressed, by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Adams.] I will take one admission of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. Thomas,] which will seal the fate and stamp the character of Reuben M. Whitney beyond redemption. He bears witness to the honorable bearing and unimpeachable character of the officers of the bank, and says they are incapable of falsehood, but attempts an escape for Whitney on the ground of mistake. That is impossible. Whitney swears that Thomas Biddle & Co. "had been in the habit of drawing money out of the bank without paying interest; that the president of the bank had discounted notes for Thomas Biddle & Co. and Charles Biddle, without the authority of the directors; that, on a certain occasion, and on a given day, he went into the president's room, remonstrated with and extorted a promise from him that he would not be guilty of such favoritism again. Now, sir, every officer of that bank solemnly swore that there was not one word of truth in any one of these charges. There is ground for mistake; there must be perjury somewhere; the gentleman acquits the officers of the bank. Could the president have forgotten it, if Whitney had broken into his room, and have given him such a rebuke, and have extorted from him such a promise? Impossible! Here I drop Reuben M. Whitney's perjury. Let gentlemen reconcile it if they can, and associate with him if they choose. It is a matter of taste, about which I will not quarrel with them.

A few words more, Mr. Chairman, and I have done. When the true patriot, quitting his peaceful avocations in the workshop or the field, dropping his plough handles or his planes, regardless of home and its endearments, tearing himself from the wife of his bosom, and shaking off the children even that cling around his knees, rushed to the rescue of his bleeding country; when the star-spangled banner, consecrated and hallowed as it was, and is, with so many and such glorious recollections, was seen streaming to the breeze, all bathed in blood, its crimson folds appealing to every American heart to rally around and defend it; when the cloud of war, lurid with the cinders of the Capitol, hung over this devoted city; when, on the night of the 23d and morning of the ever-glorious 8th, General Jackson, with the chivalry of the West, was winning imperishable renown, and rearing to the American name a monument which will stand a landmark on the steeps of fame whilst Mississippi rolls his waters to the ocean, where, then, was Reuben M. Whitney? A traitor in the hostile camp! The sworn subject and officer of a foreign Power! A British commissary, smuggling gold, and driving herds, to pay and feed the British troops! Could he, with one throb of American feeling in his bosom, have remained within hearing of his country's cannon, peeling on the plains of Chippewa and Bridgewater, and thundering from the leaguered battlements of Erie, without trampling in the dust his traitor's livery, and adding one arm to those which struck for victory and his native land!

H. OF R.]

Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill.

[MARCH 2, 1837.]

Sir, he could, and did; and yet this man is high in the confidence of an Executive who is mainly indebted for his station to the laurels which he won in that contest, and is enabled to defy with impunity the process of a committee of Congress! Gaines, and Scott, and other gallant spirits, whose achievements brighten so many glorious pages of our history, are disregarded, censured, and sought to be disgraced, while this minion of favoritism is to be shielded and protected, in contempt of justice, and in defiance of the lawful authority of this House.

When Mr. PEXTON had concluded his remarks,

Mr. HAMER said: No one regrets more deeply than myself the necessity to which I have been driven of addressing the committee at this late period of the session, and at such an unseasonable hour of the night.* I know the anxiety which is felt by every gentleman to vote upon the question under discussion, and to act upon the bill itself; and were this an ordinary case, I should yield to this feeling, and forego any remarks upon the present occasion. But it is not. The attacks made upon the majority of the investigating committee by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PEXTON] are of such a character as to demand a reply. It is due to myself, as one of that majority, and to the gentlemen with whom I acted, that we should be heard in our defence. I must entreat the indulgence of gentlemen, therefore, whilst I briefly notice some of the charges which he has presented against us.

I promise to be as brief as the circumstances of the case will admit. I shall not detain the House by reading large masses of irrelevant matter, having no connexion with the proposition before us. Neither will I interweave subjects which bear no analogy to the question in debate, and which would answer as well for a speech upon one subject as another. If I desired to make a discourse for electioneering purposes, to affect my own constituents or the public at large, I would run rapidly over the different heads of it, and afterwards write out and print the details, without troubling the House to listen to what is not only very uninteresting, but is pernicious in its consequences, by wasting the time that is now so valuable to the country.

Sir, I had hoped that when the reports of the committee had been laid upon our table, and were ordered to be printed, the members would all have been willing to see the views of the majority and of the minority, as well as those of the honorable gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. JOHNSON,] who has made a separate report, not being able to agree fully with either the majority or the minority, published to the world. I had supposed that each member would content himself with allowing these several reports, accompanied by the journal of our proceedings, to be printed and laid before Congress and the American people, and let them judge between us. They will decide who is right and who is wrong. By their decision I am willing to abide.

But, sir, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PEXTON] has thought proper to pursue a different course. He has come forward, and by two successive motions has afforded himself an opportunity to make a very violent onset upon the majority, in which he has done them great injustice. His speech is to be published, I presume, and will go out in advance of the reports and the journals, giving a direction to public opinion before the official proceedings have reached the people. The effect of this movement upon his part must necessarily be to prejudice the public mind against the majority of the committee, and to disqualify the country, in some measure, to give an impartial verdict when the facts shall have been laid before them. These consequences can only be averted by a full and fair exposition of the case; by a statement which shall exhibit the gross misconceptions and palpable errors of the gentleman from Tennessee in regard to this whole affair.

In whatever point of view we consider the appointment and proceedings of this committee, we shall find its history to be of a most extraordinary character. The resolution was passed merely to gratify a few individuals in this House, and a very small party in the country. A large majority of the members here, and an overwhelming majority of the American people, were satisfied that no improper connexion existed between the Treasury Department and R. M. Whitney. The violent declamation to the contrary, both in this House and in the community, had produced very little effect. The explanations published by the friends of the administration had convinced impartial men—all men whose judgments were not warped by party feelings and prejudices—that Mr. Whitney was merely a corresponding agent of the deposit banks, employed and paid by them; having no official station; no power to bind the banks by any contract he could make, and no control whatever over the public money. Still there were gentlemen who asserted the contrary; and I dare say they believed their charges to be true. They insisted that, if we would give them a committee, they would prove this connexion to exist, and that it was a most dangerous and corrupt union, jeopardizing the safety of all the public treasure, and constituting this agent a great "money king," who could wield the entire revenues of the country to overturn the public liberties, or to accomplish any designs of personal or political ambition. We know this to be otherwise. The great body of the American people knew it was not so. Still we gave them a committee to satisfy them; and now, after having been in session for five or six weeks, and procuring and immense mass of testimony, what do we hear? The gentleman from Tennessee comes in, and proclaims that they have proven a great deal more than he and his friend from Virginia [Mr. WISE] ever charged, more than they ever imagined; but they would have proven more still, if the committee had not been "packed" by the Speaker, so as to vote down the interrogatories which they desired to ask the witnesses, and thus suppress the truth. I shall not attempt to compare the charges made by these gentlemen with the proof they have adduced. The country will do that. When the facts are laid before the people, they will speak in a voice that will be understood by us all. But I shall presently notice what has been proven, so that each side of the question may be fairly considered, and a comparison can then be made by any one who chooses to undertake the task for his own satisfaction. Before I do this, however, I must advert to the charge which has been made against the Speaker of this House.

The gentleman complains that there were six friends of the administration placed upon the committee, and but three of the opposition. Why, sir, this is very nearly in the proportion which the parties bear to each other in the House. The friends of the administration are nearly double in number to those of the opposition. It was fair, then, to appoint the committee in reference to this state of things. But does the gentleman mean to imply, by this complaint, that, in these high party times, any other Speaker would have acted differently? What could be expected but that, in the appointment of a committee, demanded, in part, for political effect, and designed to have some political influence in the community, the Speaker would give a preponderance to his own party? The minority have no right to complain. They can always make out a separate report, as they have done in this instance, and present their own views to the people. If the majority vote down their questions, and refuse to make inquiries which have been authorized by the House, the minority can show these votes to their constituents, and thus appeal from the decisions of the majority. Indeed, they can make more, in this manner, out of what is not proven than out of what is; for they can imagine a thousand tales of secret corruption that would have been disclosed, provided they had been permitted to ask the questions which were suppressed by the votes of the dominant party; whereas the truth may be that, if the interrogatories had been propounded, the witnesses would have been unable to give any information on the subject.

Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill.

But I assert that, under similar circumstances, no Speaker has ever been known to act otherwise than to give his own political friends a preponderance. And I go further: I assert that there is not now an opposition member in this House who, if he had been Speaker, would not have given his friends a majority upon the committee. If there be such a one, I should like to see him, and know who he is. The truth is, that, in times of political and party excitement, we all feel and act very much alike upon such questions, and each one prefers his own party to that of his opponents. It is idle to raise this cry of "party" upon every occasion, when those who raise it would do the same things of which they complain, if they had the power.

The gentleman from Tennessee informs us that any Speaker who will "crawl to the chair" will remain there; and that, to do so, he must sacrifice independence, patriotism, and honor, and become a mere partisan! What does the gentleman mean by crawling? Does every man who stands by his party become a crawler? Why, sir, I have heard that the gentleman himself once had a friend who was a candidate for Speaker, and that the gentleman then thought it was somewhat important to his friend's success that he should be known to be a good party man. I have heard that he took some pains to convince those who doubted his friend's orthodoxy that he was a firm supporter of the administration, and therefore ought to receive the votes of the democratic party in the House. Perhaps he has changed his opinions since then. If so, no one has a right to complain, as every gentleman's opinions are his own, and he has a right to dispose of them as he thinks proper.

[Here Mr. PERRY rose to explain. He said, in substance, that, when Messrs. BELL and POLK were first candidates for Speaker, he went to the President and disabused his mind with regard to Mr. B., who was not electioneering for the office, and told him that Mr. P. had been seeking the support of some of the nullifiers.]

Mr. HAMER proceeded. I have no wish to discuss matters so long gone by, nor to enter into a comparison of the principles and merits of the two gentlemen who were then candidates for the Speaker's chair; but my object was to remind the gentleman that, three years ago, he himself thought it no crime for a Speaker to be a decided party man.

How was the present Speaker elevated to that high station? Sir, he was placed there on account of his eminent abilities, his long and well-tryed services in the cause of his country, his fidelity to the democratic principles of our Government, and because his party preferred him to any other man who was a candidate. Whilst he remains there, I have no doubt he will discharge his duties faithfully and fearlessly, without regard to the murmurs or complaints of his political opponents. If the gentleman thinks this crawling, so be it. In my opinion, it is a high and honorable career, which any man might be proud to follow.

Soon after the appointment of our committee, we met and organized. From the moment that we commenced our examinations, it was apparent that a radical difference of opinion existed between the majority and the minority, with respect to the powers of the committee. The majority thought that they had no authority to look into the affairs of the deposit banks, except what the Government derived from the contracts made with those banks for the safe keeping of the public money. Obtaining their charters not from Congress, like the late Bank of the United States, but from the State Governments, we could only control them in their operations so far as they had agreed to be subject to our direction. The Federal Government derives no more right to investigate their operations from the fact of having public money in their vaults as a deposit, than a private citizen does from having a similar amount of money there on general deposit. In either case, the deposit can be withdrawn whenever the depositor is dissatisfied, or he thinks the money unsafe; but in no case can the books and transactions of the corporation be examined, unless the bank voluntarily permits it; either by contract or by concession, when the request is made. So thought the majority. They looked to the contracts with the banks and to the resolution of the House for the extent of their power, and refused to go beyond them.

The minority seemed to think that we had some further control over the banks, on account of our money being there. They could see some analogy between these banks and the old Bank of the United States. The latter being subject to an examination, they supposed the former should be too; and that the right which the Government had to look after the public treasure drew after it the right, to some extent, of scrutinizing the operations of the deposit banks.

In the case of the Bank of the United States, we expressly reserved, in the charter, the authority to examine its books and concerns. We never pretended to derive the right from any other source. To insist that a right to search out all the hidden dealings of a bank necessarily results from its being a public depository, would establish a most dangerous principle. Let us carry it out into practical operation, and see to what it would lead. The State Governments are now depositories of public money. They have our treasure in their keeping, and are accountable to us for it, by the law of last session, in the same way that the banks are. According to this doctrine, having the right to look after our money, we could appoint a committee, and arm them with authority to examine all the proceedings of the State Governments. We could summon the Treasurer, the Auditor or Comptroller, the Secretary of State, the Judiciary, and even the Governor and the Legislature, before us, to give an account of their conduct, and to disclose to us the whole of their State policy! Who would submit to this? Is there a State in the Union that would degrade itself by submitting to be thus catechised? Not one. Yet this state of things results from an extension of the principle to which I have adverted.

Again: there was a difference of opinion among us as to the object of the House in appointing the committee. The minority seemed to entertain the opinion that the principal object was to ascertain the business and character of Reuben M. Whitney. They appeared to think that the resolution was a mere wolf-trap to catch a single individual; that the House had set us to catch him whilst he was filling his sack out of the public crib, and to seize him the moment his leg was in the trap, and bring him forthwith to justice. These gentlemen had so often denounced Mr. Whitney within the last year, that he was apparently uppermost in their thoughts upon all occasions. Their antipathy to him has become a sort of monomania. Indeed, I have sometimes fancied that, if they were in the last agonies of death—if the soul were about to separate from the body, and leave its frail tenement for another world—and some one should walk up, and gently whisper in the ear of the expiring man the words "Reuben M. Whitney!" this name would not only "stay the pulse of ebbing life," but, making a superhuman effort, he would instantly spring to his feet, and, with a wild shriek, cry "Traitor!" "Robber!" "Thief!" "Deposite banks!" "Public money!"

The majority of the committee did not suppose that the House passed the resolution for the single purpose of running down any one individual. We knew that if there was really a corrupt connexion between the Treasury and Mr. Whitney, or any one else, the House desired us to ascertain it, and to report the facts to them. We looked to the language of the resolution to see what was intended to be the scope of our inquiries. We endeavored to give a fair and liberal construction to that language, without imagining what latent intention might have been lurking in the mind of each member who voted for its adoption. This was our rule; and I am perfectly willing that the House and the people shall decide between us and the minority, who adopted a different one, as their course in the committee room will show when the proceedings are published.

Our committee is an extraordinary one in some other respects. One of the first things we did was to adopt a resolution, by which we admitted all the members of the House to be present at our deliberations. I opposed this, because it was both unprecedented and impolitic. From that day forth, libels were issued from the public presses against our committee. The proceedings were garbled and misrepresented in the most shameful manner. How the anonymous writers who made these publications obtained the knowledge of our votes and speeches I do not know; but the object they had in view was very manifest. It was to prejudice the community against the majority of the committee, and thereby break the force of our report when it should appear.

Well, sir, we proceeded with our investigations for nearly two months: meeting, as I said before, during a great part of that time, at ten in the morning, and remaining until ten and sometimes till eleven at night, with an interval of an hour for dinner. We neglected almost all the business of the House, and much of what belonged to our immediate constituents; we have cost the country some fifty or a hundred thousand dollars; and what have we found? Literally nothing. It is the old case of the mountain in labor, which brought forth a mouse. It was a game where the play was not worth the candle. The gentleman from Tennessee declares that they have proven more than they ever charged; and I am sure he thinks so, or he would not make the declaration; but I pronounce the investigation to be a complete failure. Every charge which has been made, from any quarter, implying that any agent of the deposit banks, or of the Treasury Department, had the control of all or of any portion of the public money, is not only unsustained, but is positively proven to be false. The oaths of the Secretary of the Treasury, of the subordinate officers of the Department, of the presidents and cashiers of the deposit banks, and of Reuben M. Whitney himself, all concur in the establishment of this fact, beyond all doubt or controversy. If the gentleman from Tennessee had not stated that he took an entirely different view of the testimony, I should have believed that, considering himself defeated, he had come forward with a speech to make a diversion in favor of himself and his friends. That gentleman, as well as every other one here, well knows the effect of a shout of victory. To proclaim, in a loud and confident tone of voice, that we have gained a triumph, often produces an impression upon those who hear us, that aids us materially in obtaining the very victory which is thus proclaimed in advance. The proclamation of the gentleman, where the journal and reports are never seen, will induce many a man to believe that he and his friends have been completely successful in this investigation; but those who read and think for themselves will come to a very different conclusion.

If the minority have fully sustained all their charges, and gone even beyond them, it is remarkable that such loud complaints are made of the illiberal and rigid construction given to our resolution by the majority of the committee. Yet the greater part of the gentleman's long speech was made up of these complaints. What did the resolution require of us?

1st. To ascertain "whether the several banks employed for the deposit of the public money have all, or any of them, by joint or several contract, employed an agent, to reside at the seat of Government, to transact their business with the Treasury Department."

2d. "What is the character of the business which he is so employed to transact."

3d. "What compensation he receives."

4th. "Whether such agent, if there be one, has been employed at the request or through the procurement of the Treasury Department."

5th. "Whether the business of the Treasury Department with said banks is conducted through the said agent."

6th. "And whether said agent receives any compensation from the Treasury Department."

These are the points submitted to us by the House, for our investigation. We examined them thoroughly; and, notwithstanding all the intimations to the contrary, I now defy the gentleman from Tennessee to show a single instance in which the majority of the committee voted to suppress any inquiry or interrogatory, which was authorized by a fair construction of the resolution of the House. Give me a jury of twelve honest, sensible men, of any party, and I will debate the point with him till doomsday, if we live so long, without the slightest apprehension of even partial defeat. So far were we from curtailing the inquiry, that if I have anything to reproach myself with, it is that I sometimes voted in favor of interrogatories which, strictly speaking, did not come within the scope of the resolution. But we were so anxious to give the minority no cause of complaint, that in doubtful cases we leaned to their side, and voted for the freedom of investigation. Such was my own feeling, and I believe it was the rule that guided the other members who voted with me.

In the course of our investigation, indeed almost at the threshold, we ascertained, distinctly, that there was no connexion whatever between the Treasury Department and Mr. Whitney, or any other agent of the deposit banks. The statements of the Secretary of the Treasury will be found on the pages of our printed journal.

* The following is the resolution of the House:

Resolved, That a committee of nine members be appointed, whose duty it shall be to inquire whether the several banks employed for the deposit of the public money have all, or any of them, by joint or several contract, employed an agent, to reside at the seat of Government, to transact their business with the Treasury Department; what is the character of the business which he is so employed to transact, and what compensation he receives; whether such agent, if there be one, has been employed at the request or through the procurement of the Treasury Department; whether the business of the Treasury Department with said banks is conducted through the said agent; and whether, in the transaction of any business confided to said agent, he receives any compensation from the Treasury Department; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. Garland of Virginia, Mr. Pierce of New Hampshire, Mr. Fairfield of Maine, Mr. Wise of Virginia, Mr. Gillet of New York, Mr. Johnson of Louisiana, Mr. Hamer of Ohio, Mr. Martin of Alabama, and Mr. Peyton of Tennessee, were appointed the said committee.

Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill.

[H. OF R.]

Speaking of the compensation paid to the agent, he says, (page 14,) "no request has ever been made to me for any such compensation, and no idea was ever entertained by me of acceding to it, if made, the agent being appointed by and for the banks, and not by or for the Department." In regard to Mr. Whitney's authority and business, he says, (page 11,) that the Department never found it necessary to call for the agent's authority, as it has never been necessary for him to execute any written official document binding the banks; and the contracts on file are all signed by the officers of the banks themselves.

On page 28 of the journal, we have Mr. Whitney's testimony in regard to himself. He swears that he holds "no office or agency whatever under the Government of the United States, or any department thereof; nor has he the control of any money or property whatever of the said Government, or any department; nor has he any agency whatever which relates to the public money, beyond acting as corresponding agent of some of the deposit banks."

Upon pages 32 and 33 will be found Mr. Woodbury's statement in regard to any influence of the Department in procuring the appointment of Mr. Whitney. He declares that no agent has been appointed at the request or through the procurement of the Treasury Department. By reference to pages 63 and 64, the following question and answer will be found:

"Has the Treasury Department any use whatever for such an agency as that of Reuben M. Whitney?"

Answer by Mr. Woodbury. "I am not aware that the Department has any use for such an agent."

Much has been said in the opposition newspapers, and in speeches here, of the circulars issued by Mr. Whitney to the receivers of land offices, directing them what kind of bank paper to receive in payment of the public lands. This subject was also examined. In answer to a question, Mr. Woodbury says, (page 41,) "I have never given to Mr. Whitney, or conferred on him, any authority to instruct the land receivers, in behalf of the Department, on any subject whatever." Mr. Whitney swears, (page 87,) that the circular sent to the land receivers, about which so much complaint has been made, was "a printed letter, and forwarded to the public land receivers by him as a mere matter of information," but not of "instructions." It was dated 29th of August, 1835. All the beautiful figures and eloquent declamation upon this subject seem to have been lost. The agent printed a letter, and sent copies of it to the receivers, as any other citizen might have done who took an interest in the state of the currency, and who had held a conversation with the Secretary of the Treasury; and upon this slender foundation a most magnificent fabric has been erected. Mr. Whitney is a "money king," an "adjunct Secretary," "a minion of executive power," who holds the purse-strings of the nation in his own hand.

Several other important disclosures have been made in the course of this examination. For the last three years, ever since the removal of the deposits from the United States Bank, the opposition have been endeavoring to make the people believe that the administration directed all the operations of the deposit banks, so as to produce political results favorable to the party in power. They have asked, in an indignant tone, "who can stand up against this tremendous money power, wielded by the Executive to sustain himself and to elect his successor?" Now, sir, so far from there being any truth in these charges, it turns out that the party politics of the stockholders, directors, and officers of the banks have had no influence whatever in their selection by the Secretary; and that, so far as any thing is known of their politics, a majority of them are against the administration. These facts are solemnly sworn to by Mr. Woodbury. His statements may be seen on pages 51 and 53 of the printed journal. Who, after this disclosure, will have the hardihood to stand up before the American people, and talk about the Executive wielding the purse of the nation to corrupt the votes and destroy the freedom of elections? What opposition man will muster the impudence to renew this stale falsehood, and give currency to what is now known to be utterly untrue? He who does so must assume the responsibility of proving the Secretary of the Treasury to be unworthy of belief; or he must ask the public to take his word, unsupported by a single fact, in preference to the statements of Governor Woodbury, made under the solemn sanctions of an oath. In either event, he will find that he has undertaken a task as difficult and hopeless as that of Sisyphus; and I shall be greatly mistaken if his burden does not drag him to the bottom of the hill, and crush him to atoms also when he shall have arrived there.

Another charge has been boldly made in regard to the influence of Mr. Whitney in obtaining a removal of the public deposits from one bank to another, and in the selection of deposit banks in the first instance. We have been told, that if a bank desired to be selected as a depository for the public money, it must go down upon its knees to Reuben M. Whitney. If a deposit bank wanted to retain its funds, or to get more from the Treasury, it must raise Mr. Whitney's salary or make him a present. Now, there is not one word of truth in this charge. I speak from the book, fully conscious of the strength of my expressions. Here is the testimony, on page 53 of the journal:

Question. "Has said Whitney ever solicited you to remove the public deposits from any bank or banks, or cease to make the public deposits in them? And if so, what was the character of the reasons assigned by him?"

Answer by Mr. Woodbury. "In no case whatever, that I recollect."

Question. "Has said Whitney ever recommended any bank or banks as banks of deposit, and used his influence with you, or any officer of the Government, to procure their selection?"

Answer by Mr. Woodbury. "I have no remembrance of a single case where Mr. Whitney first applied to the Department to have any bank selected; but while the question of some of them, afterwards appointed, has been pending, I have no doubt Mr. Whitney has spoken on the subject of the character or standing of one or two of the number selected, which were located in Pennsylvania, where he had resided, and was acquainted with their standing and business. But I remember no other case, and in those he used no recommendation or influence in their favor beyond the statement of facts on the point above named."

Here are the incontrovertible facts, standing in opposition to declamation and anonymous slander. Which is to be believed? Can any man hesitate upon that question? Are we to reverse all the established rules adopted in the administration of justice, and prefer mere hearsay and conjecture to unimpeachable testimony? He who does this, is not only willfully blind, but obstinately wicked; and it would be about as wise to enter into an argument with such a man as to reason with a tempest, and expect to stay its fury by an appeal to its sympathies or an address to its understanding.

Finally, sir, all the inquiries couched in the resolution of the House were fully negatived by the proofs adduced before the committee. We found—

1st. That the banks had no agent, at the seat of Government, "to transact their business with the Treasury Department."

2d. Therefore, such an agent had no business of any character whatsoever.

H. OF R.]

Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill.

[MARCH 2, 1837.]

3d. And such agent had no compensation.

4th. No agent of any kind had been employed at the request or by the procurement of the Treasury Department.

5th. No business of the Treasury Department is transacted through said agent.

6th. The Department pays no compensation whatever to any agent of the banks, and none has ever been asked for.

Here the committee might very properly have suspended all further examination, and reported their proceedings to the House; but as we found that there was a corresponding agent of some of the deposit banks residing here, and as it was possible that something might leak out to show an improper connexion between this agent and the Government, we allowed the minority to proceed in their inquiries. They did proceed, and such another string of interrogatories as they have recorded upon the journal of our committee cannot, in my opinion, be found upon the pages of any public document now in existence. The book will be a literary and legislative curiosity, which ought to be preserved for the benefit of committees who may meet in aftertimes to engage in similar undertakings.

The gentleman from Tennessee has complained that Mr. Whitney gives large parties, and that the members of Congress attend them, drinking his wine and partaking of his hospitality. I am not one of the number who are thus indulged. I have never attended his parties, drank his wine, nor enjoyed his cheer. I have known him for two or three years; have met him in the streets and elsewhere, and have interchanged the usual civilities that pass between acquaintances. I know nothing of his private history or his former character and his employments. If he is a bad man, I am not disposed, either as an individual or as a party man, to become responsible for his conduct; if he be a good one, I am willing he should enjoy all the benefits that result from the possession of a fair moral character. To me he is like every other citizen. If he were connected with the Government, I should feel bound to examine his standing and conduct; but as he is not, I shall not trouble myself about him further than to apply the rule to him that the community has made applicable to all other men, "to consider him honest until the contrary is proven."

But to the interrogatories which were offered by the minority, and were voted down by the majority, not allowing them to be put to the witnesses. Upon page 61 of the journal will be found the following question, offered by the minority:

Extract from the journal.

"Do you know Reuben M. Whitney's general character for truth and veracity; and would you believe him on oath, when strongly tempted to swear falsely?"

"Mr. Hamer objected to this question, and it was decided in the negative by the following vote.

"Ayes—Messrs. Wise and Peyton.

"Noes—Messrs. Garland, Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet, Johnson, and Hamer."

So this question was voted down? We of the majority sought in vain, in the resolution of the House, for authority to inquire into the general character of R. M. Whitney. We could not find it there. We knew of no other source from which we derived power, and of course we voted down the question as improper. This, I suppose, is one of the cases of illiberality of which the gentleman from Tennessee complains. This is a specimen of what he calls a rigid construction of the resolution of the House!

What was the next inquiry made, or attempted to be made, by these gentlemen? Here it is: "Is Reuben

M. Whitney or not, according to the best of your knowledge, information, or belief, concerned in speculation in the public lands, or in stocks, or in the money market, in any way?" This also was voted down. We discovered no authority in the resolution to hunt after the speculations of private citizens. We could not perceive what right we had to inquire whether Mr. Whitney had or had not purchased a piece of land, a town lot, a horse, or a cow, and sold it for more than he gave. Congress, and the committees of Congress, ought to have something else to do than to meddle with all the private affairs of individuals, to examine the state of their transactions, the profits they have made in trade during the last year, or the sums they have lost by bad bargains. Not conceiving this to be any part of our duty, we voted against the question, and thereby gave another evidence of our "illiberality."

Another question voted down by the majority may be found on page 64. It proposed to ask the witness (Mr. Woodbury) whether he had any personal objections to Mr. Whitney as an agent; in other words, whether he liked or disliked the man. In the affirmative on this question we find Messrs. Wise and Peyton; in the negative, Messrs. Garland, Pierce, Gillet, Johnson, and Hamer.

On the same page is this interesting question offered to Mr. Woodbury: "Have you ever authorized the editor or editors of the Globe, a newspaper in this city, during the month of April, 1836, or at any time, to deny any supposed relation or connexion of Reuben M. Whitney with the Treasury Department?" This interrogatory was refused by the same vote as the other. We are totally unable to perceive what the Secretary's opinion of Mr. Whitney as a man had to do with our inquiries, or what Congress could do with the information if they had it. We were equally at a loss to discover what we had to do with the editorial articles of the Globe, in April, 1836, or at any other time. I have not examined the files of the Globe, but I presume that about the time named in the question the editors made some such denial as that mentioned; and the object of the interrogatory seemed to be, to ascertain whether they told the truth; whether, in other words, the witness had given them authority such as they stated he had, in that number of their newspaper. If the House had directed us to inquire into the character of the Globe for truth and veracity, we should have done so; but until they clothed us with such powers we did not feel at liberty to arraign the editors before our committee for that purpose. This, I suppose, was another evidence of our "rigid construction."

We have been denounced by the gentleman from Tennessee as a "packed committee," appointed by the Chair for party purposes. Upon page 99 may be found the strongest evidence, as I think, which the gentleman can produce in support of this charge. The gentleman himself propounded the question to General Van Ness, the president of the Bank of the Metropolis, in this city. "Did or did not some one or more of the officers of the bank oppose very strongly his employment" (as agent) "on personal grounds? Did any one of them go so far as to say, if he" (Whitney) "came to that board in that capacity, he would kick him out of the bank?" Would you believe it, Mr. Chairman? the committee voted down this question, and would not allow the gentleman from Tennessee to ask it! Could stronger evidence be given of their being a "packed committee?" What! not allow the gentleman to prove what some officer of a bank, for which Mr. Whitney has never been the agent, had said about Whitney, in a conversation held some time and somewhere, with somebody, about some things, and this agency among the rest! Why, sir, it was a most outrageous procedure on the part of the committee. No wonder the gentleman thinks they were "packed." How could a reasonable man come to any other conclusion?

Well, sir, on page 104 we have another specimen of the illiberality of this "packed majority," who have been engaged in suppressing the truth by their votes. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] offered to ask a witness (Mr. COXE) whether he, as attorney for Mr. Whitney's creditors, had not instituted suits against Whitney; what amount Whitney owed; who was his bail; whether execution had been issued against him; whether Whitney had not offered to compromise; whether he had not threatened to put his property out of his hands; and, finally, to whom the carriages, furniture, &c. in his possession belonged. All of which interrogatories were voted down by the majority. The "packed majority" could not understand what the House wanted with such information. They were simple enough to suppose that the amount of Mr. Whitney's debts was a matter between him and his creditors; that his giving bail, and threatening to put his property out of his hands, (if he ever did so,) were occurrences between private citizens, which not unfrequently happen, and with which the legislative and executive departments of our Government have nothing to do. The judiciary settles all these questions; and we propose to leave the lawyers and judges to dispose of this case as they do of all others which come before them. But least of all did we suppose that either the Congress or people of the United States cared whether Mr. Whitney rode in a carriage or went on foot; or if he did ride, whether the carriage belonged to himself or to somebody else. Not less surprising, however, was the proposition to ascertain how much furniture he had in his house, or to whom that belonged. Yes, sir, we were about to take an inventory of his household goods; to learn how many plates, how many knives and forks, he had, and what number of spoons he had in his possession; and whether he had paid for them all or not! What a dignified and statesmanlike business this would have been for members of Congress. Sir, we did not believe that we had any authority to make such examinations; nay, we were satisfied that the House could not, under our constitution, have conferred such a power, if it had tried; and we never dreamed that this body would condescend so low as to attempt to investigate such a trivial and despicable subject as the kitchen furniture of a private citizen! Yet, for entertaining these opinions, and acting upon them, we are denounced as a "packed committee!"

Progressing with this subject, we find, on page 116 of the journal, the minority inquired whether Mr. Whitney did not write part of the President's last annual message! On pages 118 and 123 we find them asking the important question, "For whom did R. M. Whitney electioneer during the last presidential campaign?" Was he for Mr. Van Buren, for General Harrison, Judge White, or Mr. Webster? Upon page 120 the minority, it appears, inquired whether this agent did not sometimes write editorials for the Globe. They were determined to make an important man of him, in spite of all he could do to the contrary. Whilst he was watching the interests of his employers, and corresponding with them upon subjects connected with their banking operations, the minority were determined to show that he was the great necromancer who, unknown and unseen, was controlling all the moneyed operations of the Government by secret movements of his supernatural skill. But, in addition to all his other employments, he undertook to give direction to public opinion; and, for that purpose, sometimes took command of "the great Globe itself." These interrogatories were also voted down by the majority of the committee.

In the course of reading and observation, I have had occasion to notice a number of most remarkable falls; but none has ever occurred which appeared more extraordinary than the one I am about to mention. After these interrogatories which I have just mentioned, can you imagine, sir, what followed? Why, the minority inquired where Reuben got his stationery! Oh, what a falling off was there, my countrymen! From making a Chief Magistrate, writing the President's message, and conducting the official organ, down to a few quills and a quire of paper! But they were not satisfied to stop here. They next inquired who paid the postage on his letters; and whether he received many "free" letters. To ascertain these important facts, we had the messenger of the Treasury Department and the penny-post of the city called before us. The former swore, that when Mr. Whitney came into the Treasury Department on business, he sometimes used the pen, ink, and paper, on the table in the ante-room, for the purpose of writing a note or memorandum, as did any other person who chose to do so, and as we constantly see done in all our public offices. The latter stated that Mr. Whitney got a good many letters, and paid the postage on them like a man! He could not tell us how many "free" letters were received by the agent in the course of the year. The testimony of these two witnesses will be read with deep attention by the American people! They disclose important facts, which every man ought to understand. It is a pity the penny-post could not tell us how many "free" letters Mr. Whitney receives. The public would then have been satisfied. This is a point upon which they must feel very great anxiety!

To fatigue the committee no longer with details which are perfectly familiar to you, Mr. Chairman,* I will close by referring gentlemen to pages 223 and 254, where they will find the minority inquiring whether Mr. Whitney was not a traitor and smuggler during the late war with Great Britain; whether he was not a gambler, and whether he had not at some former period kept a faro bank for the accommodation of gamblers! Of course, these inquiries were voted down, as unauthorized by the resolution of the House; and, to use the language of the witness, "inquisitorial" in their character. Occasionally some members of the majority voted with the minority in favor of questions which were not clearly authorized by the resolution of the House. They were inclined, in whatever could be deemed a doubtful case, to lean in favor of investigation. The chairman, [Mr. GARLAND,] more frequently than any other member, voted with the minority. Being the author of the resolution, he found himself in a delicate position; and, desiring to leave no ground of complaint on their part, he voted with them much oftener than any other member of the majority. He is now reaping the reward of his liberality. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PEXTON] compliments him for the honesty and candor displayed in his votes, but is utterly astonished at the report which he has presented to the House. In other words, he praises his good intentions, but laments his want of capacity to see the force and bearing of the testimony which has been taken.

I have thus run rapidly over a number of cases, to show the character of the interrogatories which the minority wished to submit to the witnesses. For voting down these and similar questions, we are now charged with illiberality! Sir, I repel the insinuation, as entirely unwarranted by any vote we have given, and as wholly unfounded in fact.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PEXTON] sometimes quotes poetry; and on the present occasion has drawn an allusion from Shakspeare. I am sure the gentleman owes the bard no malice, and yet he has egregiously misrepresented him. When an orator is driven from facts to poetry, to obtain weapons for his cause, the prospect must be gloomy; but if he should fall into errors, even with his poetry, it makes the case assume a still more unpromising aspect. He who innocently misrepresents poetry may, with the same good intentions, misrepresent facts.

Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill.

The gentleman told us of the tall precipice upon which King Lear stood, and viewed men walking on the beach below, who looked no larger than mice! Now, sir, I have read this play of Shakspeare, and have found no such incident. I remember that the Earl of Gloster, after losing both his eyes, accidentally met his own son, without knowing him, and obtained the young man's consent to conduct him to the cliffs near Dover; from which he intended to throw himself and put an end to his life. The son, aware of his intention, and determined to save him, persuaded his father, whilst they were upon a perfect level, that they were climbing a hill; and at a certain point convinced him that they were upon the brink of an awful precipice, at the bottom of which men appeared no larger than mice. The father threw himself headlong from what he supposed to be this tall cliff, but which was in reality a level plain; and the son, changing his voice, congratulated him, in a new character, at the bottom of the supposed cliff, upon the miraculous preservation of his life.

Now, I can easily imagine how a man who has lost both his eyes can be thus imposed upon; but how a gentleman of ordinary intelligence, in the full possession of all his faculties, can mistake a level plain for a towering mountain, or a fall of six feet for one of several thousand, is to me wholly inexplicable. Still it may be so; for a careful examination of our proceedings will show that the gentleman from Tennessee has fallen into errors quite as gross as those attributed by the poet to the blind Earl of Gloster.

I will close my observations by expressing the hope that the evils which the gentleman so clearly foresees may never appear to any eye but his own, or, if they do, that the hand of a kind Providence may avert them from our country, and allow us to remain a free, a happy, and a united people.

When Mr. HAMER sat down,

Mr. WISE replied in a speech of considerable length, which continued until daylight pierced into the lighted hall.

Mr. FAIRFIELD said that, though he was not accustomed to making long speeches in this House, he had taken notes of the speech of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. PERRYON,] and had intended to reply to him at length. But as it was near four o'clock in the morning, and as much impatience had been manifested by the few members remaining in the House, he felt that he should be doing injustice, both to himself and them, to commence a speech at that time. He would also add that all necessity for it had been obviated by the able vindication, by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HAMER,] of the majority of the select committee, and of the resolves which they adopted, as the result of its investigation, under the order of the House. He wished, however, to say a word or two in relation to that part of the gentleman's remarks which applied to himself personally. And he said he must confess that, at some of those remarks, he felt that degree of indignation which every honest man should feel, when he considered his veracity questioned. But he was happy to be relieved from the pressure of these feelings by the subsequent qualification of his [Mr. PERRYON's] remarks.

[Mr. PERRYON again rose, and said that he wished it to be distinctly understood that he had not, in any remarks he had made, intended to impute wrong motives to the gentleman from Maine.]

Mr. F. said he was glad of the explanation, and felt bound to suppress the remarks that he had at first intended to make. Inasmuch, however, as the gentleman from Tennessee had questioned the accuracy of his (Mr. F's) recollection, and the probability of his having used the epithets which had been attributed to him in the testimony of Mr. F., he felt it to be his duty to say a word in reply. He would not advert to those circumstances which went, in his estimation, to render it probable that those epithets had been used, for it might perhaps excite feelings which he had much rather see allayed. He had no unkind feelings to be gratified towards the gentleman from Tennessee, or any other human being. He would, however, inquire for a moment into the relative positions occupied by himself and that gentleman. It had been said that it was strange he (Mr. F.) should have sat down and committed such a string of epithets to writing. The reason for committing his recollection of the facts to writing had been fully explained in his testimony, and he trusted that they would be deemed satisfactory to every candid mind. He had understood that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] had, while he (Mr. F.) was not present, made a statement of facts as to the unhappy occurrence in the committee room between Mr. P. and Mr. Whitney, and had called on the other members of the committee to make statements also. Not knowing how soon or under what circumstances he might be called on to make his own statement, he (Mr. F.) thought it would be well, while the facts were fresh in his recollection, to put them upon paper. He did so without consultation with any of the members of the committee; and feeling an anxiety, which he thought would be natural to all under similar circumstances, to know how far the recollection of others corresponded with his own, he had shown it to several of the other members of the committee; and, as he had stated in his testimony, was pleased to find that he was supported by them. If there was any thing wrong in all this, he could not see it. It certainly was not done in a spirit of unkindness to the gentleman from Tennessee, or the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] and, with his present views, he should do the same again. The principal question, however, was, as to the truth of this statement; or, rather, in reference to the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee, as to the probability of its correctness. And here he would ask if it had not been fortified and confirmed by the testimony of the gentlemen from Alabama, Ohio, and New York? There certainly was no contradiction between them in the slightest particular. And, in regard to the testimony of the chairman, [Mr. GARLAND,] who had been called by Mr. W. his witness, he (Mr. F.) would ask if there was not a substantial agreement with all the other witnesses? Now, what is there against all this concurrent testimony? The recollection of the gentleman from Tennessee, who was a party to the transaction. He (Mr. F.) would ask the House to recur to the statement of the transaction made by the gentleman from Tennessee on the 4th of February last, and see how it would compare with the testimony of the chairman, who had been called by him as a witness. It was to be supposed that it was intended for a full statement; one containing the whole truth; and yet how very far does it fall short of the testimony of the chairman, comprising scarcely a tithe of it, to say nothing of the testimony of the other witnesses. And now, standing thus, may it not well be inquired whether the attempt comes with a very good grace from the gentleman from Tennessee, to impugn the accuracy of his (Mr. F's) recollection? But, however that may be, he was willing that this House and the country should decide between them.

French Spoliations.

[H. OF R.]

He would not question the motives of the gentleman from Tennessee—the inquiry was simply as to the accuracy of recollection. And he would also here take occasion to say, with the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. MARTIN,] that he did not impugn the motives of the gentleman from Tennessee in regard to the investigation which had been principally prosecuted by him through the select committee. He had no doubt but that the gentleman had been misled and deceived. That he had been acting on information which had turned out to be false. And here he must be permitted to say, notwithstanding the strong expressions of the gentleman from Tennessee, that he did not see how any one, unbiased by political considerations, could find any confirmation of the resolves adopted by the committee, in the evidence in the case; that, for his part, he could not see how any one could come to any other conclusion from the evidence, unless he were laboring under some strange hallucination of mind. But as the members were worn down and almost exhausted, having been in session about nineteen hours, he would forbear entering more fully into the subject.

Mr. PEYTON then made some few remarks, in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Maine.

The amendment of Mr. PEYTON was then disagreed to.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, moved an amendment, providing that the money which shall be in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1838, shall be deposited with the several States. Lost.

Mr. LAWRENCE moved an amendment, raising the salaries of the clerks in the office of the Clerk of the House of Representatives. Agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the committee rose and reported to the House.

The Speaker having resumed the chair, and the chairman having reported,

On motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD,

The House adjourned, at 5 o'clock A. M.

FRIDAY, MARCH 3.

FRENCH SPOILIATIONS PRIOR TO 1800.

Mr. HOWARD said that he was instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which were referred numerous memorials from claimants for French spoliations prior to 1800, to move that a list of those claimants, which he held in his hand, be printed for the use of the House. It had been asserted, by those opposed to the claims, that they were chiefly in the hands of speculators, who had purchased them at a small price, and were therefore not entitled to as much justice as the original sufferers would have been. The committee had endeavored to classify the petitioners; and the result would show that there was little or no foundation for this opinion. When the names should be printed, he hoped the members of the House would test its accuracy by examining the names of the claimants in the several States.

Mr. H. said he would add, upon his individual responsibility as a member of this House, that, from a laborious investigation, he was satisfied of the intrinsic justice of these claims, and believed that they must and would be paid at some time or other. As far as his voice could reach, he encouraged the claimants to persevere, and not suffer their energy to be overcome by the long delay which had been heretofore painfully, and, he would add, unjustly experienced.

The following is an abstract of the list:

Abstract of petitioners on account of French spoliations prior to 1800, and whose memorials are now before Congress, viz:

Of deceased persons, being original claimants.

The motion of Mr. H. was agreed to, without a division.

Mr. LAWRENCE asked leave to offer a resolution allowing members to lay such petitions as were in their possession, and which they desired to present, on the table, and that they be entered on the journal; but it was objected to.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union were discharged from the further consideration of the bill from the Senate entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to compromise the claim of the United States on the Alleghany Bank of Pennsylvania," and the same having been brought into the House,

Mr. CAMBRELENG proposed a substitute, which was agreed to; and the bill, having been engrossed, was read a third time and passed.

The title of the substitute was as follows: "An act authorizing the proper officer of the Treasury Department to credit the account of the Treasurer of the United States with the amount of unavailable funds, &c."

Mr. HUNTSMAN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Martin Kingsbury. Read twice, and committed.

Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill.

[MARCH 3, 1837.]

Mr. WISE, from the select committee appointed to inquire into the condition of the various executive departments, presented the reports of the majority and minority of that committee, and also the views of an individual member of the committee, which he moved to lay on the table, and that the reports, journal of the committee, and accompanying documents, be printed; which was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. INGERSOLL, 5,000 extra copies of the report and documents were ordered to be printed.

Mr. GALBRAITH, from the select committee on the subject of banks, made a final report thereon; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. BRIGGS, on leave, submitted a resolution to pay the little boys an extra compensation, (of $250 for the session,) in addition to their pay of $1 50 a day; when, after being amended so as to include messengers and others, on motions of Messrs. WARDWELL, GRENELL, and BELL, and after some remarks from Messrs. McLENE, CONNOR, HARPER, RENCHER, and A. H. SHEPPERD,

Mr. RENCHER moved that the Clerk be directed to pay them $100 extra. And, after some remarks from Mr. McKENNAN,

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved the previous question; but subsequently withdrew it; and the subject being further discussed,

Mr. HOWELL moved to lay the resolution, as modified and amended, on the table, and asked for the yeas and nays on that motion; but the House refused to order them, and also refused to lay the subject on the table.

Mr. McKENNAN then demanded the previous question; which was seconded—yeas 85, nays 42—and the main question ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, asked for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolutions; but they were refused, and the resolutions were agreed to.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved to proceed to the orders of the day, being the consideration of the appropriation bills.

Mr. MERCER moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose of submitting a resolution reported from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to rescind the 16th joint rule of the two Houses, so as to send to the Senate the bill to provide for the selection and purchase of sites for marine hospitals on the Western waters; but the motion was rejected, without a count.

The House then passed to the orders of the day.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1837, as amended in Committee of the Whole House.

Several of the amendments, as amended, were concurred in.

The amendment of the Senate, as amended by the House, providing for an increase of compensation to the clerks of the two Houses of Congress, and of the librarians of Congress, similar in amount to that given by the amendment of the Senate to the clerks in the departments, coming up for concurrence—

After some remarks from Messrs. W. THOMPSON, RENCHER, and LAWRENCE,

The question was taken, and the amendment concurred in.

The other portions of this amendment having been concurred in,

Mr. RENCHER moved a further amendment to the amendment, providing that no extra allowance should be given for any extra services performed by the said clerks under any law or resolution of Congress; which was agreed to.

The amendment of the Senate increasing the salary of the Surveyor General of Arkansas from $1,500 to $2,000, and which had been non-concurred in by the Committee of the Whole House, coming up—

The House non-concurred with the Committee of the Whole, and the amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

The amendment of the Senate increasing the compensation of the clerks in the Surveyor General's office in Arkansas was concurred in by the House.

The amendment of the Senate increasing the amount appropriated for contingent expenses of foreign intercourse from $12,000 to $30,000 was debated by Messrs. HOWARD, JENIFER, and A. H. SHEPPERD, and was finally concurred in.

The amendment of the Senate appropriating $4,200 for extra clerk hire in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, after some remarks from Messrs. C. JOHNSON and CAMBRELENG, was disagreed to.

The amendment authorizing the Secretary of the Senate to employ, in lieu of the clerks now employed, one chief clerk with a salary of $2,000, one other clerk at $1,000, two at $1,600, and three at $1,500, was disagreed to.

The question then recurring on concurring with the Senate in their amendments, as amended,

Mr. W. THOMPSON, after some remarks in opposition, asked for the yeas and nays on concurrence in that portion of the amendment, as amended, which provides for the increase of the compensation of the clerks in the Departments of State and War, of the clerks to both Houses of Congress, and of the librarians thereto; which were ordered.

Mr. HOWELL said he was informed that it had been the practice with some of the heads of bureaus, that were allowed a number of extra clerks at $1,000 per annum, to hire clerks at less sums, and pocket the excess themselves.

Now, if this were so, it proved that an increase of their salaries was unnecessary, and that as good clerks as we now have could be obtained at the present rates.

I would inquire of the honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Wise] if he has any evidence of the facts referred to.

Mr. WISE replied that the report of the select committee to inquire into the condition of the various executive departments, made this morning, would show a report of Amos Kendall and John P. Van Ness, commissioners appointed by authority of the President of the United States, in the year 1833, to take testimony and report thereon in relation to certain charges—commissioners, by the by, who issued subpoenas in the form of "requests" to witnesses—which report of these commissioners purposed to prove the fact that it has been the practice, in one at least, and he believed it says in all the departments, up to a late period, to take the sum of salaries for subordinate clerks, to pay these clerks much less than was allowed by law, and to divide the surplus among the superior clerks or heads of offices and bureaus. For instance, three subordinate clerks had been allowed by law $1,000 each—$3,000 in the aggregate; this gross sum would be taken by the superior; and, in one instance, the inferior $1,000 clerk was paid but $25 per month, leaving $700 out of the $1,000 to be divided among the chief clerks; portions of which were actually so divided, adding to their greater salaries and taking from the lesser. Such was said not to be the practice now; as to that, this deponent saith not. The report will speak for itself.

The subject was further debated by Messrs. HAMER, C. JOHNSON, RENCHER, HARDIN, and A. MANN. Mr. HUNTSMAN moved the previous question.

The SPEAKER said the effect would be to bring directly before the House the question on concurring with the Senate in the amendments which had not been acted on by the House.

Mr. HUNTSMAN withdrew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. TURRILL renewed it. And the main question was ordered now to be taken.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, asked for a division of the question, so as to take the question separately on the 4th section above referred to; which was ordered.

And the question being taken on concurring in the remainder of the amendment of the Senate, as amended by the House, the same was concurred in.

And the question on concurrence in the amendment of the Senate in the 4th section, as amended, was taken, and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 100, nays 83.

So the amendment was concurred in.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the bill making appropriations for certain fortifications, and for other purposes, for the year 1837; which said bill had been returned from the Senate, with a message that that body insisted on its amendment, by which the amendment of this House, providing for the distribution of such surplus revenue as might remain in the Treasury of the United States on the 1st of January next, reserving five millions of dollars, according to the provisions of the act to regulate the public deposits, approved June 23, 1836, was rejected.

Mr. BELL, after a few introductory remarks, urging the propriety and necessity of the motion he was about to make, moved that the House insist on its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and asked for the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered.

Mr. HAYNES said he regretted exceedingly that the late period of the session placed it out of his power, with due regard to the proper legislation of the House, to express the views he entertained on this momentous subject. But, under the circumstances which surrounded him, he would confine himself to a reply to the brief observations of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL.] That gentleman had adverted to the fact that questions of revenue fall peculiarly within the province of this House. But what is the question we are now called upon to decide? It does not relate either to the creation or ordinary expenditure of the revenue. It is, whether this House shall insist upon retaining their proposition to distribute to or deposit with the States a large portion of the public revenue. Upon such a question the Senate was peculiarly qualified to decide, as they represent the very States with which the proposition of the House provides to deposit the public money. If there is any body on the face of the earth peculiarly qualified to decide such a question, it is the Senate. And if that body ever made a decision especially entitled to respect, it is the decision now in question.

Mr. HUNTSMAN demanded the previous question; which was seconded by the House.

And the main question was ordered to be now taken.

Mr. BELL, by leave, explained to the House that the motion made by him was the mildest and most respectful course that could be taken to the other body.

And the main question was then taken, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Chilton Allan, Heman Allen, Bailey, Bell, Bond, Borden, Bouldin, Briggs, Bunch, John Calhoun, William B. Calhoun, Campbell, Carter, Casey, George Chambers, John Chambers, Childs, Nathaniel H. Claiborne, Clark, Connor, Corwin, Crane, Cushing, Darlington, Dawson, Deberry, Denny, Elmore, Evans, Everett, Fowler, French, Rice Garland, Graham, Granger, Grayson, Griffin, Hiland Hall, Hard, Hardin, Harlan, Harper, Hawes, Hazeltine, Hiester, Herod, Hoar, Hopkins, Howell, Hunt, Ingersoll, William Jackson, James, Henry Johnson, Kennon, Kilgore, Lyne, Lawrence, Lay, Thomas Lee, Luke Lea, Lewis, Lincoln, Love, Lyon, Job Mann, Samson Mason, Maury, May, McCarty, McComas, McKennan, Mercer, Milligan, Montgomery, Morris, Parker, Pearson, Pettigrew, Phillips, Pickens, Potts, Reed, Rencher, John Reynolds, Richardson, Robertson, Russell, William B. Shepard, Augustine H. Shepperd, Slade, Sloane, Spangler, Standefer, Storer, Sutherland, Taliaferro, Waddy Thompson, Underwood, Vinton, Washington, White, Elisha Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams—106.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Ash, Barton, Beale, Bean, Black, Bovee, Boyd, Burns, Cambreleng, Chapman, Chapin, John F. H. Claiborne, Craig, Cramer, Cushman, Doubleday, Dromgoole, Dunlap, Fairfield, Farlin, Fry, Fuller, Galbraith, James Garland, Gholson, Glascock, Hazley, Hamer, Hannegan, Albert G. Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Holt, Howard, Hubley, Huntington, Huntsman, Ingham, Jarvis, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Klingensmith, Lansing, Lawler, Gideon Lee, Joshua Lee, Leonard, Logan, Loyall, Lucas, Abijah Mann, Martin, William Mason, Moses Mason, McKay, McKeon, McKim, McLene, Miller, Muhlenberg, Page, Parks, Patterson, Patton, Franklin Pierce, Dutee J. Pearce, Phelps, Pinckney, Joseph Reynolds, Rogers, Schenck, Seymour, Shields, Shinn, Sickles, Smith, Sprague, Taylor, Thomas, John Thomson, Turrill, Vanderpoel, Ward, Wardwell, Thomas T. Whittlesey, Yell—88.

So the House insisted on their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate.

OLD HARBOR BILL.

On motion of Mr. SUTHERLAND, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, generally, (Mr. SMITH in the chair;) and,

On motion of Mr. SMITH, the committee took up the bill to provide for certain harbors, and for the removal of obstructions in and at the mouths of certain rivers, and for other purposes, for the year 1837.

The pending question was on concurring with the Senate in certain amendments made thereto; the first of which was in relation to the Delaware breakwater.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, moved to amend the amendment of the Senate by adding an appropriation of $75,000 for a marine hospital at New Orleans.

Mr. FRENCH moved to amend the amendment by adding an appropriation for the erection of marine hospitals on the Western waters; which was agreed to: Yeas 80, nays 45.

Mr. LYON moved further to amend the proposed amendment by appropriating $10,000 for a marine hospital in the city of Mobile.

Mr. L. insisted that the same reasons which had been urged by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. JOHNSON,] in support of his amendment, applied with equal force to Mobile. That city was known to be increasing in population, wealth, and business, with great rapidity. It was situated in a climate regarded as somewhat unhealthy at certain seasons, but its immense trade required the employment of seamen and boatmen at all seasons of the year; and if hospitals were to be provided for sick seamen and boatmen, at the expense of the Government, at any points, he regarded the Southern cities as the places most entitled to notice. The amount he had proposed was small, and he hoped his amendment would not be rejected. The amendment prevailed, without a division.

Mr. PHILLIPS moved a general appropriation of

H. or R.]

Judicial System of the United States--Thanks to the Speaker.

[MARCH 3, 1837.]

$150,000, to cover a suspension of the twenty per cent. hospital money for one year; which, after some remarks from Messrs. PHILLIPS, CRAIG, PINCKNEY, and PARKER, was agreed to: Yeas 75, nays 52.

Mr. McKAY moved a further amendment appropriating $15,000 for the erection of a marine hospital at Portland, Maine, $10,000 for one at Wilmington, North Carolina, and a like sum for one at Newport, Rhode Island. Lost.

Mr. LOVE proposed a sum of $50,000 for the purchase of a site and the erection of a marine hospital at Buffalo, New York. Lost, without a division.

Mr. JARVIS then moved a proviso that the expenditures for the purchase of sites and the erection of marine hospitals at New Orleans and Mobile should not exceed the sums appropriated; which was agreed to.

The amendment of Mr. JOHNSON, as amended, was then concurred in.

Mr. DUNLAP moved a proviso that one of the hospitals to be erected on the Mississippi should be at Memphis, Tennessee, and that $20,000 be appropriated for that purpose. Lost.

The question recurring on the amendment of the Senate, as amended, after some remarks by Messrs. CHILDS, HUNTSMAN, JOHNSON of Louisiana, and CRAIG, it was concurred in.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, moved a verbal amendment to the clause appropriating $55,000 for continuing the improvement of Cumberland river in Kentucky and Tennessee; which was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Senate considered was the one appropriating the sum of $300,000 for the benefit of the citizens of Alexandria, District of Columbia, to aid them in completing their public works, and for debts already incurred thereon.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved an amendment providing for the protection of the harbor of Georgetown, by prohibiting obstructions being thrown therein.

Mr. BOULDIN said he knew there were but few hours left to transact business this session. He knew that we are the guardians of the people of this District. He knew that, of all the hours devoted to others during the session, or thrown away, not one had fallen to the lot of the District. As a member of the committee, he felt that the people of Alexandria had a right to expect him to do and to say what he could for them. But what could he do, or what time did he have to say any thing in their behalf? None. He would only say that he had examined into the matter. He knew nothing of such works of his own knowledge; but he had inquired into their grievances, and reviewed the legislation of Congress in relation to Alexandria. He would be held responsible for the correctness of the opinion, that Alexandria had suffered not only neglect in the little attention the District had ever got from Congress, but, when compared with the balance of the District, actual injustice.

After some remarks from Messrs. CAVE JOHNSON, W. B. SHEPARD, VINTON, and MERCER, the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment of the Senate, so amended, was then concurred in: Yeas 81, nays 49.

Mr. HANNEGAN moved an amendment declaring Logansport, in the State of Indiana, a port of entry, and appropriating a sum of $50,000 for the removal of obstructions in the navigation of the Great Wabash river. Lost.

The bill was then laid aside, to be reported to the House.

JUDICIAL SYSTEM OF THE UNITED STATES.

On motion of Mr. THOMAS, the committee then took up the Senate bill entitled "An act supplementary to the act entitled an act to amend the judicial system of the United States."

Mr. ROBERTSON moved a substitute for the whole bill, being the House bill, and went on, at some length, to explain its provisions.

Mr. POLK followed, in support of the original bill, when Mr. THOMAS obtained the floor.

The hour of three having arrived, the committee rose, and the House took the usual recess till half past four o'clock.

[Previous to the recess, a message was received from the Senate, stating that that body insisted on its amendment to the bill making appropriations for certain fortifications, and for other purposes, for the year 1837, and asking the appointment of a committee of conference on the part of the House, to meet the committee appointed on the part of the Senate; and which consisted of Messrs. WRIGHT, PARKER, and WEBSTER.]

EVENING SESSION.

On the reassembling of the House, it went into Committee of the Whole on the bill to amend the judiciary system of the United States.

The question pending was on the substitute offered by Mr. ROBERTSON.

The debate was continued by Messrs. THOMAS, ROBERTSON, HOAR, BELL, and LINCOLN, when the amendment of Mr. ROBERTSON was disagreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY moved an amendment to change the time of meeting at Williamsport, Pennsylvania; which was disagreed to.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, after some remarks, moved an amendment making a change in the sixth judicial district. Lost.

Mr. G. then moved an amendment providing for the appointment of a judge for the western district of Louisiana.

On motion of Mr. WARDWELL, the committee rose and reported the two bills to the House.

The Speaker having resumed the chair, and the chairman of the committee having reported the harbor and judiciary bills to the House,

The harbor bill was taken up, and the Speaker propounded the question on concurring with the Committee of the Whole in their amendments thereto.

Mr. MANN, of New York, demanded the previous question, but subsequently withdrew it.

The amendments of the Committee of the Whole were then agreed to, and the amendments of the Senate, as so amended, were also concurred in.

The House then took up the bill to amend the judiciary system of the United States, on which

Mr. HAWES moved the previous question; which was seconded: Yeas 111, nays not counted. And the main question was ordered, without a division.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, asked for the yeas and nays on the main question, but the House refused them. And the bill was ordered to a third reading, without a count, and was then read a third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. McKENNAN, the House took up the amendments of the Committee of the Whole to the amendment of the Senate to the bill to continue the Cumberland road; which were concurred in.

The House then took up the amendment of the Senate to the bill making appropriations for fortifications, which the Senate had returned to the House, insisting on their amendment, and asking a conference.

On motion of Mr. BELL, a committee of conference, consisting of five (amended to three) members, was appointed on the part of the House; and Mr. BELL, Mr. LAWRENCE, and Mr. CAMBRELENG, were appointed said committee.

THANKS TO THE SPEAKER.

On motion of Mr. MUHLENBERG, (Mr. PIERCE, of New Hampshire, then temporarily occupying the chair,)

MARCH 3, 1837.]

Light-houses—Increase of the Army—Fortification Bill, &c.

[H. OF R.]

Resolved, unanimously, That the thanks of this House be presented to the honorable JAMES K. POLK, for the able, dignified, and impartial manner with which he has presided over its deliberations, and performed the arduous and important duties of the Chair.

LIGHT-HOUSES.

On motion of Mr. SUTHERLAND, the House went into a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. SMITH in the chair,) and took up the bill from the Senate making appropriations for light-houses, light-boats, beacon-lights, buoys, &c., for the year 1837.

The bill having been gone through, a variety of amendments were submitted, most of which were agreed to.

Mr. DUNLAP then moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, on the ground, he said, of the incongruity of the body of the bill with the second section thereof. The second section was in the following words:

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That none of the light-houses, beacon-lights, or buoys, the erection or construction of which is provided for in the preceding section, shall be commenced until an examination shall have been made, under the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the proper site has been selected, and whether public convenience demands the erection or construction thereof. And in every case in which such construction shall not, after due examination, appear to him to be demanded by public convenience, it shall be his duty to report the facts appearing in every such case to the next Congress."

Mr. D. then commented, with considerable warmth, upon the inconsistency of this clause with the body of the bill, which positively located the works in question.

After some further remarks from Messrs. PEARCE of Rhode Island and UNDERWOOD, the motion of Mr. DUNLAP was rejected, and the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

Mr. WARD then moved that the committee take up the Senate bill to increase the military establishment of the United States, and for other purposes; which was agreed to: Yeas 74, nays 65.

The bill was then read, and taken up by sections.

[The provisions and details of this bill are given in the debates in the Senate.]

Mr. HAWES offered a proviso that no officer should be appointed from the graduates of the West Point Academy.

Mr. H. was proceeding to address the committee on his amendment, when he gave way to enable the Speaker to resume the chair, and sign some enrolled bills.

FORTIFICATION BILL—DISTRIBUTION OF THE SURPLUS.

Mr. BELL then asked the general consent of the House to make a report from the committee of conference.

Leave being granted,

Mr. BELL rose and said: Mr. Speaker: The committee of conference appointed on the part of this House to meet a similar committee appointed by the Senate, on their motion, upon the subject of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses in relation to the amendment of the Senate which proposed to strike out from the "bill making appropriations for certain fortifications of the United States for the year 1837, and for other purposes," that clause proposing to distribute the surplus revenue on the 1st day of January next, report that they have performed the duty assigned them, and have come to no agreement. Mr. B. therefore felt it his duty to report this fact to the House, that it might, if it chose, at this period of the sitting, proceed to take such other steps as it should think proper; and he now moved that the House do adhere to their disagreement.

Mr. HAWES asked for the yeas and nays on this motion; which were ordered.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved that the House recede; which motion took precedence of the other.

Mr. FRENCH asked for the yeas and nays on this motion; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 80, nays 98, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Ash, Barton, Beale, Beaumont, Bockee, Bovee, Boyd, Cambreleng, Chapin, Craig, Cramer, Crary, Cushman, Doubleday, Dromgoole, Dunlap, Farlin, Fowler, Fuller, Galbraith, J. Garland, Gholson, Grantland, Haley, J. Hall, Hamer, Hannegan, A. G. Harrison, Hawkins, Holt, Howard, Huntington, Huntsman, Ingham, Jarvis, C. Johnson, J. W. Jones, B. Jones, Lansing, Lawler, G. Lee, J. Lee, Leonard, Loyal, Lucas, A. Mann, W. Mason, M. Mason, McKay, McKeon, McKim, McLene, Miller, Muhlenberg, Page, Parks, Patterson, Patton, F. Pierce, D. J. Pearce, Phelps, Pinckney, Joseph Reynolds, Rogers, Shields, Shinn, Sickles, Smith, Sprague, Taylor, Thomas, J. Thomson, Turrill, Vanderpoel, Ward, Wardwell, T. T. Whittlesey, Wise, Yell—80.

NAYS.—Messrs. Adams, C. Allan, H. Allen, Bell, Bond, Borden, Bouldin, Bunch, J. Calhoun, Campbell, Carter, Casey, J. Chambers, Childs, N. H. Claiborne, Clark, Connor, Corwin, Crane, Cushing, Dawson, Deberry, Denny, Elmore, Everett, Forester, French, R. Garland, Graham, Granger, Graves, Grayson, Griffin, H. Hall, Hard, Hardin, Harlan, Harper, S. S. Harrison, Hawes, Hazeltine, Hiester, Herod, Hopkins, Howell, Hunt, Ingersoll, James, Jenifer, H. Johnson, Kilgore, Lane, Lawrence, Lay, L. Lea, Lewis, Lincoln, Love, Lyon, J. Mann, S. Mason, Maury, May, McCarty, McComas, McKennan, Mercer, Milligan, Montgomery, Parker, J. A. Pearce, Pearson, Pettigrew, Peyton, Phillips, Pickens, Potts, Reed, Rencher, John Reynolds, Richardson, Robertson, W. B. Shepard, A. H. Shepperd, Slade, Standefer, Storer, Sutherland, Taliaferro, W. Thompson, Turner, Underwood, Vinton, Washington, White, E. Whittlesey, L. Williams, S. Williams—98.

So the House refused to recede.

The question then recurring upon the motion of Mr. BELL, that the House do adhere to their disagreement to the Senate's amendment—

Mr. CAMBRELENG said, as this was the last vote that could be taken on this subject, he had merely to state that, if the House adhered, the bill was lost. [Loud cries of order! order! from several parts of the hall; and if Mr. C. did make any additional remarks, his voice was entirely drowned by the noise.]

Mr. GRANGER. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had announced that this bill was lost if the House adhered. How did he know that?

Mr. CAMBRELENG. I have the assurance from the committee on the part of the Senate.

Mr. BELL remarked that the gentleman's declaration was a most extraordinary one. The committee of three persons on the part of the Senate, or any number of gentlemen of that House, might think that, because that committee could come to no agreement, the body it represented might not. But nothing could be more true than that the committee of the Senate could not vote for or speak for the whole body of the Senate, or even for a majority of it. They spoke, and spoke only, their own sentiments; the same as the committee on the part of the House spoke their sentiments as a committee. Neither could speak or vote for the whole body or a majority of it; else why the necessity of approving, disapproving, adopting, or rejecting their report?

Whatever conversations might have passed, when the two committees met, among the members, was, and could be, of course, only conjectural, and was, to say the least of it, in character rather gratuitous. They could not pledge themselves for the vote of the majority they represented. If, however, we were to go into reasoning on probabilities of what might be the result, Mr. B. would say there was a possibility, nay, a strong probability, for arriving at the conclusion that a sufficient number of Senators would change their votes, so as to recede, as he trusted they would; nevertheless, he did not feel himself authorized to make a response of this description, except in answer to the very extraordinary declaration of the gentleman from New York. Mr. B. thought it due to the House that it should sustain its vote, and he hoped they would do so. It was true that they had no discourtesy to complain of on the part of the Senate, but still it was that body which ought now to recede. The House were the representatives, the immediate representatives, of the great body of the American people; and its solemn opinion, three times expressed, at such a period as the present too, by an overwhelming majority, demanded that it should be treated with the utmost deference. He again expressed his earnest hope that it would adhere.

Mr. ADAMS inquired if the gentleman from New York was in order in referring to what had taken place before the committee of conference.

The CHAIR (temporarily occupied by Mr. PIERCE, of New Hampshire) said the point ought to have been raised at the time.

Mr. ADAMS had understood the point of order was made, for the gentleman was loudly called to order; and Mr. A. held it to be the duty of the Speaker at once to have arrested the remarks.

The CHAIR had heard no gentleman rise in his place and raise the point of order, or he should have at once entertained it.

Mr. ADAMS. Was it in order for the gentleman from New York to intimidate, or to make remarks for the purpose of intimidating, the members of this House in the votes they might be about to give?

The CHAIR had not heard any "intimidation" thrown out by the member from New York.

Mr. ADAMS expressed a hope that no member would be influenced by what fell from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said, gentlemen might take the responsibility of losing the fortification bill if they pleased. Upon him at least it would not rest, and he should vote to recede.

Mr. PEYTON would merely call the attention of those members of the present body who were members of the last Congress to the change taken place in the gentleman's doctrines since then. On the night of the 3d of March, when the memorable three-million appropriation was lost, the doctrine of the gentleman then was very different from what he now intimated, and which he wished to impress upon the House, with regard to the course taken by the Senate. What language did the gentleman then hold? What was then his doctrine? It was that this House should adhere, even if the bill should be lost, and the country left defenceless against the apprehended invasion of a foreign foe. Then it was that this House should do its duty, and let the odious Senate take the responsibility; and the measure was lost. Yes, sir, repeated Mr. P., such was his language—lost at the peril of all the dreadful consequences of war, and every thing that might be expected from a conflict with a foreign enemy, according to the gentleman's estimate of the then perilous condition of the country. "Let the House adhere," the gentleman then vociferated, "and let the Senate assume the responsibility of the loss of the fortification bill." But now, the majority of that body having changed, the gentleman's doctrine has changed with it. Then, if the Senate adhered, the responsibility was to rest upon them; now, if they adhered, the responsibility was to rest upon the House.

Mr. P. concluded by an earnest hope that the House would not recede; for what was the effect of its proposition? Why, that millions upon millions of money would be taken from the Treasury, or rather from the pet banks, or rather from the grasp of the dictator and controller of the pet banks, and distributed among the people to whom it belonged. The effect of the Senate's amendment, was to prevent this from being done. That was the real issue, and the country would decide, on that issue, where the responsibility should rest.

Mr. VANDERPOEL thought it entirely useless to be indulging in recrimination on this subject. He believed every man had made up his mind, and was willing to assume the responsibility, if any there was, or would be, in this matter. For his own part, he was perfectly ready and willing to take his share of it. He had voted against the proposition ingrafted on this bill in the first instance, because it contained what he believed to be a most obnoxious principle—that of distribution; and which, in his opinion, counterbalanced and overbalanced all the benefits of the fortification bill. He was also willing to vote against it again, on the same ground, and to assume his share of the responsibility; but, believing that speeches would make no converts, he hoped the question would be taken without further debate.

Mr. LANE said it was not his intention to detain the House by an examination of the principles of the amendment; he had voted too often upon the subject involved not to be understood. He had not only voted for the deposit bill of the last session, but had taken the lead in procuring its timely consideration. He had voted, in every instance, in favor of the amendment upon which we are now called to vote for the last time.

The bill called the deposit bill of the last session sprang from a legitimate source, from one of the standing committees, and was a bill connected with but a single other provision near of kin. It was known, officially known, that a large surplus had and would accumulate in the Treasury, beyond the wants of the Government, and there was time for the action of Congress, and an apparent necessity for it. Otherwise, in the present case, it has been introduced as an amendment to the fortification bill—a bill upon which the safety of our commerce, our cities, our people, and the national honor, depend—at the close of the session; not a bill of this House, but of the Senate. The Senate has refused to concur. This House has adhered. The Senate again refuse to concur, and, in all due courtesy, has asked a committee of conference. That committee fail to agree; and it now remains to be determined whether this House will recede; if it does not, the fortification bill, so important to the defence of the country, must fall.

If a pertinacious adherence to the amendment would save the amendment, even at the loss of the fortification bill, there would exist some reason for firmness; but the disagreement has arrived at that point of legislation which, by the vote now to be taken on the motion to recede, is to decide the fate of both: to recede is to pass the fortification bill—to refuse is the loss of both. This House must recede, or they sleep together.

Mr. L. said he called upon honorable members to pause and reflect before they gave such a vote; a vote that would not only put a stop to all the public works now in progress, and permit them to fall into decay, but blight the national credit and honor by a breach of national faith. Existing contracts must be violated, for the want of money in the hands of the Executive to fulfil them.

Sir, (said Mr. L.,) when does the amendment propose to deposit the surplus revenue? Not until January, 1838.

Mr. L. said he would call upon honorable members to say if any necessity existed for such premature action upon the subject of the surplus revenue. The amendment proposed to distribute in January, 1838, before it can be known whether there will be any to distribute. A war with Mexico, or a protracted one with the Indian tribes, and it would all be swallowed up for national defence. Suppose a large surplus should accumulate, there will be ample time for the next Congress to act upon the subject before the amendment, if adopted, could take effect. Sir, this House has but a few hours to act; the next Congress will have a month. From estimates laid before them, they will be able to act advisedly upon the subject.

Sir, it has been said by honorable members, (and is this the only argument put forth for this obstinate adhesion to the amendment?) that unless it shall be adopted, the money will be left in the hands of the Executive and the pet banks, to corrupt and purchase the banks and the people. Are gentlemen prepared to rest their honor and integrity upon such an argument—an argument contradicted by the very amendment it is urged to sustain? Suppose the amendment should be adopted, will it, can it, have the slightest influence upon the money in the Treasury, before the 1st of January, 1838? Will there be one dollar more or less in the hands of the Executive? Will it change the surplus one single farthing? Surely not; there is no such provision in the amendment; to contend for such a proposition would be more than folly—it would be madness itself. Is there an honorable gentleman upon this floor who will rise and say that it would produce the slightest change in the amount of money in the Treasury; the place to be deposited; the use which may be made of it; that it would leave it less in the power or control of the Executive branch of the Government, whose duty it is to take charge of it? If any such gentleman has a seat upon this floor, (Mr. L. said,) he called upon him to rise and state in what particular such change would take place. No one has been found to respond; the proposition is then conceded by all. Is it, then, not our duty to recede, and permit the fortification bill to become a law, and leave the surplus revenue, if any, in the hands of the next Congress, to dispose of in such manner as in their judgment shall be best calculated to promote the public interest? They will have time and estimates before them, and act knowingly upon the subject.

For these reasons, (said Mr. L.,) he should vote to recede, and called upon the friends of the fortification bill to follow his example.

Mr. L. said, before he took his seat, he desired to be distinctly understood as not having changed his opinion upon the subject of a surplus revenue. That while he was fully persuaded in his own mind that to pass a law for the purpose of collecting a greater revenue from the people than was necessary for the reasonable and just expenditures of the Government would be unjust, oppressive, and unconstitutional, he was free to state he had no doubt of the propriety, nay, the duty of Congress, when by existing laws there shall be thrown into the Treasury more than is required for the purposes aforesaid, to return it back to the people, in such manner as is best calculated to promote the interests of all. To conclude, (said Mr. L.,) should he be honored with a seat in the next Congress, and a surplus revenue found in the Treasury beyond the wants of the Government, so far as it depended upon his vote, it should be acted upon to meet the just expectations of his constituents.

Mr. MANN, of New York, expressed a hope that this question was not to be debated again at this late hour; and he therefore demanded the previous question.

Mr. GLASCOCK. I second the motion, for I do hope that it will not be debated any more.

Mr. WISE having called for a division of the House by tellers,

The demand for the previous question was then seconded by the House: Yeas 135; and the main question was ordered, without a division.

Mr. BRIGGS asked for the yeas and nays on the main question; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 107, nays 87, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, C. Allan, H. Allen, Bailey, Bell, Bond, Borden, Bouldin, Briggs, Bunch, J. Calhoun, W. B. Calhoun, Campbell, Carter, Casey, George Chambers, John Chambers, Childs, N. H. Claiborne, Clark, Connor, Corwin, Crane, Cushing, Dawson, Deberry, Denny, Elmore, Evans, Everett, Forester, Fowler, French, R. Garland, Graham, Granger, Graves, Grayson, Grennell, Griffin, H. Hall, Hard, Hardin, Harlan, Harper, Hawes, Hazeltine, Hiester, Herod, Hoar, Hopkins, Howell, Hunt, Ingersoll, W. Jackson, James, Jenifer, H. Johnson, Kilgore, Lawrence, Lay, T. Lee, L. Lea, Lewis, Lincoln, Love, Lyon, J. Mann, S. Mason, Maury, May, McCarty, McComas, McKennan, McLene, Mercer, Milligan, Montgomery, Parker, J. A. Pearce, Pearson, Pettigrew, Peyton, Phillips, Pickens, Potts, Reed, Rencher, John Reynolds, Richardson, Robertson, W. B. Shepard, A. H. Shepperd, Slade, Standefer, Storer, Sutherland, Tahaferro, W. Thompson, Turner, Underwood, Vinton, Washington, White, E. Whittlesey, L. Williams, S. Williams—107.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Ash, Barton, Beaumont, Black, Bockee, Bovee, Boyd, Burns, Bynum, Cambreleng, Chapman, Chapin, Craig, Cramer, Crav, Cushman, Doubleday, Dromgoole, Dunlap, Fairfield, Farlin, Fuller, J. Garland, Gholson, Glascock, Grantland, Haley, Hamer, Hannegan, A. G. Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Holt, Howard, Hubley, Huntington, Huntsman, Ingham, J. Johnson, C. Johnson, J. W. Jones, Kennon, Lane, Lansing, Lawler, G. Lee, J. Lee, Leonard, Logan, Loyal, Lucas, A. Mann, Martin, W. Mason, M. Mason, McKay, McKeon, McKim, Miller, Mullenberg, Page, Parks, Patterson, Patton, F. Pierce, D. J. Pearce, Phelps, Pinckney, Joseph Reynolds, Rogers, Shinn, Sckles, Smith, Sprague, Taylor, Thomas, J. Thomson, Turritt, Vanderpoel, Wagener, Ward, Wardwell, Webster, T. T. Whittlesey, Wise, Yell—87.

So the House determined to adhere to its disagreement to the Senate's amendment; and a message was sent to that body, by its Clerk, notifying them of the fact.

Mr. MANN, of New York, then asked leave to submit a motion to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill for the increase of the army. Though he was in favor, he said, of the bill, yet, being well assured it would occupy the whole residue of this session, he would, for the purpose of proceeding to other business, move to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of that bill, for the purpose of laying it on the table.

Mr. CALHOON, of Kentucky, objected, and consequently the House went into Committee of the Whole again; and Mr. HAWES, being entitled to the floor, gave way to

Mr. MANN, of New York, on whose motion the above bill was laid aside, not to be reported to the House: Yeas 80, nays 44.

On motion of Mr. MANN, of New York, the committee took up the bill for the appointment of commissioners to adjust the claims to land under the treaty of 1832, with the Choctaw Indians.

[MARCH 3, 1837.]

There being no motion to amend, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

The committee then took up the bill authorizing the relinquishment of the 16th section for the use of schools, and the entry of other lands in lieu.

Mr. SHIELDS moved an amendment providing that certain public lands in the State of Tennessee shall be ceded to the State, on conditions therein prescribed.

After some remarks by Messrs. SHIELDS, GHOLSON, HARDIN, DUNLAP, and WILLIAMS of North Carolina,

Mr. MANN, of New York, moved to lay the bill aside.

Mr. GHOLSON inquired if this motion was in order.

The CHAIRMAN decided that it was in order.

Mr. GHOLSON appealed from that decision; and, after some remarks by Messrs. GHOLSON, SHIELDS, LOVE, and CRAIG, the appeal was withdrawn, and the motion to lay the bill aside was decided in the affirmative: Yeas 92, nays 40.

On motion of Mr. SUTHERLAND, the committee rose and reported the bill making appropriations for light-houses, light-boats, &c., and the bill for the appointment of commissioners to adjust the claims to land under the treaty with the Choctaw Indians.

The Speaker having resumed the chair, the bill in relation to the Choctaw Indians was read a third time and passed.

The House then took up and concurred in the amendments of the Committee of the Whole to the light-house bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved the previous question; which was seconded by the House, and the main question ordered.

Mr. STORER called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 108, nays 60.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. HOWARD, the House took up the bill from the Senate entitled "An act to continue in force, for a limited time, the act entitled an act to carry into effect a convention between the United States and Spain;" and the same was read a third time, and passed.

The bill from the Senate to provide for a more equitable administration of the navy pension fund having been returned to the Senate with an amendment, that body had sent it back, disagreeing with the amendment of the House.

Mr. JARVIS moved that the House insist upon its amendment.

Mr. WISE opposed the motion; Messrs. PARKER and JARVIS sustained it.

Mr. WISE moved that the House recede from its amendment; which motion was disagreed to; and the motion to insist was agreed to.

CREEK RESERVATIONS.

The "bill to authorize and sanction sales of Creek reservations under the treaty of 1832" was then taken up.

Mr. VINTON opposed the bill, and moved to lay it aside; which motion was warmly opposed by

Mr. LEWIS, who made a brief explanation of its provisions, and showed the justice and necessity of its passage, for the benefit of the Indians themselves, as well as the whites, when

Mr. VINTON's motion was disagreed to without a division.

Mr. HARDIN moved to strike out the words "widows and administrators," in the section authorizing the President of the United States to confirm such sales as were made by them; but subsequently modified his motion so as to strike out the whole of the second section, applying to the sales by widows, children, heirs, &c.

Mr. BELL gave an explanation of the reason which had induced the Committee on Indian Affairs to insert that section, (and said it was a most complicated question,) so as to steer between the apparently or obviously conflicting provisions of the Creek treaty and the laws of Alabama.

Mr. LEWIS explained that the object of this bill was to harmonize the conflicting provisions referred to, and the very section proposed to be stricken out had been inserted for the express purpose of protecting the rights of the Indians.

The motion to strike out the section was disagreed to.

Mr. VINTON submitted a proviso that the lands should not be sold for less than $1 25 per acre. Lost: Yeas 48 nays 82.

On motion of Mr. CHAPIN, the committee then rose and reported the foregoing and several other bills which had passed through Committees of the Whole to the House.

The bill to grant half pay to widows and orphans whose husbands and fathers have died of wounds received in the military service of the United States being taken up—

Mr. VINTON moved to lay it on the table. Lost, without a count.

The bill was then read a third time and passed.

The bill to authorize and sanction the sale of Creek reservations being on its third reading,

Mr. VINTON moved to lay it on the table, and asked for the yeas and nays, but the House refused to order them; and the motion being decided in the negative, the bill was read a third time and passed.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the "bill to authorize the President of the United States to cause the public vessels to cruise upon the coast in the winter season, and to relieve distressed navigators."

The Clerk was proceeding to read the above bill, when

Mr. WISE rose and raised the question that it was 12 o'clock at night, a period when many gentlemen had declared it as their conscientious opinion that the constitutional existence of that body ceased, though he did not, for he thought their powers remained till 12 o'clock M. of the 4th.

After some further remarks from Messrs. CHAMBERS of Kentucky, WISE, and DROMGOOLE,

On motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD, the committee rose and reported.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, a committee was then appointed on the part of the House, in conjunction with such committee as the Senate may appoint, to wait upon the President, and notify him that unless he has some other communication to make, the two Houses are ready to adjourn.

A message was also sent to the Senate, informing that body that the House was ready to adjourn.

COMMERCE AND NAVIGATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report, by which it appears that the statements in relation to commerce and navigation are about being finally closed, but will not be done in time enough to transmit to the House before its adjournment, and suggesting the propriety of authorizing the Clerk of the House of Representatives to have them printed.

On motion of Mr. PHILLIPS, this report was laid on the table, and ten thousand extra copies of the annual report on commerce and navigation were ordered to be printed.

Several other communications from the heads of departments were also laid on the table by the Speaker, and ordered to be printed.

MARCH 3, 1837.]

Absent Members Excused—Speaker's Address, &c.

[H. OF R.]

ABSENT MEMBERS EXCUSED.

Mr. CUSHING rose and said that during the call of the House, on the night of the 27th instant, he had voted against the motion of his colleague [Mr. ADAMS] for the unconditional excuse of those absent members who came in at the summons of the Sergeant-at-arms. He did so under the expectation that the call was to be carried through, and all absent members treated alike. But the call had been suspended; and it was unjust that the members who voluntarily appeared, and thus enabled the House to go on with its business, should be singled out for punishment, while others, who refused to come in, were left untouched. And he conceived that a general act of amnesty, at this the closing hour of the present Congress, was due to the mutual good feeling of the members of the House.

Whereupon, on motion of Mr. C., the House reconsidered the vote by which certain members, brought before the House during the call of the 27th, had been excused on condition of paying fees; and the vote being again taken, they were excused without condition.

Mr. SMITH, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the President, and inform him that the two Houses of Congress, having finished the business before them, were now ready the adjourn, unless he had some further communication to make, reported that they had performed the duty assigned to them, and were answered by the President, that he had no other official communication to make, but that he had charged them to say that it was the wish of his heart that each member of Congress might enjoy health and prosperity in this world, and happiness in the world to come.

Mr. PATTON moved that this House adjourn sine die.

SPEAKER'S ADDRESS.

The SPEAKER then rose and addressed the House as follows:

GENTLEMEN: The twenty-fourth Congress has now closed its deliberations, and, being about to be dissolved, I seize the moment of our separation to return to this House my profound acknowledgments for the many evidences I have had of your indulgent kindness, and generous confidence and support, during the period I have presided over your deliberations; but more especially do I return to you my sincere thanks for the vote you have been pleased this day to pass, approving my official conduct in the chair. No language, gentlemen, can adequately convey the deep sense of gratitude which this testimonial of your good opinion has excited in my breast. The gratification which it has afforded is the greater, because the resolution which you have passed conveys the voluntary and deliberately expressed opinions of gentlemen, with many of whom I have been long associated here, all of whom have been the eyewitnesses of my conduct as the presiding officer of this House, and whose friendship, esteem, and confidence, I shall cherish to the latest hour of my life.

I entered upon the duties of this high station with a full sense of the responsibility which must often devolve upon me, and with the fixed purpose, if I know my own heart, so to discharge those duties as to merit the respect and good opinion of this House and the approbation of the country. I have had no other desire than that the rules and parliamentary laws by which our proceedings are regulated should be properly expounded and correctly administered. It is due to candor to say that the steady and unwavering support which you have upon all occasions given me has alone enabled me successfully to discharge the duties assigned me. The anxiety and solicitude which I have often felt, and especially in seasons of great political excitement, from which our deliberations have not been exempt, to perform my duty, not only with faithfulness, but acceptably to the House and to the country, can be known and appreciated only by him who has filled this chair. Amidst the embarrassments and difficulties which have often surrounded me, it has given me pleasure, upon all occasions, to court the advice and correction of the House if I erred; and it is a source of the highest gratification to me to know that, upon the numerous occasions when the House has been appealed to to affirm or reverse the official decisions, which it was my duty to make, you have promptly given me your support. I am not vain enough to believe that I have passed through the many trying occasions which have occurred in the course of our deliberations, during which many difficult and often novel questions of parliamentary law and practice have been suddenly presented for instantaneous decision, without having often fallen into error. If, however, I have erred, I trust it has not been on points material; I know it has not been intentional; and the approbation of my official conduct which you have this day expressed affords the highest proof that you have generously overlooked my errors, and done more than justice to the unwearied efforts I have made to merit your good opinion, and, so far as depended on my official acts, to promote the interests of our constituents.

If, gentlemen, in the course of our deliberations as the representatives of the nation, there has been occasional excitement or feeling, growing out of political collisions, the natural offspring of honest differences of opinion, now that we are about to separate, many of us never again to meet in this hall, or "this side the grave," may we not hope that all recollection of unpleasant incidents that are passed may be forgotten, and that each one of us, whatever may be his future destiny, may devote himself to the advancement of the best interests of our country. In taking leave of you, gentlemen, I wish you a safe return to your families and friends; and my prayer is, that the blessings of an overruling Providence may rest upon all.

And now it only remains for me to perform the last duty assigned me, by the adjournment of this House; and, accordingly, I announce that this House stands adjourned without day.

The House then adjourned.

OFFICIAL—FROM THE GLOBE.

Reasons of President Jackson for not acting definitively on the bill entitled "An act designating and limiting the funds receivable for the revenues of the United States."

The bill from the Senate entitled "An act designating and limiting the funds receivable for the revenues of the United States" came to my hands yesterday, at two o'clock P. M. On perusing it, I found its provisions so complex and uncertain, that I deemed it necessary to obtain the opinion of the Attorney General of the United States on several important questions, touching its construction and effect, before I could decide on the disposition to be made of it. The Attorney General took up the subject immediately, and his reply was reported to me this day, at five o'clock P. M. As this officer, after a careful and laborious examination of the bill, and a distinct expression of his opinion on the points proposed to him, still came to the conclusion that the construction of the bill, should it become a law, would be yet a subject of much perplexity and doubt, (a view of the bill entirely coincident with my own,) and as I cannot think it proper, in a matter of such interest and of such constant application, to approve a bill so liable to diversity of interpretations, and more especially as I have not had time, amid the duties constantly pressing on me, to give the subject that deliberate consideration which its importance demands, I am constrained to retain the bill, without acting definitively thereon; and to the end that my reasons for this step may be fully understood, I shall cause this paper, with the opinion of the Attorney General, and the bill in question, to be deposited in the Department of State.

ANDREW JACKSON.

WASHINGTON, March 3, 1837, $\frac{1}{4}$ before 12 P. M.

ATTORNEY GENERAL'S OFFICE,
March 3, 1837.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive the several questions proposed to me by you, on the bill which has just passed the two Houses of Congress, entitled "An act designating and limiting the funds receivable for the revenues of the United States," and which is now before you for consideration. These questions may be arranged under three general heads, and, in that order, I shall proceed to reply to them.

"1. Will the proposed bill, if approved, repeal or alter the laws now in force designating the currency required to be received in payment of the public dues, for lands or otherwise?"

"Will it compel the Treasury officers to receive the notes of specie-paying banks, having the characteristics described in its first and second sections?"

"In what respect does it differ from, and how far will it change, the joint resolution of April 30, 1836?"

Answer. In order to a correct reply to this question, and indeed to any other question arising on this obscurely penned bill, we must first obtain a general view of all its provisions.

The first section requires the Secretary of the Treasury to take measures for collecting the public revenue; first, in the legal currency of the United States, (i. e. gold and silver;) or, second, in the notes of such specie-paying banks as shall, from time to time, conform to certain conditions in regard to small bills, described in the section. This section does not expressly give the Secretary power to direct that any particular notes shall be received for lands or for duties, but it forbids the receipt of any paper currency other than such bank notes as are described in the section; and it requires the Secretary to adopt measures, in his discretion, to effectuate that prohibition.

The second section extends the prohibition still further, by forbidding the receipt of any notes which the banks in which they are to be deposited shall not, under the supervision and control of the Secretary of the Treasury, agree to pass to the credit of the United States as cash; to which is added a proviso, authorizing the Secretary to withdraw the public deposits from any bank which shall refuse to receive as cash, from the United States, any notes receivable under the law, which such bank receives, in the ordinary course of business, on general deposit.

The third and last section allows the receipt, as heretofore, of land scrip and Treasury certificates for public lands, and forbids the Secretary of the Treasury to make any discrimination in the funds receivable (other than such as results from the receipt of land scrip or Treasury certificates) between the different branches of the public revenue.

From this analysis of the bill, it appears that, so far as regards bank notes, the bill designates and limits their receivableness for the revenues of the United States: first, by forbidding the receipt of any except such as have all the characteristics described in the first and second sections of the bill; and, secondly, by restraining the Secretary of the Treasury from making any discrimination, in this respect, between the different branches of the public revenue. In this way the bill performs, to a certain extent, the office of "designating and limiting the funds receivable for the revenues of the United States," as mentioned in its title; but it would seem, from what has been stated, that it is only in this way that any such office is performed. This impression will be fully confirmed as we proceed.

The bill, should it be approved, will be supplementary to the laws now in force, relating to the same subject; but as it contains no repealing clause, no provision of those former laws, except such as may be plainly repugnant to the present bill, will be repealed by it.

The existing laws embraced in the above question, and applicable to the subject, are—

1st. As to the duties on goods imported.—The 74th section of the collection law of the 2d of March, 1799, the first part of which, re-enacting, in this respect, the act of the 31st of July, 1789, provides "that all duties and fees to be collected shall be payable in money of the United States, or in foreign gold and silver coins, at the following rates," &c. The residue of the section, as to rates, has been altered by subsequent laws, and the clause quoted was varied during the existence of the Bank of the United States, the notes of which were expressly made receivable in all payments to the United States, and during the existence of the act making Treasury notes receivable, by such acts; but in no other respect has it ever been repealed.

2d. As to public lands.—The general land law of the 10th of May, 1800, section 5, provided that no lands should be sold, "at either public or private sale, for less than two dollars per acre, and payment may be made for the same, by all purchasers, either in specie or in evidences of the public debt of the United States, at the rates prescribed" by a prior law. This provision was varied by the acts relative to Treasury notes and the Bank of the United States, in like manner as above mentioned. The second section of the general land law of the 24th of April, 1820, abrogated the allowance of credits on the sale of public lands after the 1st day of July then next; required every purchaser at public sale to make complete payment on the day of purchase; and the purchaser at private sale to produce to the register a receipt from the Treasurer of the United States, or from the receiver of the district, for the amount of the purchase money. The proviso to the 4th section of the same law enacted, in respect to reverted lands, and lands remaining unsold, that they should not be sold for less price than one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, "nor on any other terms than that of cash payment." This latter act has been further modified by the act allowing Virginia land scrip to be received in payment for public lands.

3d. As to both duties and lands.—The joint resolution of the 30th of April, 1816, provides that the Secretary of the Treasury "be required and directed to adopt such measures as he may deem necessary to cause, as soon as may be, all duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money, accruing or becoming payable to the United States, to be collected and paid in the legal currency of the United States, or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, as by law provided and declared, or in notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand in the said legal currency of the United States; and that, from and after the 20th day of February next, no such duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money, accruing or becoming payable to the United States, as aforesaid, ought to be collected or received otherwise than in the legal currency of the United States, or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, or in notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand in the legal currency of the United States." According to the opinion given by me, as a member of your cabinet, in the month of July last, and to which I still adhere, this resolution was mandatory only as it respected the legal currency of the United States, Treasury notes, and notes of the Bank of the United States; and in respect to the notes of the State banks, though payable and paid in specie, was permissive merely, in the discretion of the Secretary; and in accordance with this opinion has been the practical construction given to the resolution by the Treasury Department. It is known to you, however, that distinguished names have been vouched for the opinion that the resolution was mandatory as to the notes of all specie-paying banks; that the debtor had the right, at his option, to make payment in such notes; and that, if tendered by him, the Treasury officers had no discretion to refuse them.

It is thus seen that the laws now in force, so far as they positively enjoin the receipt of any particular currency in payment of the public dues, are confined to gold and silver, except that in certain cases Virginia land scrip and Treasury certificates are directed to be received on the sale of public lands. In my opinion, there is nothing in the bill before me repugnant to those laws. The bill does not expressly declare and enact that any particular species of currency shall be receivable in payment of the public revenue. On the contrary, as the provisions of the first and second sections are chiefly of a negative character, I think they do not take away the power of the Secretary, previously possessed under the acts of Congress, and as the agent of the President, to forbid the receipt of any bank notes which are not, by some act of Congress, expressly made absolutely receivable in payment of the public dues.

The above view will, I think, be confirmed by a closer examination of the bill. It sets out with the assumption that there is a currency established by law, (i. e. gold and silver;) and it further assumes that the public revenue of all descriptions ought to be collected exclusively in such legal currency, or in bank notes of a certain character; and therefore it provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall take measures to effect a collection of the revenue "in the legal currency of the United States, or in notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand in the said legal currency," under certain restrictions, afterwards mentioned in the act.

This question, then, arises: are bank notes, having the requisite characteristics, placed by the clause just quoted on the same footing with the legal currency, so as to make it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to allow the receipt of them, when tendered by the debtor? In my judgment, such is not the effect of the provision.

If Congress had intended to make so important an alteration of the existing law as to compel the receiving officers to take payment in the bank notes described in the bill, the natural phraseology would have been, "in the legal currency of the United States, and in notes of banks which are payable and paid in the said legal currency," &c. And it is reasonable to presume that Congress would have used such phraseology, or would have gone on to make a distinct provision, expressly declaring that such bank notes should be receivable, as was done in the bank charters of 1790 and 1816; and as was also done by the acts relative to evidences of debt, Treasury notes, and Virginia land scrip. The form of one of these provisions (the 14th section of the act incorporating the late Bank of the United States) will illustrate the idea I desire to present.

"SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That the bills or notes of the said corporation, originally made payable, or which shall have become payable, on demand, shall be receivable in all payments to the United States, unless otherwise directed by act of Congress."

The difference between the language there used and that employed in the present bill is too obvious to require comment. It is true that the word "or," when it occurs in wills and agreements, is sometimes construed to mean and, in order to give effect to the plain intent of the parties; and such a construction of the word may sometimes be given when it occurs in statutes, where the general intent of the law makers evidently requires it. But this construction of the word, in the present case, is not only unnecessary, but, in my opinion, repugnant to the whole scope of the bill, which, so far from commanding the public officers to receive bank notes in cases not required by the existing laws, introduces several new prohibitions on the receipt of such notes.

Nor do I think this one of those cases in which a choice is given to the debtor to pay in one or other of two descriptions of currency, both of which are receivable by law. Such a choice was given by the land law of the 10th of May, 1800, section 5th, between specie and the evidences of the public debt of the United States then receivable by law; and also by the joint resolution of the 30th of April, 1816, between "the legal currency of the United States, or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, as by law provided and declared." The option given by that resolution continued in force so long as the laws providing and declaring that Treasury notes and notes of the Bank of the United States should be receivable in payments to the United States, and ceased when those laws expired. The distinction between that description of paper currency, which is by law expressly made receivable in payment of public dues, and the notes of the State banks, which were only permitted to be received, is plainly marked in the resolution of 1816. While the former are placed on the same footing with the legal currency, because, by previous laws, it had been so "provided and declared," the latter were left to be received or not received, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, except that he was restricted from allowing any to be received which were not payable and paid on demand in the legal currency. The bank notes spoken of in the bill before me, having never been made receivable by law, must be regarded as belonging to the latter class, and not to the former; and there can, therefore, be no greater obligation under the present bill, should it become a law, to receive them in payment, than there was to receive the paper of the State banks under the resolution of 1816.

As to the difference between this bill and the joint resolution of 1816. The bill differs from that resolution in the following particulars:

1st. It says nothing of Treasury notes and the notes of the Bank of the United States, which, by the resolution of 1816, are recognised as having been made receivable, by laws then in force, in payment of public dues of all descriptions.

2d. It abridges the discretion left with the Secretary of the Treasury by that resolution, by positively forbidding the receipt of bank notes not having the characteristics described in the first and second sections of the bill; whereas the receipt of some of the notes so forbidden might, under the resolution of 1816, have been allowed by the Secretary.

3d. It forbids the making of any discrimination, in respect to the receipt of bank notes, between the different branches of the public revenue; whereas the Secretary of the Treasury, under the resolution of 1816, was subject to no such restraint, and had the power to make the discrimination forbidden by this bill, except as to the notes of the Bank of the United States and Treasury notes.

This bill, if approved, will change the resolution of 1816, so far as it now remains in force, in the second and third particulars just mentioned; but, in my opinion, as already suggested, will change it in no other respect.

"II. What is the extent of the supervision and control allowed by this bill to the Secretary of the Treasury over the notes to be received by the deposit banks?

"And does it allow him to direct what particular notes shall or shall not be received for lands or for duties?"

Answer. After maturely considering, so far as time has been allowed me, the several provisions of the bill, I think the following conclusions may fairly be drawn from them, when taken in connexion with the laws now in force, and above referred to; and that, should it become a law, they will properly express its legal effect.

1st. That the Secretary of the Treasury cannot direct the receipt of any notes, except such as are issued by banks which conform to the first section of the law, and such as will be passed by the proper deposit bank, to the credit of the United States, as cash.

2d. That he may direct the receipt of notes issued by banks which conform to the first section; provided the deposit bank in which the notes are to be deposited shall agree to credit them as cash.

3d. That if the deposit bank in which the money is to be deposited shall refuse to receive, as cash, the notes designated by the Secretary, and which such bank receives, in the ordinary course of business, on general deposit, he may withdraw the public deposits, and select another depository which will agree to receive them.

4th. That if he cannot find a depository which will so agree, then that the Secretary cannot direct or authorize the receipt of any notes, except such as the deposit bank, primarily entitled to the deposits, will agree to receive and deposit as cash.

5th. That although a deposit bank might be willing to receive from the collectors and receivers, and to credit as cash, notes of certain banks which conform to the first section; yet, for the reasons before stated, I am of opinion that the Secretary is not obliged to allow the receipt of such notes.

6th. The Secretary is forbidden to make any discrimination in the funds receivable, "between the different branches of the public revenue;" and, therefore, though he may forbid the receipt of the notes of any particular bank or class of banks, not excluded by the bill, and may forbid the receipt of notes of denominations larger than those named in the bill, yet, when he issues any such prohibition, it must apply to all the branches of the public revenue.

7th. If I am right in the foregoing propositions, the result will be, that the proposed law will leave in the Secretary of the Treasury power to prohibit the receipt of particular notes, provided his prohibition apply to both lands and duties; and power to direct what particular notes, allowed by the law, shall be received, provided he can find a deposit bank which will agree to receive and credit them as cash.

"III. Are the deposit banks the sole judges, under this bill, of what notes they will receive? Or are they bound to receive the notes of every specie-paying bank, chartered or unchartered, wherever situated, in any part of the United States?"

Answer. In my opinion, the deposit banks, under the bill in question, will be the sole judges of the notes to be received by them from any collector or receiver of public money; and they will not be bound to receive the notes of any other bank whose notes they may choose to reject: provided they apply the same rule to the United States which they apply to their other depositors. In other words, the general rule, as to what notes are to be received as cash, prescribed by each deposit bank for the regulation of its ordinary business, must be complied with by the collectors and receivers whose moneys are to be deposited with that bank. But it will not therefore follow that those officers will be bound to receive what the bank generally receives; because, as already stated, they may refuse, of their own accord, or under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, any bank notes not expressly directed by act of Congress to be received in payment of the public dues.

I have thus answered the several questions proposed on the bill before me; and though I have been necessarily obliged to examine the subject with much haste, I have no other doubts as to the soundness of the construction above given, than such as belong to discussions of this nature, and to a proper sense of the fallibility of human judgment. It is, however, my duty to remind you that very different opinions were expressed, in the course of the debates on the proposed law, by some of the members who took part therein. It would seem, from those debates, that the bill, in some instances at least, was supported under the impression that it would compel the Treasury officers to receive all bank notes possessing all the characteristics described in the first and second sections; and that the Secretary of the Treasury would have no power to forbid their receipt. It must be confessed that the language is sufficiently ambiguous to give some plausibility to such a construction; and that it seems to derive some support from the refusal of the House of Representatives to consider an amendment reported by the Committee of Ways and Means of that House, which would, substantially, have given to the bill, in explicit terms, the interpretation I have put on it, and have removed the uncertainty which now pervades it. Under these circumstances, it may reasonably be expected that the true meaning of the bill, should it be passed into a law, will become a subject of discussion and controversy, and probably remain involved in much perplexity and doubt, until it shall have been settled by a judicial decision. How far these latter considerations are to be regarded by you in your decision on the bill, is a question which belongs to another place, and on which, therefore, I forbear to enlarge in this communication.

I have the honor to be, sir, with high respect, your obedient servant,

B. F. BUTLER.

To the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES.

An act designating and limiting the funds receivable for the revenues of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, required to adopt such measures as he may deem necessary to effect a collection of the public revenue of the United States, whether arising from duties, taxes, debts, or sales of lands, in the manner and on the principles herein provided; that is, that no such duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money, payable for lands, shall be collected or received otherwise than in the legal currency of the United States, or in notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand in the said legal currency of the United States, under the following restrictions and conditions in regard to such notes, to wit: from and after the passage of this act, the notes of no bank which shall issue or circulate bills or notes of a less denomination than five dollars shall be received on account of the public dues; and, from and after the thirtieth day of December, eighteen hundred and thirty-nine, the notes of no bank which shall issue or circulate bills or notes of a less denomination than ten dollars shall be so receivable; and, from and after the thirtieth day of December, one thousand eight hundred and forty-one, the like prohibition shall be extended to the notes of all banks issuing bills or notes of a less denomination than twenty dollars.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That no notes shall be received by the collectors or receivers of the public money which the banks in which they are to be deposited, shall not, under the supervision and control of the Secretary of the Treasury, agree to pass to the credit of the United States as cash: Provided, That, if any deposit bank shall refuse to receive and pass to the credit of the United States, as cash, any notes receivable under the provisions of this act, which said bank, in the ordinary course of business, receives on general deposit, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to withdraw the public deposits from said bank.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That this act shall not be so construed as to prohibit receivers or collectors of the dues of the Government from receiving for the public lands any kind of land scrip or Treasury certificates now authorized by law, but the same shall hereafter be received for the public lands, in the same way and manner as has heretofore been practised; and it shall not be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to make any discrimination in the funds receivable between the different branches of the public revenue, except as is provided in this section.

ASBURY DICKINS, Secretary.

Farewell Address of Andrew Jackson to the People of the United States.

FELLOW-CITIZENS: Being about to retire finally from public life, I beg leave to offer you my grateful thanks for the many proofs of kindness and confidence which I have received at your hands. It has been my fortune, in the discharge of public duties, civil and military, frequently to have found myself in difficult and trying situations, where prompt decision and energetic action were necessary, and where the interest of the country required that high responsibilities should be fearlessly encountered; and it is with the deepest emotions of gratitude that I acknowledge the continued and unbroken confidence with which you have sustained me in every trial. My public life has been a long one, and I cannot hope that it has, at all times, been free from errors. But I have the consolation of knowing that, if mistakes have been committed, they have not seriously injured the country I so anxiously endeavored to serve; and, at the moment when I surrender my last public trust, I leave this great people prosperous and happy, in the full enjoyment of liberty and peace, and honored and respected by every nation of the world.

If my humble efforts have, in any degree, contributed to preserve to you these blessings, I have been more than rewarded by the honors you have heaped upon me, and, above all, by the generous confidence with which you have supported me in every peril, and with which you have continued to animate and cheer my path to the closing hour of my political life. The time has now come, when advanced age and a broken frame warn me to retire from public concerns; but the recollection of the many favors you have bestowed upon me is engraven upon my heart, and I have felt that I could not part from your service without making this public acknowledgment of the gratitude I owe you. And if I use the occasion to offer to you the counsels of age and experience, you will, I trust, receive them with the same indulgent kindness which you have so often extended to me; and will, at least, see in them an earnest desire to perpetuate, in this favored land, the blessings of liberty and equal law.

We have now lived almost fifty years under the constitution framed by the sages and patriots of the Revolution. The conflicts in which the nations of Europe were engaged during a great part of this period, the spirit in which they waged war against each other, and our intimate commercial connexions with every part of the civilized world, rendered it a time of much difficulty for the Government of the United States. We have had our seasons of peace and of war, with all the evils which precede or follow a state of hostility with powerful nations. We encountered these trials with our constitution yet in its infancy, and under the disadvantages which a new and untried Government must always feel when it is called upon to put forth its whole strength, without the lights of experience to guide it, or the weight of precedents to justify its measures. But we have passed triumphantly through all these difficulties. Our constitution is no longer a doubtful experiment; and, at the end of nearly half a century, we find that it has preserved unimpaired the liberties of the people, secured the rights of property, and that our country has improved and is flourishing beyond any former example in the history of nations.

In our domestic concerns there is every thing to encourage us; and, if you are true to yourselves, nothing can impede your march to the highest point of national prosperity. The States which had so long been retarded in their improvement by the Indian tribes residing in the midst of them, are at length relieved from the evil; and this unhappy race—the original dwellers in our land—are now placed in a situation where we may well hope that they will share in the blessings of civilization, and be saved from that degradation and destruction to which they were rapidly hastening while they remained in the States; and while the safety and comfort of our own citizens have been greatly promoted by their removal, the philanthropist will rejoice that the remnant of that ill-fated race has been at length placed beyond the reach of injury or oppression, and that the paternal care of the General Government will hereafter watch over them and protect them.

If we turn to our relations with foreign Powers, we find our condition equally gratifying. Actuated by the sincere desire to do justice to every nation, and to preserve the blessings of peace, our intercourse with them has been conducted on the part of this Government in the spirit of frankness, and I take pleasure in saying that it has generally been met in a corresponding temper. Difficulties of old standing have been surmounted by friendly discussion, and the mutual desire to be just; and the claims of our citizens, which had been long withheld, have at length been acknowledged and adjusted, and satisfactory arrangements made for their final payment; and, with a limited, and, I trust, a temporary exception, our relations with every foreign Power are now of the most friendly character—our commerce continually expanding, and our flag respected in every quarter of the world.

These cheering and grateful prospects, and these multiplied favors, we owe, under Providence, to the adoption of the federal constitution. It is no longer a question whether this great country can remain happily united, and flourish, under our present form of government. Experience, the unerring test of all human undertakings, has shown the wisdom and foresight of those who formed it; and has proved that, in the union of these States, there is a sure foundation for the brightest hopes of freedom, and for the happiness of the people. At every hazard, and by every sacrifice, this Union must be preserved.

The necessity of watching with jealous anxiety for the preservation of the Union was earnestly pressed upon his fellow-citizens by the Father of his Country in his farewell address. He has there told us, that "while experience shall not have demonstrated its impracticability, there will always be reason to distrust the patriotism of those who, in any quarter, may endeavor to weaken its bonds;" and he has cautioned us, in the strongest terms, against the formation of parties on geographical discriminations, as one of the means which might disturb our Union, and to which designing men would be likely to resort.

The lessons contained in this invaluable legacy of Washington to his countrymen should be cherished in the heart of every citizen to the latest generation; and, perhaps, at no period of time could they be more usefully remembered than at the present moment. For, when we look upon the scenes that are passing around us, and dwell upon the pages of his parting address, his paternal counsels would seem to be not merely the offspring of wisdom and foresight, but the voice of prophecy, foretelling events, and warning us of the evil to come. Forty years have passed since this imperishable document was given to his countrymen. The federal constitution was then regarded by him as an experiment, and he so speaks of it in his address, but an experiment upon the success of which the best hopes of his country depended; and we all know that he was prepared to lay down his life, if necessary, to secure to it a full and a fair trial. The trial has been made. It has succeeded beyond the proudest hopes of those who framed it. Every quarter of this widely extended nation has felt its blessings, and shared in the general prosperity produced by its adoption. But, amid this general prosperity and splendid success, the dangers of which he warned us are becoming every day more evident, and the signs of evil are sufficiently apparent to awaken the deepest anxiety in the bosom of the patriot. We behold systematic efforts publicly made to sow the seeds of discord between different parts of the United States, and to place party divisions directly upon geographical distinctions; to excite the South against the North, and the North against the South, and to force into the controversy the most delicate and exciting topics—topics upon which it is impossible that a large portion of the Union can ever speak without strong emotion. Appeals, too, are constantly made to sectional interests, in order to influence the election of the Chief Magistrate, as if it were desired that he should favor a particular quarter of the country, instead of fulfilling the duties of his station with impartial justice to all; and the possible dissolution of the Union has at length become an ordinary and familiar subject of discussion. Has the warning voice of Washington been forgotten? or have designs already been formed to sever the Union? Let it not be supposed that I impute to all of those who have taken an active part in these unwise and unprofitable discussions a want of patriotism or of public virtue. The honorable feeling of State pride, and local attachments, find a place in the bosoms of the most enlightened and pure. But while such men are conscious of their own integrity and honesty of purpose, they ought never to forget that the citizens of other States are their political brethren; and that, however mistaken they may be in their views, the great body of them are equally honest and upright with themselves. Mutual suspicions and reproaches may in time create mutual hostility, and artful and designing men will always be found, who are ready to foment these fatal divisions, and to inflame the natural jealousies of different sections of the country. The history of the world is full of such examples, and especially the history of republics.

What have you to gain by division and dissension? Delude not yourselves with the belief that a breach once made may be afterwards repaired. If the Union is once severed, the line of separation will grow wider and wider, and the controversies which are now debated and settled in the halls of legislation will then be tried in fields of battle, and determined by the sword. Neither should you deceive yourselves with the hope that the first line of separation would be the permanent one, and that nothing but harmony and concord would be found in the new associations formed upon the dissolution of this Union. Local interests would still be found there, and unchastened ambition. And if the recollection of common dangers, in which the people of these United States stood side by side against the common foe; the memory of victories won by their united valor; the prosperity and happiness they have enjoyed under the present constitution; the proud name they bear as citizens of this great republic: if all these recollections and proofs of common interest are not strong enough to bind us together as one people, what tie will hold united the new divisions of empire, when these bonds have been broken and this Union dissevered? The first line of separation would not last for a single generation; new fragments would be torn off; new leaders would spring up; and this great and glorious republic would soon be broken into a multitude of petty States, without commerce, without credit; jealous of one another; armed for mutual aggression, loaded with taxes to pay armies and leaders; seeking aid against each other from foreign Powers; insulted and trampled upon by the nations of Europe, until, harassed with conflicts, and humbled and debased in spirit, they would be ready to submit to the absolute dominion of any military adventurer, and to surrender their liberty for the sake of repose. It is impossible to look on the consequences that would inevitably follow the destruction of this Government, and not feel indignant when we hear cold calculations about the value of the Union, and have so constantly before us a line of conduct so well calculated to weaken its ties.

There is too much at stake to allow pride or passion to influence your decision. Never for a moment believe that the great body of the citizens of any State or States can deliberately intend to do wrong. They may, under the influence of temporary excitement or misguided opinions, commit mistakes; they may be misled for a time by the suggestions of self-interest; but, in a community so enlightened and patriotic as the people of the United States, argument will soon make them sensible of their errors; and, when convinced, they will be ready to repair them. If they have no higher or better motives to govern them, they will at least perceive that their own interest requires them to be just to others, as they hope to receive justice at their hands.

But, in order to maintain the Union unimpaired, it is absolutely necessary that the laws passed by the constituted authorities should be faithfully executed in every part of the country, and that every good citizen should, at all times, stand ready to put down, with the combined force of the nation, every attempt at unlawful resistance, under whatever pretext it may be made, or whatever shape it may assume. Unconstitutional or oppressive laws may, no doubt, be passed by Congress, either from erroneous views, or the want of due consideration; if they are within the reach of judicial authority, the remedy is easy and peaceful; and if, from the character of the law, it is an abuse of power not within the control of the judiciary, then free discussion and calm appeals to reason and to the justice of the people will not fail to redress the wrong. But until the law shall be declared void by the courts, or repealed by Congress, no individual, or combination of individuals, can be justified in forcibly resisting its execution. It is impossible that any Government can continue to exist upon any other principles. It would cease to be a Government, and be unworthy of the name, if it had not the power to enforce the execution of its own laws within its own sphere of action.

It is true that cases may be imagined disclosing such a settled purpose of usurpation and oppression, on the part of the Government, as would justify an appeal to arms. These, however, are extreme cases, which we have no reason to apprehend in a Government where the power is in the hands of a patriotic people; and no citizen who loves his country would, in any case whatever, resort to forcible resistance, unless he clearly saw that the time had come when a freeman should prefer death to submission; for if such a struggle is once begun, and the citizens of one section of the country arrayed in arms against those of another in doubtful conflict, let the battle result as it may, there will be an end of the Union, and with it an end to the hopes of freedom. The victory of the injured would not secure to them the blessings of liberty; it would avenge their wrongs, but they would themselves share in the common ruin.

But the constitution cannot be maintained, nor the Union preserved, in opposition to public feeling, by the mere exertion of the coercive powers confided to the General Government. The foundations must be laid in the affections of the people; in the security it gives to life, liberty, character, and property, in every quarter of the country; and in the fraternal attachment which the citizens of the several States bear to one another, as members of one political family, mutually contributing to promote the happiness of each other. Hence the citizens of every State should studiously avoid every thing calculated to wound the sensibility or offend the just pride of the people of other States; and they should frown upon any proceedings within their own borders likely to disturb the tranquillity of their political brethren in other portions of the Union. In a country so extensive as the United States, and with pursuits so varied, the internal regulations of the several States must frequently differ from one another in important particulars; and this difference is unavoidably increased by the varying principles upon which the American colonies were originally planted; principles which had taken deep root in their social relations before the Revolution, and therefore of necessity influencing their policy since they became free and independent States. But each State has the unquestionable right to regulate its own internal concerns according to its own pleasure; and, while it does not interfere with the rights of the people of other States, or the rights of the Union, every State must be the sole judge of the measures proper to secure the safety of its citizens, and promote their happiness; and all efforts on the part of people of other States to cast odium upon their institutions, and all measures calculated to disturb their rights of property, or to put in jeopardy their peace and internal tranquillity, are in direct opposition to the spirit in which the Union was formed, and must endanger its safety. Motives of philanthropy may be assigned for this unwarrantable interference; and weak men may persuade themselves for a moment that they are laboring in the cause of humanity, and asserting the rights of the human race; but every one, upon sober reflection, will see that nothing but mischief can come from these improper assaults upon the feelings and rights of others. Rest assured that the men found busy in this work of discord are not worthy of your confidence, and deserve your strongest reprobation.

In the legislation of Congress, also, and in every measure of the General Government, justice to every portion of the United States should be faithfully observed. No free Government can stand without virtue in the people, and a lofty spirit of patriotism; and if the sordid feelings of mere selfishness shall usurp the place which ought to be filled by public spirit, the legislation of Congress will soon be converted into a scramble for personal and sectional advantages. Under our free institutions, the citizens of every quarter of our country are capable of attaining a high degree of prosperity and happiness, without seeking to profit themselves at the expense of others; and every such attempt must in the end fail to succeed, for the people in every part of the United States are too enlightened not to understand their own rights and interests, and to detect and defeat every effort to gain undue advantages over them; and when such designs are discovered, it naturally provokes resentments which cannot always be easily allayed. Justice, full and ample justice, to every portion of the United States, should be the ruling principle of every freeman, and should guide the deliberations of every public body, whether it be State or national.

It is well known that there have always been those amongst us who wish to enlarge the powers of the General Government; and experience would seem to indicate that there is a tendency on the part of this Government to overstep the boundaries marked out for it by the constitution. Its legitimate authority is abundantly sufficient for all the purposes for which it was created; and its powers being expressly enumerated, there can be no justification for claiming any thing beyond them. Every attempt to exercise power beyond these limits should be promptly and firmly opposed. For one evil example will lead to other measures still more mischievous; and if the principle of constructive powers, or supposed advantages, or temporary circumstances, shall ever be permitted to justify the assumption of a power not given by the constitution, the General Government will before long absorb all the powers of legislation, and you will have, in effect, but one consolidated Government. From the extent of our country, its diversified interests, different pursuits, and different habits, it is too obvious for argument, that a single consolidated Government would be wholly inadequate to watch over and protect its interests; and every friend of our free institutions should be always prepared to maintain unimpaired and in full vigor the rights and sovereignty of the States, and to confine the action of the General Government strictly to the sphere of its appropriate duties.

There is, perhaps, no one of the powers conferred on the Federal Government so liable to abuse as the taxing power. The most productive and convenient sources of revenue were necessarily given to it, that it might be able to perform the important duties imposed upon it, and the taxes which it lays upon commerce being collected from the real payer in the price of the article, they do not so readily attract the attention of the people as smaller sums demanded from them directly by the taxgatherer. But the tax imposed on goods enhances by so much the price of the commodity to the consumer; and, as many of these duties are imposed on articles of necessity, which are daily used by the great body of the people, the money raised by these imposts is drawn from their pockets. Congress has no right, under the constitution, to take money from the people, unless it is required to execute some one of the specific powers intrusted to the Government; and if they raise more than is necessary for such purposes, it is an abuse of the power of taxation, and unjust and oppressive. It may, indeed, happen that the revenue will sometimes exceed the amount anticipated when the taxes were laid. When, however, this is ascertained, it is easy to reduce them, and, in such a case, it is unquestionably the duty of the Government to reduce them; for no circumstances can justify it in assuming a power not given to it by the constitution, nor in taking away the money of the people when it is not needed for the legitimate wants of the Government.

Plain as these principles appear to be, you will yet find there is a constant effort to induce the General Government to go beyond the limits of its taxing power, and to impose unnecessary burdens upon the people. Many powerful interests are continually at work to procure heavy duties on commerce, and to swell the revenue beyond the real necessities of the public service; and the country has already felt the injurious effects of their combined influence. They succeeded in obtaining a tariff of duties bearing most oppressively on the agricultural and laboring classes of society, and producing a revenue that could not be usefully employed within the range of the powers conferred upon Congress; and, in order to fasten upon the people this unjust and unequal system of taxation, extravagant schemes of internal improvements were got up in various quarters, to squander the money and to purchase support. Thus one unconstitutional measure was intended to be upheld by another, and the abuse of the power of taxation was to be maintained by usurping the power of expending the money in internal improvements. You cannot have forgotten the severe and doubtful struggle through which we passed when the executive department of the Government, by its veto, endeavored to arrest this prodigal scheme of injustice, and to bring back the legislation of Congress to the boundaries prescribed by the constitution. The good sense and practical judgment of the people, when the subject was brought before them, sustained the course of the Executive; and this plan of unconstitutional expenditures for the purposes of corrupt influence is, I trust, finally overthrown.

The result of this decision has been felt in the rapid extinguishment of the public debt, and the large accumulation of a surplus in the Treasury, notwithstanding the tariff was reduced, and is now very far below the amount originally contemplated by its advocates. But, rely upon it, the design to collect an extravagant revenue, and to burden you with taxes beyond the economical wants of the Government, is not yet abandoned. The various interests which have combined together to impose a heavy tariff, and to produce an overflowing Treasury, are too strong, and have too much at stake, to surrender the contest. The corporations and wealthy individuals who are engaged in large manufacturing establishments desire a high tariff to increase their gains. Designing politicians will support it to conciliate their favor, and to obtain the means of profuse expenditure, for the purpose of purchasing influence in other quarters; and, since the people have decided that the Federal Government cannot be permitted to employ its income in internal improvements, efforts will be made to seduce and mislead the citizens of the several States, by holding out to them the deceitful prospect of benefits to be derived from a surplus revenue collected by the General Government, and annually divided among the States; and if, encouraged by these fallacious hopes, the States should disregard the principles of economy which ought to characterize every republican Government, and should indulge in lavish expenditures, exceeding their resources, they will, before long, find themselves oppressed with debts which they are unable pay, and the temptation will become irresistible to support a high tariff in order to obtain a surplus for distribution. Do not allow yourselves, my fellow-citizens, to be misled on this subject. The Federal Government cannot collect a surplus for such purposes, without violating the principles of the constitution, and assuming powers which have not been granted. It is, moreover, a system of injustice, and, if persisted in, will inevitably lead to corruption, and must end in ruin. The surplus revenue will be drawn from the pockets of the people, from the farmer, the mechanic, and the laboring classes of society; but who will receive it when distributed among the States, where it is to be disposed of by leading State politicians, who have friends to favor and political partisans to gratify? It will certainly not be returned to those who paid it, and who have most need of it, and are honestly entitled to it. There is but one safe rule; and that is, to confine the General Government rigidly within the sphere of its appropriate duties. It has no power to raise a revenue or impose taxes except for the purposes enumerated in the constitution; and if its income is found to exceed these wants, it should be forthwith reduced, and the burden of the people so far lightened.

In reviewing the conflicts which have taken place between different interests in the United States, and the policy pursued since the adoption of our present form of government, we find nothing that has produced such deep-seated evil as the course of legislation in relation to the currency. The constitution of the United States unquestionably intended to secure to the people a circulating medium of gold and silver. But the establishment of a national bank by Congress, with the privilege of issuing paper money receivable in the payment of the public dues, and the unfortunate course of legislation in the several States upon the same subject, drove from general circulation the constitutional currency, and substituted one of paper in its place.

It was not easy for men engaged in the ordinary pursuits of business, whose attention had not been particularly drawn to the subject, to foresee all the consequences of a currency exclusively of paper; and we ought not, on that account, to be surprised at the facility with which laws were obtained to carry into effect the paper system. Honest and even enlightened men are sometimes misled by the specious and plausible statements of the designing. But experience has now proved the mischiefs and dangers of a paper currency; and it rests with you to determine whether the proper remedy shall be applied.

The paper system being founded on public confidence, and having of itself no intrinsic value, it is liable to great and sudden fluctuations; thereby rendering property insecure, and the wages of labor unsteady and uncertain. The corporations which create the paper money cannot be relied upon to keep the circulating medium uniform in amount. In times of prosperity, when confidence is high, they are tempted, by the prospect of gain, or by the influence of those who hope to profit by it, to extend their issues of paper beyond the bounds of discretion and the reasonable demands of business. And when these issues have been pushed on, from day to day, until public confidence is at length shaken, then a reaction takes place, and they immediately withdraw the credits they have given, suddenly curtail their issues, and produce an unexpected and ruinous contraction of the circulating medium, which is felt by the whole community. The banks, by this means, save themselves, and the mischievous consequences of their imprudence or cupidity are visited upon the public. Nor does the evil stop here. These ebbs and flows in the currency, and these indiscreet extensions of credit, naturally engender a spirit of speculation injurious to the habits and character of the people. We have already seen its effects in the wild spirit of speculation in the public lands and various kinds of stock, which within the last year or two seized upon such a multitude of our citizens, and threatened to pervade all classes of society, and to withdraw their attention from the sober pursuits of honest industry. It is not by encouraging this spirit that we shall best preserve public virtue and promote the true interests of our country. But if your currency continues as exclusively paper as it now is, it will foster this eager desire to amass wealth without labor; it will multiply the number of dependents on bank accommodations and bank favors; the temptation to obtain money at any sacrifice will become stronger and stronger, and inevitably lead to corruption, which will find its way into your public councils, and destroy, at no distant day, the purity of your Government. Some of the evils which arise from this system of paper press with peculiar hardship upon the class of society least able to bear it. A portion of this currency frequently becomes depreciated or worthless, and all of it is easily counterfeited in such a manner as to require peculiar skill and much experience to distinguish the counterfeit from the genuine note. These frauds are most generally perpetrated in the smaller notes, which are used in the daily transactions of ordinary business; and the losses occasioned by them are commonly thrown upon the laboring classes of society, whose situation and pursuits put it out of their power to guard themselves from these impositions, and whose daily wages are necessary for their subsistence. It is the duty of every Government so to regulate its currency as to protect this numerous class, as far as practicable, from the impositions of avarice and fraud. It is more especially the duty of the United States, where the Government is emphatically the Government of the people, and where this respectable portion of our citizens are so proudly distinguished from the laboring classes of all other nations, by their independent spirit, their love of liberty, their intelligence, and their high tone of moral character. Their industry, in peace, is the source of our wealth; and their bravery, in war, has covered us with glory; and the Government of the United States will but ill discharge its duties if it leaves them a prey to such dishonest impositions. Yet it is evident that their interests cannot be effectually protected, unless silver and gold are restored to circulation.

These views alone, of the paper currency, are sufficient to call for immediate reform; but there is another consideration which should still more strongly press it upon your attention.

Recent events have proved that the paper-money system of this country may be used as an engine to undermine your free institutions; and that those who desire to engross all power in the hands of the few, and to govern by corruption or force, are aware of its power, and prepared to employ it. Your banks now furnish your only circulating medium, and money is plenty or scarce, according to the quantity of notes issued by them. While they have capitals not greatly disproportioned to each other, they are competitors in business, and no one of them can exercise dominion over the rest; and although, in the present state of the currency, these banks may and do operate injuriously upon the habits of business, the pecuniary concerns, and the moral tone of society, yet, from their number and dispersed situation, they cannot combine for the purposes of political influence; and, whatever may be the dispositions of some of them, their power of mischief must necessarily be confined to a narrow space, and felt only in their immediate neighborhoods.

But when the charter for the Bank of the United States was obtained from Congress, it perfected the schemes of the paper system, and gave to its advocates the position they have struggled to obtain, from the commencement of the Federal Government to the present hour. The immense capital and peculiar privileges bestowed upon it enabled it to exercise despotic sway over the other banks, in every part of the country. From its superior strength, it could seriously injure, if not destroy, the business of any one of them which might incur its resentment; and it openly claimed for itself the power of regulating the currency throughout the United States. In other words, it asserted (and it undoubtedly possessed) the power to make money plenty or scarce, at its pleasure, at any time, and in any quarter of the Union, by controlling the issues of other banks, and permitting an expansion, or compelling a general contraction, of the circulating medium, according to its own will. The other banking institutions were sensible of its strength, and they soon generally became its obedient instruments, ready at all times to execute its mandates; and with the banks necessarily went, also, that numerous class of persons in our commercial cities who depend altogether on bank credits for their solvency and means of business; and who are therefore obliged, for their own safety, to propitiate the favor of the money power by distinguished zeal and devotion in its service. The result of the ill-advised legislation which established this great monopoly was, to concentrate the whole moneyed power of the Union, with its boundless means of corruption and its numerous dependents, under the direction and command of one acknowledged head; thus organizing this particular interest as one body, and securing to it unity and concert of action throughout the United States, and enabling it to bring forward, upon any occasion, its entire and undivided strength, to support or defeat any measure of the Government. In the hands of this formidable power, thus perfectly organized, was also placed unlimited dominion over the amount of the circulating medium, giving it the power to regulate the value of property and the fruits of labor in every quarter of the Union; and to bestow prosperity or bring ruin upon any city or section of the country, as might best comport with its own interest or policy.

We are not left to conjecture how the moneyed power, thus organized, and with such a weapon in its hands, would be likely to use it. The distress and alarm which pervaded and agitated the whole country when the Bank of the United States waged war upon the people, in order to compel them to submit to its demands, cannot yet be forgotten. The ruthless and unsparing temper with which whole cities and communities were oppressed, individuals impoverished and ruined, and a scene of cheerful prosperity suddenly changed into one of gloom and despondency, ought to be indelibly impressed on the memory of the people of the United States. If such was its power in a time of peace, what would it not have been in a season of war, with an enemy at your doors? No nation but the freemen of the United States could have come out victorious from such a contest; yet, if you had not conquered, the Government would have passed from the hands of the many to the hands of the few; and this organized money power, from its secret conclave, would have dictated the choice of your highest officers, and compelled you to make peace or war, as best suited their own wishes. The forms of your Government might, for a time, have remained, but its living spirit would have departed from it.

The distress and sufferings inflicted on the people by the bank are some of the fruits of that system of policy which is continually striving to enlarge the authority of the Federal Government beyond the limits fixed by the constitution. The powers enumerated in that instrument do not confer on Congress the right to establish such a corporation as the Bank of the United States; and the evil consequences which followed may warn us of the danger of departing from the true rule of construction, and of permitting temporary circumstances, or the hope of better promoting the public welfare, to influence, in any degree, our decisions upon the extent of the authority of the General Government. Let us abide by the constitution as it is written, or amend it, in the constitutional mode, if it is found to be defective.

The severe lessons of experience will, I doubt not, be sufficient to prevent Congress from again chartering such a monopoly, even if the constitution did not present an insuperable objection to it. But you must remember, my fellow-citizens, that eternal vigilance by the people is the price of liberty; and that you must pay the price if you wish to secure the blessing. It behooves you, therefore, to be watchful in your States, as well as in the Federal Government. The power which the moneyed interest can exercise, when concentrated under a single head, and with our present system of currency, was sufficiently demonstrated in the struggle made by the Bank of the United States. Defeated in the General Government, the same class of intriguers and politicians will now resort to the States, and endeavor to obtain there the same organization which they failed to perpetuate in the Union; and with specious and deceitful plans of public advantages, and State interests, and State pride, they will endeavor to establish, in the different States, one moneyed institution, with overgrown capital, and exclusive privileges, sufficient to enable it to control the operations of the other banks. Such an institution will be pregnant with the same evils produced by the Bank of the United States, although its sphere of action is more confined; and, in the State in which it is chartered, the money power will be able to embody its whole strength, and to move together with undivided force to accomplish any object it may wish to attain. You have already had abundant evidence of its power to inflict injury upon the agricultural, mechanical, and laboring classes of society; and over those whose engagements in trade or speculation render them dependent on bank facilities, the dominion of the State monopoly will be absolute, and their obedience unlimited. With such a bank and a paper currency, the money power would, in a few years, govern the State and control its measures; and, if a sufficient number of States can be induced to create such establishments, the time will soon come when it will again take the field against the United States, and succeed in perfecting and perpetuating its organization by a charter from Congress.

It is one of the serious evils of our present system of banking, that it enables one class of society, and that by no means a numerous one, by its control over the currency, to act injuriously upon the interests of all the others, and to exercise more than its just proportion of influence in political affairs. The agricultural, the mechanical, and the laboring classes, have little or no share in the direction of the great moneyed corporations; and, from their habits, and the nature of their pursuits, they are incapable of forming extensive combinations to act together with united force. Such concert of action may sometimes be produced in a single city, or in a small district of country, by means of personal communications with each other; but they have no regular or active correspondence with those who are engaged in similar pursuits in distant places; they have but little patronage to give to the press, and exercise but a small share of influence over it; they have no crowd of dependents about them, who hope to grow rich without labor, by their countenance and favor, and who are, therefore, always ready to execute their wishes. The planter, the farmer, the mechanic, and the laborer, all know that their success depends upon their own industry and economy, and that they must not expect to become suddenly rich by the fruits of their toil. Yet these classes of society form the great body of the people of the United States; they are the bone and sinew of the country; men who love liberty, and desire nothing but equal rights and equal laws; and who, moreover, hold the great mass of our national wealth, although it is distributed in moderate amounts among the millions of freemen who possess it. But, with overwhelming numbers and wealth on their side, they are in constant danger of losing their fair influence in the Government, and with difficulty maintain their just rights against the incessant efforts daily made to encroach upon them. The mischief springs from the power which the moneyed interest derives from a paper currency, which they are able to control; from the multitude of corporations, with exclusive privileges, which they have succeeded in obtaining in the different States, and which are employed altogether for their benefit; and, unless you become more watchful in your States, and check this spirit of monopoly and thirst for exclusive privileges, you will, in the end, find that the most important powers of Government have been given or bartered away, and the control over your dearest interests has passed into the hands of these corporations.

The paper-money system and its natural associations—monopoly and exclusive privileges—have already struck their roots too deep in the soil; and it will require all your efforts to check its further growth, and to eradicate the evil. The men who profit by the abuses, and desire to perpetuate them, will continue to besiege the halls of legislation in the General Government as well as in the States, and will seek, by every artifice, to mislead and deceive the public servants. It is to yourselves that you must look for safety, and the means of guarding and perpetuating your free institutions. In your hands is rightfully placed the sovereignty of the country, and to you every one placed in authority is ultimately responsible. It is always in your power to see that the wishes of the people are carried into faithful execution, and their will, when once made known, must, sooner or later, be obeyed. And while the people remain, as I trust they ever will, uncorrupted and incorruptible, and continue watchful and jealous of their rights, the Government is safe, and the cause of freedom will continue to triumph over all its enemies.

But it will require steady and persevering exertions on your part to rid yourselves of the iniquities and mischiefs of the paper system, and to check the spirit of monopoly and other abuses which have sprung up with it, and of which it is the main support. So many interests are united to resist all reform on this subject, that you must not hope the conflict will be a short one, nor success easy. My humble efforts have not been spared, during my administration of the Government, to restore the constitutional currency of gold and silver; and something, I trust, has been done towards the accomplishment of this most desirable object. But enough yet remains to require all your energy and perseverance. The power, however, is in your hands, and the remedy must and will be applied, if you determine upon it.

While I am thus endeavoring to press upon your attention the principles which I deem of vital importance in the domestic concerns of the country, I ought not to pass over, without notice, the important considerations which should govern your policy towards foreign Powers. It is, unquestionably, our true interest to cultivate the most friendly understanding with every nation, and to avoid, by every honorable means, the calamities of war; and we shall best attain this object by frankness and sincerity in our foreign intercourse, by the prompt and faithful execution of treaties, and by justice and impartiality in our conduct to all. But no nation, however desirous of peace, can hope to escape occasional collisions with other Powers; and the soundest dictates of policy require that we should place ourselves in a condition to assert our rights, if a resort to force should ever become necessary. Our local situation, our long line of seacoast, indented by numerous bays, with deep rivers opening into the interior, as well as our extended and still increasing commerce, point to the navy as our natural means of defence. It will, in the end, be found to be the cheapest and most effectual; and now is the time, in a season of peace, and with an overflowing revenue, that we can, year after year, add to its strength, without increasing the burdens of the people. It is your true policy. For your navy will not only protect your rich and flourishing commerce in distant seas, but will enable you to reach and annoy the enemy, and will give to defence its greatest efficiency, by meeting danger at a distance from home. It is impossible, by any line of fortifications, to guard every point from attack against a hostile force advancing from the ocean and selecting its object; but they are indispensable to protect cities from bombardment, dock yards and naval arsenals from destruction; to give shelter to merchant vessels in time of war, and to single ships or weaker squadrons when pressed by superior force. Fortifications of this description cannot be too soon completed and armed, and placed in a condition of the most perfect preparation. The abundant means we now possess cannot be applied in any manner more useful to the country; and when this is done, and our naval force sufficiently strengthened, and our militia armed, we need not fear that any nation will wantonly insult us, or needlessly provoke hostilities. We shall more certainly preserve peace, when it is well understood that we are prepared for war.

In presenting to you, my fellow-citizens, these parting counsels, I have brought before you the leading principles upon which I endeavored to administer the Government in the high office with which you twice honored me. Knowing that the path of freedom is continually beset by enemies, who often assume the disguise of friends, I have devoted the last hours of my public life to warn you of the dangers. The progress of the United States, under our free and happy institutions, has surpassed the most sanguine hopes of the founders of the republic. Our growth has been rapid beyond all former example, in numbers, in wealth, in knowledge, and all the useful arts which contribute to the comforts and convenience of man; and from the earliest ages of history to the present day there never have been thirteen millions of people associated in one political body, who enjoyed so much freedom and happiness as the people of these United States. You have no longer any cause to fear danger from abroad; your strength and power are well known throughout the civilized world, as well as the high and gallant bearing of your sons. It is from within, among yourselves, from cupidity, from corruption, from disappointed ambition, and inordinate thirst for power, that factions will be formed and liberty endangered. It is against such designs, whatever disguise the actors may assume, that you have especially to guard yourselves. You have the highest of human trusts committed to your care. Providence has showered on this favored land blessings without number, and has chosen you as the guardians of freedom to preserve it for the benefit of the human race. May He who holds in his hands the destinies of nations make you worthy of the favors he has bestowed, and enable you, with pure hearts and pure hands, and sleepless vigilance, to guard and defend to the end of time the great charge he has committed to your keeping.

My own race is nearly run; advanced age and failing health warn me that before long I must pass beyond the reach of human events, and cease to feel the vicissitudes of human affairs. I thank God that my life has been spent in a land of liberty, and that he has given me a heart to love my country with the affection of a son. And, filled with gratitude for your constant and unwavering kindness, I bid you a last and affectionate farewell.

ANDREW JACKSON.

MARCH 4, 1837.

President Van Buren's Inaugural Address.

FELLOW-CITIZENS: The practice of all my predecessors imposes on me an obligation I cheerfully fulfil, to accompany the first and solemn act of my public trust with an avowal of the principles that will guide me in performing it, and an expression of my feelings on assuming a charge so responsible and vast. In imitating their example I tread in the footsteps of illustrious men, whose superiors, it is our happiness to believe, are not found on the executive calendar of any country. Among them we recognise the earliest and firmest pillars of the republic; those by whom our national independence was first declared; him who, above all others, contributed to establish it on the field of battle; and those whose expanded intellect and patriotism constructed, improved, and perfected, the inestimable institutions under which we live. If such men, in the position I now occupy, felt themselves overwhelmed by a sense of gratitude for this, the highest of all marks of their country's confidence, and by a consciousness of their inability adequately to discharge the duties of an office so difficult and exalted, how much more must these considerations affect one who can rely on no such claims for favor or forbearance. Unlike all who have preceded me, the Revolution, that gave us existence as one people, was achieved at the period of my birth; and, whilst I contemplate with grateful reverence that memorable event, I feel that I belong to a later age, and that I may not expect my countrymen to weigh my actions with the same kind and partial hand.

So sensibly, fellow-citizens, do these circumstances press themselves upon me, that I should not dare to enter upon my path of duty, did I not look for the generous aid of those who will be associated with me in the various and co-ordinate branches of the Government; did I not repose, with unwavering reliance, on the patriotism, the intelligence, and the kindness, of a people who never yet deserted a public servant honestly laboring in their cause; and, above all, did I not permit myself humbly to hope for the sustaining support of an ever-watchful and beneficent Providence.

To the confidence and consolation derived from these sources, it would be ungrateful not to add those which spring from our present fortunate condition. Though not altogether exempt from embarrassments that disturb our tranquility at home and threaten it abroad, yet, in all the attributes of a great, happy, and flourishing people, we stand without a parallel in the world. Abroad, we enjoy the respect and, with scarcely an exception, the friendship of every nation. At home, while our Government quietly, but efficiently, performs the sole legitimate end of political institutions, in doing the greatest good to the greatest number, we present an aggregate of human prosperity surely not elsewhere to be found.

How imperious, then, is the obligation imposed upon every citizen, in his own sphere of action, whether limited or extended, to exert himself in perpetuating a condition of things so singularly happy. All the lessons of history and experience must be lost upon us, if we are content to trust alone to the peculiar advantages we happen to possess. Position and climate, and the bounteous resources that nature has scattered with so liberal a hand—even the diffused intelligence and elevated character of our people—will avail us nothing, if we fail sacredly to uphold those political institutions that were wisely and deliberately formed with reference to every circumstance that could preserve, or might endanger, the blessings we enjoy. The thoughtful framers of our constitution legislated for our country as they found it. Looking upon it with the eyes of statesmen and of patriots, they saw all the sources of rapid and wonderful prosperity; but they saw also that various habits, opinions, and institutions, peculiar to the various portions of so vast a region, were deeply fixed. Distinct sovereignties were in actual existence, whose cordial union was essential to the welfare and happiness of all. Between many of them there was, at least to some extent, a real diversity of interests, liable to be exaggerated through minister designs; they differed in size, in population, in wealth, and in actual and prospective resources and power; they varied in the character of their industry and staple productions; and in some existed domestic institutions which, unwisely disturbed, might endanger the harmony of the whole. Most carefully were all these circumstances weighed, and the foundations of the new Government laid upon principles of reciprocal concession and equitable compromise. The jealousies which the smaller States might entertain of the power of the rest were allayed by a rule of representation, confessedly unequal at the time, and designed forever to remain so. A natural fear that the broad scope of general legislation might bear upon, and unwisely control, particular interests, was counteracted by limits strictly drawn around the action of the federal authority; and to the people and the States was left unimpaired their sovereign power over the innumerable subjects embraced in the internal government of a just republic, excepting such only as necessarily appertain to the concerns of the whole confederacy, or its intercourse, as a united community, with the other nations of the world.

This provident forecast has been verified by time. Half a century, teeming with extraordinary events, and elsewhere producing astonishing results, has passed along, but on our institutions it has left no injurious mark. From a small community we have risen to a people powerful in numbers and in strength; but with our increase has gone, hand in hand, the progress of just principles; the privileges, civil and religious, of the humblest individual are still sacredly protected at home; and, while the valor and fortitude of our people have removed far from us the slightest apprehension of foreign power, they have not yet induced us, in a single instance, to forget what is right. Our commerce has been extended to the remotest nations; the value and even nature of our productions has been greatly changed; a wide difference has arisen in the relative wealth and resources of every portion of our country; yet the spirit of mutual regard and of faithful adherence to existing compacts has continued to prevail in our councils, and never long been absent from our conduct. We have learned by experience a fruitful lesson: that an implicit and undeviating adherence to the principles on which we set out can carry us prosperously onward, through all the conflicts of circumstances and the vicissitudes inseparable from the lapse of years.

The success that has thus attended our great experiment is, in itself, a sufficient cause for gratitude, on account of the happiness it has actually conferred, and the example it has unanswerably given. But to me, my fellow-citizens, looking forward to the far-distant future, with ardent prayers and confiding hopes, this retrospect presents a ground for still deeper delight. It impresses on my mind a firm belief that the perpetuity of our institutions depends upon ourselves; that, if we maintain the principles on which they were established, they are destined to confer their benefits on countless generations yet to come; and that America will present to every friend of mankind the cheering proof that a popular Government, wisely formed, is wanting in no element of endurance or strength. Fifty years ago, its rapid failure was boldly predicted. Latent and uncontrollable causes of dissolution were supposed to exist, even by the wise and good; and not only did unfriendly or speculative theorists anticipate for us the fate of past republics, but the fears of many an honest patriot overbalanced his sanguine hopes. Look back on these forebodings, not hastily, but reluctantly made, and see how, in every instance, they have completely failed.

An imperfect experience, during the struggles of the Revolution, was supposed to warrant the belief that the people would not bear the taxation requisite to discharge an immense public debt already incurred, and to defray the necessary expenses of the Government. The cost of two wars has been paid, not only without a murmur, but with unequalled alacrity. No one is now left to doubt that every burden will be cheerfully borne that may be necessary to sustain our civil institutions, or guard our honor or our welfare. Indeed, all experience has shown that the willingness of the people to contribute to these ends, in cases of emergency, has uniformly outrun the confidence of their representatives.

In the early stages of the new Government, when all felt the imposing influence as they recognised the unequalled services of the first President, it was a common sentiment, that the great weight of his character could alone bind the discordant materials of our Government together, and save us from the violence of contending factions. Since his death nearly forty years are gone. Party exasperation has been often carried to its highest point; the virtue and the fortitude of the people have sometimes been greatly tried; yet our system, purified and enhanced in value by all it has encountered, still preserves its spirit of free and fearless discussion, blended with unimpaired fraternal feeling.

The capacity of the people for self-government, and their willingness, from a high sense of duty, and without those exhibitions of coercive power so generally employed in other countries, to submit to all needful restraints and exactions of the municipal law, have also been favorably exemplified in the history of the American States. Occasionally, it is true, the ardor of public sentiment, outrunning the regular progress of the judicial tribunals, or seeking to reach cases not denounced as criminal by the existing law, has displayed itself in a manner calculated to give pain to the friends of free government, and to encourage the hopes of those who wish for its overthrow. These occurrences, however, have been far less frequent in our country than in any other of equal population on the globe; and, with the diffusion of intelligence, it may well be hoped that they will constantly diminish in frequency and violence. The generous patriotism and sound common sense of the great mass of our fellow-citizens will assuredly, in time, produce this result; for as every assumption of illegal power not only wounds the majesty of the law, but furnishes a pretext for abridging the liberties of the people, the latter have the most direct and permanent interest in preserving the landmarks of social order, and maintaining, on all occasions, the inviolability of those constitutional and legal provisions which they themselves have made.

In a supposed unfitness of our institutions for those hostile emergencies which no country can always avoid, their friends found a fruitful source of apprehension, their enemies of hope. While they foresaw less promptness of action than in Governments differently formed, they overlooked the far more important consideration that, with us, war could never be the result of individual or irresponsible will, but must be a measure of redress for injuries sustained, voluntarily resorted to by those who were to bear the necessary sacrifice, who would consequently feel an individual interest in the contest, and whose energy would be commensurate with the difficulties to be encountered. Actual events have proved their error; the last war, far from impairing, gave new confidence to our Government; and, amid recent apprehensions of a similar conflict, we saw that the energies of our country would not be wanting in ample season to vindicate its rights. We may not possess, as we should not desire to possess, the extended and ever-ready military organization of other nations; we may occasionally suffer in the outset for the want of it; but among ourselves, all doubt upon this great point has ceased, while a salutary experience will prevent a contrary opinion from inviting aggression from abroad.

Certain danger was foretold from the extension of our territory, the multiplication of States, and the increase of population. Our system was supposed to be adapted only to boundaries comparatively narrow. These have been widened beyond conjecture; the members of our confederacy are already doubled; and the numbers of our people are incredibly augmented. The alleged causes of danger have long surpassed anticipation, but none of the consequences have followed. The power and influence of the republic have risen to a height obvious to all mankind; respect for its authority was not more apparent at its ancient than it is at its present limits; new and inexhaustible sources of general prosperity have been opened; the effects of distance have been averted by the inventive genius of our people, developed and fostered by the spirit of our institutions, and the enlarged variety and amount of interests, productions, and pursuits, have strengthened the chain of mutual dependence, and formed a circle of mutual benefits too apparent ever to be overlooked.

In justly balancing the powers of the Federal and State authorities, difficulties nearly insurmountable arose at the outset, and subsequent collisions were deemed inevitable. Amid these, it was scarcely believed possible that a scheme of government, so complex in construction, could remain uninjured. From time to time embarrassments have certainly occurred; but how just is the confidence in future safety imparted by the knowledge that each in succession has been happily removed. Overlooking partial and temporary evils, as inseparable from the practical operation of all human institutions, and looking only to the general result, every patriot has reason to be satisfied. While the Federal Government has successfully performed its appropriate functions in relation to foreign affairs and concerns evidently national, that of every State has remarkably improved in protecting and developing local interests and individual welfare; and if the vibrations of authority have occasionally tended too much towards one or the other, it is unquestionably certain that the ultimate operation of the entire system has been to strengthen all the existing institutions, and to elevate our whole country in prosperity and renown.

The last, perhaps the greatest, of the prominent sources of discord and disaster supposed to lurk in our political condition, was the institution of domestic slavery. Our forefathers were deeply impressed with the delicacy of this subject, and they treated it with a forbearance so evidently wise, that, in spite of every sinister foreboding, it never, until the present period, disturbed the tranquillity of our common country. Such a result is sufficient evidence of the justice and the patriotism of their course: it is evidence, not to be mistaken, that an adherence to it can prevent all embarrassment from this, as well as from every other anticipated cause of difficulty or danger. Have not recent events made it obvious to the slightest reflection, that the least deviation from this spirit of forbearance is injurious to every interest, that of humanity included? Amidst the violence of excited passions, this generous and fraternal feeling has been sometimes disregarded; and, standing as I now do before my countrymen in this high place of honor and of trust, I cannot refrain from anxiously invoking my fellow-citizens never to be deaf to its dictates. Perceiving, before my election, the deep interest this subject was beginning to excite, I believed it a solemn duty fully to make known my sentiments in regard to it; and now, when every motive for misrepresentation has passed away, I trust that they will be candidly weighed and understood. At least, they will be my standard of conduct in the path before me. I then declared that, if the desire of those of my countrymen who were favorable to my election was gratified, "I must go into the presidential chair the inflexible and uncompromising opponent of every attempt, on the part of Congress, to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, against the wishes of the slaveholding States; and also with a determination equally decided to resist the slightest interference with it in the States where it exists." I submitted also to my fellow-citizens, with fulness and frankness, the reasons which led me to this determination. The result authorizes me to believe that they have been approved, and are confided in, by a majority of the people of the United States, including those whom they most immediately affect. It now only remains to add, that no bill conflicting with these views can ever receive my constitutional sanction. These opinions have been adopted in the firm belief that they are in accordance with the spirit that actuated the venerated fathers of the republic, and that succeeding experience has proved them to be humane, patriotic, expedient, honorable, and just. If the agitation of this subject was intended to reach the stability of our institutions, enough has occurred to show that it has signally failed; and that in this, as in every other instance, the apprehensions of the timid and the hopes of the wicked for the destruction of our Government are again destined to be disappointed. Here and there, indeed, scenes of dangerous excitement have occurred; terrifying instances of local violence have been witnessed; and a reckless disregard of the consequences of their conduct has exposed individuals to popular indignation; but neither masses of the people, nor sections of the country, have been swerved from their devotion to the bond of union, and the principles it has made sacred. It will be ever thus. Such attempts at dangerous agitation may periodically return, but with each the object will be better understood. That predominating affection for our political system which prevails throughout our territorial limits; that calm and enlightened judgment which ultimately governs our people as one vast body, will always be at hand to resist and control every effort, foreign or domestic, which aims or would lead to overthrow our institutions.

What can be more gratifying than such a retrospect as this! We look back on obstacles avoided, and dangers overcome; on expectations more than realized, and prosperity perfectly secured. To the hopes of the hostile, the fears of the timid, and the doubts of the anxious, actual experience has given the conclusive reply. We have seen time gradually dispel every unfavorable foreboding, and our constitution surmount every adverse circumstance, dreaded at the outset as beyond control. Present excitement will, at all times, magnify present dangers; but true philosophy must teach us that none more threatening than the past can remain to be overcome; and we ought, for we have just reason, to entertain an abiding confidence in the stability of our institutions, and an entire conviction that, if administered in the true form, character, and spirit, in which they were established, they are abundantly adequate to preserve to us and our children the rich blessings already derived from them; to make our beloved land, for a thousand generations, that chosen spot where happiness springs from a perfect equality of political rights.

For myself, therefore, I desire to declare, that the principle that will govern me, in the high duty to which my country calls me, is a strict adherence to the letter and spirit of the constitution, as it was designed by those who framed it. Looking back to it as a sacred instrument, carefully and not easily framed; remembering that it was throughout a work of concession and compromise; viewing it as limited to national objects; regarding it as leaving to the people and the States all power not ex-licitly parted with; I shall endeavor to preserve, protect; and defend it, by anxiously referring to its provision for direction in every action. To matters of domestic concernment which it has intrusted to the Federal Government, and to such as relate to our intercourse with foreign nations, I shall zealously devote myself; beyond those limits I shall never pass.

To enter, on this occasion, into a further or more minute exposition of my views on the various questions of domestic policy, would be as obtrusive as it is probably unexpected. Before the suffrages of my countrymen were conferred upon me, I submitted to them, with great precision, my opinions on all the most prominent of these subjects. Those opinions I shall endeavor to carry out with my utmost ability.

Our course of foreign policy has been so uniform and intelligible as to constitute a rule of executive conduct which leaves little to my discretion, unless, indeed, I were willing to run counter to the lights of experience and the known opinions of my constituents. We sedulously cultivate the friendship of all nations, as the condition most compatible with our welfare and the principles of our Government. We decline alliances, as adverse to our peace. We desire commercial relations on equal terms, being ever willing to give a fair equivalent for advantages received. We endeavor to conduct our intercourse with openness and sincerity; promptly avowing our objects, and seeking to establish that mutual frankness which is as beneficial in the dealings of nations as of men. We have no disposition, and we disclaim all right, to meddle in disputes, whether internal or foreign, that may molest other countries; regarding them, in their actual state, as social communities, and preserving a strict neutrality in all their controversies. Well knowing the tried valor of our people, and our exhaustless resources, we neither anticipate nor fear any designed aggression; and, in the consciousness of our own just conduct, we feel a security that we shall never be called upon to exert our determination, never to permit an invasion of our rights without punishment or redress.

In approaching, then, in the presence of my assembled countrymen, to make the solemn promise that yet remains, and to pledge myself that I will faithfully execute the office I am about to fill, I bring with me a settled purpose to maintain the institutions of my country, which, I trust, will atone for the errors I commit.

In receiving from the people the sacred trust twice confided to my illustrious predecessor, and which he has discharged so faithfully and so well, I know that I cannot expect to perform the arduous task with equal ability and success. But, united as I have been in his counsels, a daily witness of his exclusive and unsurpassed devotion to his country's welfare, agreeing with him in sentiments which his countrymen have warmly supported, and permitted to partake largely of his confidence, I may hope that somewhat of the same cheering approbation will be found to attend upon my path. For him, I but express, with my own, the wishes of all—that he may yet long live to enjoy the brilliant evening of his well-spent life; and, for myself, conscious of but one desire, faithfully to serve my country, I throw myself, without fear, on its justice and its kindness. Beyond that, I only look to the gracious protection of the Divine Being, whose strengthening support I humbly solicit, and whom I fervently pray to look down upon us all. May it be among the dispensations of His providence to bless our beloved country with honors and with length of days; may her ways be ways of pleasantness, and all her paths be peace.

SUPPLEMENTAL SPEECHES.

ABOLITION PETITIONS.

IN SENATE, FEBRUARY 6, 1837.

The subject of the reception of abolition petitions being under consideration,

Mr. CALHOUN rose and said: If the time of the Senate permitted, I would feel it to be my duty to call for the reading of the mass of petitions on the table, in order that we might know what language they hold towards the slaveholding States and their institutions; but as it will not, I have selected, indiscriminately from the pile, two: one from those in manuscript, and the other from the printed; and, without knowing their contents, will call for the reading of them, so that we may judge by them of the character of the whole.

[Here the Secretary, on the call of Mr. CALHOUN, read the two petitions.]

Such, resumed Mr. C., is the language held towards us and ours; the peculiar institutions of the South, that on the maintenance of which the very existence of the slaveholding States depends, is pronounced to be sinful and odious in the sight of God and man; and this with a systematic design of rendering us hateful in the eyes of the world, with a view to a general crusade against us and our institutions. This, too, in the legislative halls of the Union, created by these confederated States for the better protection of their peace, their safety, and their respective institutions; and yet we, the representatives of twelve of these sovereign States, against whom this deadly war is waged, are expected to sit here in silence, hearing ourselves and constituents, day after day, denounced, without uttering a word; if we but open our lips, the charge of agitation is resounded on all sides, and we are held up as seeking to aggravate the evil which we resist. Every reflecting mind must see in all this a state of things deeply and dangerously diseased.

I do not belong, said Mr. C., to the school which holds that aggression is to be met by concession. Mine is the opposite creed, which teaches that encroachments must be met at the beginning, and that those who act on the opposite principle are prepared to become slaves. In this case in particular I hold concession or compromise to be fatal. If we concede an inch, concession would follow concession, compromise would follow compromise, until our ranks would be so broken that effectual resistance would be impossible. We must meet the enemy on the frontier, with a fixed determination of maintaining our position at every hazard. Consent to receive these insulting petitions, and the next demand will be that they be referred to a committee, in order that they may be deliberated and acted upon. At the last session we were modestly asked to receive them simply to lay them on the table, without any view of ulterior action. I then told the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] who strongly urged that course in the Senate, that it was a position that could not be maintained, as the argument in favor of acting on the petitions, if we were bound to receive, could not be resisted. I then said that the next step would be to refer the petitions to a committee; and I already see indications that such is now the intention. If we yield, that will be followed by another; and we would thus proceed, step by step, to the final consummation of the object of these petitions. We are now told that the most effectual mode of arresting the progress of abolition is to reason it down; and with this view it is urged that the petitions ought to be referred to a committee. That is the very ground which was taken at the last session in the other House; but, instead of arresting its progress, it has since advanced more rapidly than ever. The most unquestionable right may be rendered doubtful if once admitted to be a subject of controversy; and that would be the case in the present instance. The subject is beyond the jurisdiction of Congress; they have no right to touch it in any shape or form, or to make it the subject of deliberation or discussion.

In opposition to this view, it is urged that Congress is bound by the constitution to receive petitions in every case and on every subject, whether within its constitutional competency or not. I hold the doctrine to be absurd, and do solemnly believe that it would be as easy to prove that it has the right to abolish slavery as that it is bound to receive petitions for that purpose. The very existence of the rule that requires a question to be put on the reception of petitions is conclusive to show that there is no such obligation. It has been a standing rule from the commencement of the Government, and clearly shows the sense of those who formed the constitution on this point. The question on the reception would be absurd, if, as is contended, we are bound to receive. But I do not intend to argue the question; I discussed it fully at the last session; and the arguments then advanced neither have nor can be answered.

As widely as this incendiary spirit has spread, it has not yet infected this body, or the great mass of the intelligent and business portion of the North; but unless it be speedily stopped, it will spread and work upwards till it brings the two great sections of the Union into deadly conflict. This is not a new impression with me. Several years since, in a discussion with one of the Senators from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] before this fell spirit had showed itself, I then predicted that the doctrine of the proclamation and the force bill—that this Government had a right in the last resort to determine the extent of its own powers, and enforce it at the point of the bayonet, which was so warmly maintained by that Senator, would at no distant day arouse the dormant spirit of abolitionism; I told him that the doctrine was tantamount to the assumption of unlimited power on the part of the Government, and that such would be the impression on the public mind in a large portion of the Union. The consequence would be inevitable—a large portion of the Northern States believed slavery to be a sin, and would believe it to be an obligation of conscience to abolish it, if they should feel themselves in any degree responsible for its continuance, and that his doctrine would necessarily lead to the belief of such responsibility. I then predicted that it would commence, as it has, with this fanatical portion of society, and that they would begin their operation on the ignorant, the weak, the young, and the thoughtless, and would gradually extend upwards till they would become strong enough to obtain political control, when he, and others holding the highest stations in society, would, however reluctant, be compelled to yield to their doctrine, or be driven into obscurity. But four years have since elapsed, and all this is already in a course of regular fulfilment.

Standing at the point of time at which we have now arrived, it will not be more difficult to trace the course of future events now than it was then. Those who imagine that the spirit now abroad in the North will die away of itself, without a shout or convulsion, have formed a very inadequate conception of its real character; it will continue to rise and spread, unless prompt and efficient measures to stay its progress be adopted. Already it has taken possession of the pulpit, of the schools, and to a considerable extent of the press—those great instruments by which the mind of the rising generation will be formed.

However sound the great body of the non-slaveholding States are at present, in the course of a few years they will be succeeded by those who will have been taught to hate the people and institutions of nearly one half of this Union with a hatred more deadly than one hostile nation ever entertained towards another. It is easy to see the end. By the necessary course of events, if left to themselves, we must become, finally, two people. It is impossible, under the deadly hatred which must spring up between the two great sections, if the present causes are permitted to operate unchecked, that we should continue under the same political system. The conflicting elements would burst the Union asunder, as powerful as the links are which hold it together. Abolition and the Union cannot coexist. As the friend of the Union I openly proclaim it, and the sooner it is known the better. The former may now be controlled, but in a short time it will be beyond the power of man to arrest the course of events. We of the South will not, cannot, surrender our institutions. To maintain the existing relations between the two races inhabiting that section of the Union, is indispensable to the peace and happiness of both. It cannot be subverted without drenching the country in blood, and extirpating one or the other of the races. Be it good or bad, it has grown up with our society and institutions, and is so interwoven with them that to destroy it would be to destroy us as a people. But let me not be understood as admitting, even by implication, that the existing relations between the two races in the slaveholding States is an evil—far otherwise. I hold it to be a good, as it has thus far proved itself to be, to both, and will continue to prove so if not disturbed by the fell spirit of abolition. I appeal to facts. Never before has the black race of Central Africa, from the dawn of history to the present day, attained a condition so civilized, and so improved, not only physically, but morally and intellectually. It came among us in a low, degraded, and savage condition, and in the course of a few generations it has grown up under the fostering care of our institutions, as reviled as they have been, to its present comparative civilized condition. This, with the rapid increase of numbers, is conclusive proof of the general happiness of the race, in spite of all the exaggerated tales to the contrary.

In the mean time, the white or European race has not degenerated. It has kept pace with its brethren in other sections of the Union where slavery does not exist. It is odious to make comparisons; but I appeal to all sides whether the South is not equal in virtue, intelligence, patriotism, courage, disinterestedness, and all the high qualities which adorn our nature. I ask whether we have not contributed our full share of talents and political wisdom in forming and sustaining this political fabric; and whether we have not constantly inclined most strongly to the side of liberty, and been the first to see and first to resist the encroachments of power. In one thing only we are inferior—the arts of gain. We acknowledge that we are less wealthy than the Northern section of this Union; but I trace this mainly to the fiscal action of this Government, which has extracted much from and spent little among us. Had it been the reverse—if the exaction had been made from the other section, and the expenditure with us, this point of superiority would not be against us now, as it was not at the formation of this Government.

But I take higher ground. I hold that in the present state of civilization, where two races of different origin, and distinguished by color, and other physical differences, as well as intellectual, are brought together, the relation now existing in the slaveholding States between the two, is, instead of an evil, a good—a positive good. I feel myself called upon to speak freely upon the subject, where the honor and interests of those I represent are involved. I hold, then, that there never has yet existed a wealthy and civilized society in which one portion of the community did not, in point of fact, live on the labor of the other. Broad and general as is this assertion, it is fully borne out by history. This is not the proper occasion, but if it were, it would not be difficult to trace the various devices by which the wealth of all civilized communities has been so unequally divided, and to show by what means so small a share has been allotted to those by whose labor it was produced, and so large a share given to the non-producing class. The devices are almost innumerable, from the brute force and gross superstition of ancient times, to the subtle and artful fiscal contrivances of modern. I might well challenge a comparison between them and the more direct, simple, and patriarchal mode by which the labor of the African race is among us commanded by the European. I may say with truth, that in few countries so much is left to the share of the laborer, and so little exacted from him, or where there is more kind attention to him in sickness or infirmities of age. Compare his condition with the tenants of the poor-houses in the most civilized portions of Europe—look at the sick and the old and infirm slave, on one hand, in the midst of his family and friends, under the kind superintending care of his master and mistress, and compare it with the forlorn and wretched condition of the pauper in the poor-house.

But I will not dwell on this aspect of the question; I turn to the political; and here I fearlessly assert that the existing relation between the two races in the South, against which these blind fanatics are waging war, forms the most solid and durable foundation on which to rear free and stable political institutions. It is useless to disguise the fact. There is and always has been, in an advanced stage of wealth and civilization, a conflict between labor and capital. The condition of society in the South exempts us from the disorders and dangers resulting from this conflict; and which explains why it is that the political condition of the slaveholding States has been so much more stable and quiet than those of the North. The advantages of the former in this respect will become more and more manifest if left undisturbed by interference from without, as the country advances in wealth and numbers. We have in fact but just entered that condition of society where the strength and durability of our political institutions are to be tested; and I venture nothing in predicting that the experience of the next generation will fully test how vastly more favorable our condition of society is than that of other sections, for free and stable institutions, provided we are not disturbed by the interference of others, or shall have sufficient intelligence and spirit to resist promptly and successfully such interference. It rests with ourselves to meet and repel them. I look not for aid to this Government, or to the other States; not but there are kind feelings towards us on the part of the great body of the non-slaveholding States; but, as kind as their feelings may be, we may rest assured that no political party in those States will risk their ascendancy for our safety. If we do not defend ourselves, none will defend us; if we yield, we will be more and more pressed as we recede; and if we submit, we will be trampled under foot. Be assured that emancipation itself would not satisfy these fanatics—that gained, the next step would be to raise the negroes to a social and political equality with the whites; and that being effected, we would soon find the present condition of the two races reversed. They and their Northern allies would be the masters, and we the slaves; the condition of the white race in the British West India islands, as bad as it is, would be happiness to ours—there the mother country is interested in sustaining the supremacy of the European race. It is true that the authority of the former master is destroyed, but the African will there still be a slave, not to individuals, but to the community—forced to labor, not by the authority of the overseer, but by the bayonet of the soldiery and the rod of the civil magistrate.

Surrounded as the slaveholding States are with such imminent perils, I rejoice to think that our means of defence are ample, if we shall prove to have the intelligence and spirit to see and apply them before it is too late. All we want is concert, to lay aside all party differences, and unite with zeal and energy in repelling approaching dangers. Let there be concert of action, and we shall find ample means of security, without resorting to secession or disunion. I speak with full knowledge and a thorough examination of the subject, and for one see my way clearly. One thing alarms me—the eager pursuit of gain which overspreads the land, and which absorbs every faculty of the mind and every feeling of the heart. Of all passions, avarice is the most blind and uncompromising—the last to see and the first to yield to danger. I dare not hope that any thing I can say will arouse the South to a due sense of danger; I fear it is beyond the power of mortal voice to awaken it in time from the fatal security into which it has fallen.

IN SENATE, FEBRUARY 28, 1837.

DISTRIBUTION QUESTION.

Mr. CLAY said that he would trouble the Senate with but two or three words only. As to the question of fact, whether there would be a surplus or no surplus, that must depend on the extent of the assent given by the House of Representatives to the bills which had gone from this body. As to the land bill, it was doubtful whether that would augment or diminish the receipts into the Treasury; but if the House should not assent to the bill reducing the tariff, and to the various appropriations rendered necessary by the bills which had passed the Senate, some of which were characterized by great extravagance, there certainly would be a large surplus on the 1st of January next. And here (said Mr. C.) let me observe, in reply to the honorable Senator from Georgia, [Mr. CUTHBERT,] that I do not think he does justice to the members of the Senate who are usually designated as the opposition, when he supposes if they were in power they would themselves advocate the very measures which now they oppose. I certainly do not recollect a single measure to which this remark will justly apply. But let me ask the honorable Senator, in return, whether, if he or his friends were out of power, he would not feel himself called upon to oppose some of the measures to which he now yields his support? In reference to the army bill, for example, there is, in my opinion, no emergency which renders so great an increase of our military establishment at all necessary. There is not the slightest call for the numerous arsenals and armories which it proposes to establish; nor is there any more justification for the expenditure of the public money on a long list of useless fortifications. There are many other measures of a kindred character to which I do not think, in whatever attitude I might be placed, I could possibly give my assent. But in regard to the fact of surplus or no surplus, the question is perfectly free from all difficulty. Is there a surplus, this amendment provides for the distribution. Is there none, then the amendment is inoperative, and therefore perfectly harmless. And here let me call the attention of the Senate to a view of the subject which I think entitled to great weight. It has been suggested by gentlemen opposed to the amendment, that we had better wait until the next session; and then, if we find that any large surplus has accumulated, we can provide for its disposition by law. Very true. But the difference would be this: by making the provision now, we shall gain one entire year, during the whole of which time the money would have remained in the possession of the deposite banks. Suppose we come here next session, and we find a surplus of ten or fifteen millions in the Treasury; some measure is proposed as a proper disposition of it; be that measure what it may, it may be expected to produce much discussion; and, judging from all past experience, it will be weeks, and even months, before it will have passed through both Houses of Congress and received the executive sanction. Well; the money is to be taken out of the deposit banks, and applied as shall be then determined on. Now, what is the doctrine which was strenuously contended for during the discussion of the deposit bill of last session? Were we not told that, as the public money had come gradually into the possession of the deposit banks, so it must be permitted to go gradually out; and that, if a very large amount should be suddenly called for, great and ruinous pressure must be the inevitable consequence? The same argument will be urged again. The deposit banks must have time, and the result will be that, do what we will, the bill will not in fact come into operation till January twelvemonth. To save, then, the loss of an entire year, it is important that we should legislate now. If there is no surplus, the amendment can do no injury; if there is, we shall gain a year.

It is, however, objected that there is no fitness, no congruity, in an amendment of this character to a fortification bill. But I ask, what subject was the House of Representatives legislating upon? Was it not an appropriation bill? And does not this amendment provide for an appropriation or disposition of the surplus revenue among the different States, for greater safety, that it may be ready whenever there shall be a necessity to call for it? Surely, then, there is a perfect congeniality between the object of the amendment and the nature of the bill.

The honorable Senator from Connecticut [Mr. NILES] is extremely unwilling to encounter the discipline of popular opinion, which he thinks the Senate have heretofore incurred, but that it has now redeemed itself from the opprobrium of all its past errors, and is in a fair way to recover the approbation of public sentiment. Now, there is no gentleman on this floor who has recurred more frequently than he to the aristocratic feature of this branch of the Government; and is it not extraordinary that, when a disposition of the surplus revenue is proposed and advocated by an aristocratic majority of this highly aristocratic body, it meets with his favor and support? But when the very same measure comes before him as originated by his democratic friends in the democratic branch of the Government, it finds with him no favor. The honorable gentleman will not place himself in an attitude to incur popular displeasure. I submit, then, whether in consistency he ought not to vote for this measure, now that it comes to him from a purer source, in the popular portion of the National Legislature. I hope he will be induced by this consideration to give a different vote from that which he seems to have indicated.

As to the degree, however, in which the last distribution bill received the public approbation, there is, I believe, no difference of opinion. Every where that measure was hailed with acclamation. Not a single State has been found which will venture to refuse its quota of the deposits. That some difficulties should arise as to the best disposition of a fund thus suddenly thrown into the State treasuries, was to be expected. Some have given the money to towns, some have given it to banks, some to objects of internal improvement. Whether these dispositions of it were judicious, or otherwise, is, of course, a matter on which the opinions of individuals may differ. In my own State there was great diversity of opinion. But the money has finally been appropriated in a manner which must convince any candid mind that the distribution of the surplus was a beneficent measure, and eminently calculated to advance the public good. In reference to Connecticut, and, indeed, to all the other States, though there has been a great variety in the manner of its application, I am fully persuaded it will be found to have redounded greatly to their benefit. But if any particular State shall prefer to leave the money in deposit banks, at an interest of two per cent., they are free to make such a disposition of it.

In reference to the objection urged by an honorable Senator from Pennsylvania on my left, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] I must confess that I do not perceive any great force in it. And I must be permitted to observe that he was one of the last from whom I should have expected to hear an argument of that sort. He says, if we pass this amendment, the effect will be to check the necessary appropriations of the public money for purposes of the General Government. That it will, in its practical operation, tempt gentlemen from the discharge of their high duties as representatives of the entire people of the United States. But, I ask, has that been the fact? Has he seen any such influence exerted by the deposit bill of last year? What has been the character of the appropriation of public money by this body during the present session? Have not those appropriations been quite as large as at the last session? I do not object, however, to the fact only which his argument supposes, but to the principle on which it proceeds. Its fundamental principle is distrust in the people, and in their Representatives and Senators in Congress. Can it be doubted by any patriotic man that they will all perform their duty? Let a war come, and does not the honorable Senator believe that the members of this and of the other House will do all which it becomes men to do who are intrusted with the high duty of providing for the defence of their country? If his argument be well-founded, it strikes at the very root of the Government, and would, if carried out, prevent all taxation. Do we not save to the people what we take off of taxation? His argument, therefore, might be urged against having any Government at all, for the temptation he speaks of is in perpetual force, and operates alike against all taxation for the general good. But I find myself insensibly engaging in the discussion. I forbear, under a hope that other gentlemen also will limit their remarks as much as possible, that we may at length get the question.

IN SENATE, FEBRUARY 7, 1837.

CESSION OF PUBLIC LANDS.

The bill limiting the sales of public lands to actual settlers being under consideration in the Senate of the United States, Mr. CALHOUN moved a substitute, ceding the public lands to the States within which they are situated, to those States, respectively, upon the condition of their paying the United States one third of the gross amount of the sales.

In the course of the brief debate on the amendment, Mr. NORVELL observed that the substitute to the present land bill, just submitted by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, presented a tempting and beautiful offer to the new States of this Union. If he believed, not that the Senator had seriously made the proposition, but that it would be seriously carried into effect by both Houses of Congress, he should be strongly disposed to accept it at once, and to give it his humble support, as one of the representatives from the new States. The bait presented to the new States was a gilded bait; and he, for one, should take it with pleasure, if he did not apprehend that in the very act of swallowing it, when it would be too late for his safety, it would be withdrawn from him, and leave him in a lacerated condition. But, before he could consent to give up the bill which the Senate were about to pass to its third reading, before he should be willing to surrender a certain and moderately good measure, just within his grasp, for the glimmering prospect of realizing a better boon, which might never be obtained, he wanted a guarantee that the splendid substitute presented to the new States would be successfully sustained and carried through Congress. That guarantee would be best secured by the passage of the present bill. Let that be passed; let the honorable Senator unite with its friends in its favor; let him then bring forward his substitute as a separate bill, and add to it a clause repealing all previous laws contrary to its provisions, and he would pledge himself to go with the Senator in the support of his proposition. He was extremely desirous to relieve the new States from the paramount sovereignty claimed by this Government over the territorial domain within their limits. As long as that sovereignty continued to be held and exercised over them, they were not in a condition of equality with the old States of this confederacy. They had not been admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever. They were subject to the paralyzing influence and control of the General Government in all their political movements.

IN SENATE, FEBRUARY 24, 1837.

REDUCTION OF THE TARIFF.

Mr. DAVIS, in reply to Mr. RIVES, said he was anxious to obtain the floor last evening, to set the honorable gentleman from Virginia and some others right in regard to his and their course here. He had listened to the reminiscences of the gentlemen from South Carolina and New York [Messrs. CALHOUN and WRIGHT] with some satisfaction, as to the history of the tariff of 1828, which had been denominated a bill of abominations. He, too, had a lively remembrance of what occurred. It is now said by those who ought to know about the matter, for they were parties in the transaction, that there was a political bargain made between the South and the Jackson party of the Middle and West, to frame a bill in such a manner as to force the New Englanders to vote against it, and then to throw on them the odium of defeating a measure of protection. The bill of 1828 was the fruit of this extraordinary compact. He was rejoiced to have this fact published from this place, that the country may be well assured of what it has hitherto hesitated to believe.

In 1827, the manufacturers of woollens found that they had lost a large portion of the advantage given to them, and designed to be secured by the act of 1824, by an act of the British Parliament reducing the duty on wool; and the business declining under this unexpected state of things, they came here and requested Congress to place them on as good a footing as it was their purpose to do by the act of 1824. This was all that was prayed for, and this was the only interest which asked for relief. Nothing was matured in 1827, and, therefore, they came with the same request in 1828. This year began a new Congress, in which was a Jackson majority. It was composed of all interests, tariff and anti-tariff, and the question was, how should such a majority co-operate harmoniously? It was the public duty of some to advocate and others to oppose an increase of duty on woollens. The Senator from Carolina, who concurred with that majority, now publishes as history what then was conjectured. We looked on with surprise and astonishment. The Senator from New York was one of the Committee on Manufactures, and assisted to report that memorable bill. It came in loaded with duties on hemp, iron, steel, duck, ardent spirits, lead, molasses, grain, and many other articles; while woollens, though they had a nominal increase of duty, were left relatively in a worse condition than before they were touched, by imposing a heavy duty on wool. We were the more surprised, because nobody asked for increased duties on iron, steel, hemp, duck, ardent spirits, or any of the other articles, for they had most ample and liberal protection before, and the manufacturers appeared to be prosperous and happy; and while this was apparent, the suffering interest was neglected. The manufacturers of woollens asked for bread, and the committee offered them a stone.

But our eyes began to open, and to be filled with light, when we saw the anti-tariff members of the South resist at every step all propositions to reduce these high and unnecessary duties; when we saw the singular anomaly of such persons recording their votes in favor of these extravagant rates; and when we saw the authors of this bill, and the persons who demanded its provisions, because they avowed themselves the warm friends of protection, resisting every proposition to place the woollens upon any better foundation. We must have been worse than blind if we had failed to see that the design of all this was to compel us of the East, by the singular and obviously unjust and injurious provisions of the bill, to vote against it, and thus expose ourselves to be denounced by the press as the enemies of protection. We did see and understand that we were selected for political victims. The intrigue was too apparent not to be comprehended, and I am heartily rejoiced that the Senator from Carolina from this day forth makes it a part of the history of the country. The bill was to be defeated, he says, and by our votes. It was made for that purpose. The navigating interest, in its iron, cordage, and duck, was loaded with duties to attain that object. The woollens, for the same reason, were neglected. The South, to administer this unpalatable drug, voted to keep it as it was reported; believing we should be compelled, by the injustice to our interests, to vote against it, and then should be overwhelmed by the indignation of the Middle and the West, for killing a bill so eminently favorable to those sections of the country.

Believing such to be the character and objects of the measure, our friends began to inquire whether it was not wiser to defeat the supposed intrigue by voting for this bill, and thus carrying it; for the power to do this lay in their hands. The Middle and West must vote for it, and the South against it. Our votes, added to either side, made a majority. For one, I did just as the Senator from Carolina says it was designed I should do; I voted against the bill, because, upon most mature reflection, I considered its provisions highly objectionable, because of the extravagances which marked its character, and I could not reconcile it with my views of public duty to support it. But enough of our friends differed from me to carry it, and I well remember the disappointment of the South at this unexpected result. I well remember that it was then openly said by some members, that they had been deceived and misled; for the bill was to be defeated if kept in the form in which it was reported. The conjectures, as well as the declarations at that time, corresponded exactly with the disclosures of the Senator.

Sir, I have adverted to this extraordinary piece of history for two reasons: first, to show that, while I have been the steady friend of American industry, I am for no exclusive policy, no unjust or extravagant measures. It has, in truth, been urged against me that, in the votes which I have given here, I have been found in bad company, because I stood on the record with the anti-tariff interest. The same accusation has been made against me that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BROWS] now makes against the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] because he votes with us, and I suppose with about the same measure of justice.

Second. To prove to you that when political expediency calls for a victim, we are uniformly sacrificed. It was so in 1828, in 1832, and is so now; we are not regarded as belonging to the great American family, unless our interests spread beyond our territory; what is local, or nearly so, may be traded away as emergencies require.

The injustice of the bill of 1832 was not so glaringly manifest as that of 1828, but it was so strongly marked that I could not support it.

I hope this piece of history will be borne in mind, and be an admonition that contracts marked by injustice, and recommended only as political expedients, may fail of their purpose, and bring down the injury designed for others upon the authors of the injustice.

I will here dismiss this subject, and call the attention of the Senate to another matter, which it was my chief object to notice.

Much has been said in this debate of the compromise act, and its obligations. My course or remarks here can never be very important, and therefore may well be forgotten; and I certainly would not allude to them, if I had not been personally appealed to in more than one instance, and reminded that this side of the House had given no pledges that it would adhere to that act. This had been put forth almost in the language of taunt, as if we were not frank and manly.

Whoever has or will give himself the trouble to inquire, will find that my sentiments are not concealed. My vote upon that act is recorded, and my sentiments then delivered are in print among the debates of the day. I was among those who differed from the distinguished Senator of Kentucky; and while I have made no profession of a change of opinion, I have so far acquiesced in the provisions of the law as to yield to its provisions as the sense of the country. I am not aware of having given countenance, by acts or opinions, to any disposition to disturb it, nor have those who usually cooperated with me. We are not, therefore, chargeable with bad faith in any point of view. We yield our obedience to the work of others, leaving the measure to work out all the good it may. It has thus far produced tranquillity, and raised hopes of a steady course of legislation, which in itself is one of the great elements of prosperity.

We make no complaints—no movement for change—and give countenance to none. Why, then, are we called upon for pledges? Are not our acts satisfactory? Have we made any declarations in conflict with them? If so, let them be pointed out. But who is it that demands pledges? The Senator from Georgia [Mr. CURTIS] has repeatedly observed that he hears no pledges from this side of the House. The Senator from Virginia turns to me, and to the chair of my colleague, (for he was not in it,) and says he hears none. The Senator from Georgia is one of the committee who reported this bill, acknowledges the paternity, and gives it a warm and zealous support here. The Senator from Virginia told us, in his place, that it had his approbation and support. The chairman [Mr. WRIGHT] and another member [Mr. BENTON] have distinctly avowed that they wholly disregard the compromise. They tell us, also, what we should know without their declarations, that this bill does violate the compromise in the most explicit and unequivocal terms. Nothing can be plainer than the truth of this declaration, as I fully proved the other day.

How stands the matter, then? We observe the law—make no propositions to alter it—express no dissatisfaction—while those who ask for pledges have come to the deliberate determination to disregard and violate its provisions, and bring forward a bill for that avowed purpose, giving it a zealous support. What do these gentlemen want of pledges? Are they anxious to have us pledge ourselves to support a law which they wish to prostrate? Are they so absurd as to ask for pledges to a course the opposite of their own sentiments? Do they desire to array opposition to a bill they approve? Do they demand pledges of us to observe the compromise act, while they declare here, in the face of the country, that nobody is bound by it? If such be the object of demanding pledges, the gentlemen are singularly absurd and inconsistent with themselves. If they turn their reflections upon their own conduct and opinions, they cannot be insensible as to the position in which they place themselves. They voted for the bill—I against it; when I propose to violate it, let gentlemen make their arraignment. That will be seasonably enough. But, sir, I have another answer to this demand for pledges. I have no power or authority to pledge Massachusetts to any course of policy which is prospective. She does not send me here to make bargains to dispose of her great interests for a term of years. She holds herself at liberty to approve or disapprove of my acts, as she may deem them wise or unwise; and if I were to make pledges, she would hold herself in no respect bound by them. In addition to this, I knew her Legislature had this subject under consideration, and that the sentiments of that numerous body just elected from the people would probably be expunged. Under such circumstances, it would be singular assumption in me to attempt to speak for the State; and even if I had seen a propriety in sending in pledges under other circumstances, I should have felt myself restrained while the subject was agitated in the Legislature.

Since the adjournment of last evening, I have received an official copy of the doings of that body, in the form of a protest, which, at a proper time, I shall present to the Senate, and Massachusetts shall speak for herself.

My colleague can speak for himself in this matter. I have deemed it my duty to repel this demand of pledges, and to inform the Senate and the country of the circumstances which belong to it; and I entertain no doubt that we shall hear no more of the matter, for I have nothing to disguise, or conceal, or retract. There is no want of the most explicit frankness. If it be the pleasure of gentlemen to violate that act, let them not seek an apology in my opinions. They have taken their own course, independent of me. I am not answerable for this act, or the principles it involves. Its paternity is certain, and those who ask for pledges have made their minds up to carry it forward without regard to us. Their course is in no respect influenced by my conduct, and if I were now to give pledges of adhering to the compromise act, not one of them would change his course, or make his opinions dependent on mine. Let them not seek to find an apology for their course in my not giving in pledges. If they are willing to be governed by my opinion, let them say so; but no one places the matter on that ground; no one says he will stand by the pledges; but, on the contrary, all avow the purpose of sustaining the bill.

IN SENATE, MARCH 1.

RECOGNITION OF TEXAS.

The following resolution, moved by Mr. WALKER, coming up for consideration as the order of the day, viz:

“Resolved, That the State of Texas having established and maintained an independent Government, capable of performing those duties, foreign and domestic, which appertain to independent Governments, and it appearing that there is no longer any reasonable prospect of the successful prosecution of the war by Mexico against said State, it is expedient and proper, and in perfect conformity with the laws of nations, and the practice of this Government in like cases, that the independent political existence of said State be acknowledged by the Government of the United States.”—

Supplemental Speeches.—Recognition of Texas.

Mr. WALKER said that no one could be more conscious than he that it would be unpardonable to take up the time of the Senate unnecessarily, at such an hour of the session, and he should therefore be as brief as possible in the remarks with which he deemed it his duty to accompany the resolution he had had the honor to submit. He should confine himself strictly to those points which it was necessary to touch, without indulging in a train of remarks to which they would very naturally lead, and which at another time, and under different circumstances, might with propriety be made.

In the first place, he would call the attention of the Senate to the position in which Texas had been placed by the action of Congress at the last session. After considerable discussion at that time, the subject had been referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, who had reported to the Senate a resolution declaring that the independence of Texas ought to be recognised as soon as authentic information should have been received, by the Executive, that it was possessed of a civil Government, and was capable of assuming the responsibilities and discharging the duties of an independent Power. This resolution had been deliberately and with perfect unanimity agreed to by the Senate, the yeas being 39, and the nays none. The same resolution had been agreed to in the House of Representatives, by a vote of 128 to 20. It was, therefore, the opinion of this Government, at that time, that the independence of Texas ought to be acknowledged so soon as the information referred to should have been received. This (said Mr. W.) renders it unnecessary for me to go into the merits of the difficulty between Mexico and Texas; that resolution put the question on the proof of a fact. It is now, therefore, a mere question of fact; and as such I shall treat it.

Let me call the attention of the Senate to the origin of the existing state of things in that country. After the downfall of Iturbide, a republican constitution was put in operation in the Mexican confederacy, and Texas, as one of the members of that confederacy, was included under it. A colonization law was passed, which invited persons from all parts of the globe to come and partake of the privileges of citizenship in this new republic, especially the inhabitants of the United States. In the preamble to that law it was given as a reason for passing it, that it was very important to secure the frontiers of Mexico against the irruptions and ravages of the savage tribes in the vicinity. It was, therefore, for the advantage and benefit of Mexico herself that foreigners should enter the territory; and they did so, under the most solemn guarantees of civil and religious liberty. They went there in the faith of these assurances; they conquered the wilderness; and they expelled the Indians, and drove them to a great distance from their settlements. In process of time they became a State, and elected a Legislature. But what was then done by Mexico? By the audacity of a military dictator, the free constitution of that republic was subverted, and the Congress, who represented the people, and sat by their authority, was, by force of arms, turned out of doors. Another Legislature was set up in their place by the dictator, consisting of a single House, and prepared to comply with whatever might be his pleasure. The people of Texas resisted this usurpation; but they were not alone in withstanding it. The banner of freedom was raised at the same time by the people of Zacatecas, who inherited the same noble blood. They were, however, overthrown in the contest, and consequently removed to Texas. After the Congress had been forcibly turned out of doors, a proclamation was issued, ordering the disarming of the population, and requiring an unqualified submission, on their part, to a military despotism. They resisted the enforcement of this order—and never would I have uttered a word in favor of their recognition if they had not. Had they tamely submitted to such an act of oppression, they would have been unworthy of the name of Americans. Had they bowed their necks to the yoke, and submissively yielded up their limbs to the chain, I would never have voted to welcome them among the nations of the free. Suppose the President of these United States should enter the halls of Congress, seize our persons, and drive us from our seats, and occupy them with his creatures; suppose he should then send out a band of mercenaries into Maryland, Virginia, and Pennsylvania, should disarm our citizens, and demand of them, with threats, an unqualified submission to his absolute will; I ask whether there lives a man so object as not to resist? No. I know, all men know, that the people of those States would maintain their freedom, or perish in the struggle. The citizens of Texas have done just what would have been done, in the like case, by citizens of the United States. We did so in circumstances far less intolerable. The colonial oppression of the Government of Great Britain was mild, was paternal, in comparison with the despotism that was sought to be fixed on the necks of the citizens of Texas. Their resistance of it was justified by all laws, human and divine.

The next question is, whether, having resolved on independence, they have been able to maintain it.

What have we seen? We have seen two successive invasions of their territory, and both successfully resisted. The first was under General Cos; he was taken prisoner, and liberated on parole. Then came the enterprise of Santa Anna, who entered Texas at the head of eight hundred fine troops, the elite of the Mexican army. After the conquest of Goliad, and the sanguinary battle at the Alamo, he was overthrown by a handful of Texian troops under General Houston, and remained a captive in the hands of those whose friends and relatives he had treacherously and inhumanly murdered. This happened twelve months ago, and yet no hostile foot has trodden the Texian soil, nor has hostile fleet appeared upon its shores. Their army has complete possession of the seaports and of all the interior; nor has any attempt been made by the Mexican forces to rescue their favorite chief or to redeem their honor: Why? Has not sufficient time elapsed? How much longer must we wait? For twelve months more? Or till Mexico shall recognise their independence? Or do not justice and truth demand that we should, without further delay, admit the fact of their independence? What greater evidence of it do we ask? They possess the entire territory; the laws are regularly administered; the Congress which enacts them have met twice; and all things are as peaceful and orderly as within our own happy and favored republic. What, then, is the question of recognition? It is a question of fact. We must answer yes or no—either that Texas is independent, or that it is still a part of Mexico. Are Congress prepared to spread such an untruth upon their records? Would you now negotiate with Mexico on the ground that Texas constitutes a part of that country? Here let me call the attention of the Senate to one important fact, viz: that the present central Government of Mexico never has exercised any authority whatever in Texas. No, not for an hour. It is a despotism which she has resisted; she has never for a moment obeyed it. Why should we refuse to acknowledge what is true? We have been told by the President that another invasion is threatened by Mexico. True. But are we to be governed by threats? Are threats to constitute a reason why we may not recognise the independence of a revolted province which has maintained its freedom? If so, then we should never have recognised the independence of Mexico; for she has, so late as within three years past, been threatened by Spain. No; the question does not depend on threats, but on the actual state of things. If the vamping of Mexico is to settle this matter, I hope we shall first examine how far she is able to carry her threats into execution. To show her utter inability to do this, I will call the attention of the Senate to her divided condition, torn as she is by intestine broils and civil convulsions. So entirely has she been disabled by this her condition from carrying a war of conquest into a neighboring territory, that she is scarce able to maintain the authority of Government within her own limits. Her internal state exhibits one scene of unceasing civil convulsion. Insurrections rise, one after another, in a constant succession, till her streets run down with the blood of her citizens, Governors, members of Congress, and Presidents. But one of her Chief Magistrates has retired peaceably from the chair of state. Iturbide was Emperor; but what was his fate? His glory ended in banishment; which having broken, he was seized and publicly executed. Victoria was President; his career also ended in banishment. His successor was deposed by a military force, and Guerrero was placed in power. And how did he prosper? Being self-deposed, he was put to death. Then came Bustamante. And had he peace? No; he was deposed by Santa Anna. Santa Anna was put down by the federal party; but, afterwards triumphing over his enemies, he overturned the constitution, and established a military despotism. This was soon followed by a rebellion in Zacatecas, a revolution in Texas, and commotions in Tampico and both the Californias. And, after all this, we are told that Texas is threatened by the Mexican Government! It is the threat of a child against a giant. Mexico is not able to recover her dominion; if she had been, she would before now have attempted the liberation of her captured President. When the news of his capture was received, Mexico issued a proclamation, from the language of which a stranger would conclude that she had one hundred thousand troops at her disposal. But what has she done? She has raised a petty, contemptible, half-clad collection of vagabonds, under Bravo, and sent them to Saltillo. They were always on the point of dissolution. Two thousand out of the three thousand which set out reluctantly on the expedition have already gone; the rest are without money or clothing; and Bravo has resigned in disgust. If, then, the true question of the fact of Texian independence was suspended on the success of this invasion of Bravo's, is it not settled? Has not the threatened invasion failed? Where is the difference whether the expedition has been discomfited without the limits of the Texian territory or within them? What matters it whether the invading army has been defeated by capture, by victory, or by inability to march? Let every Senator lay his hand upon his heart and say whether he does in truth believe that Mexico is able successfully to invade the Texian republic. If not, will you hesitate in spreading the truth upon the records of the Senate?

But it has been intimated that we ought, in prudence, to wait till some foreign Power shall have gone before us, and shown us the way. It is a sufficient answer to refer the Senate to the words of their own resolution. What! shall an American Senate, shall an American Congress, wait and ask if any foreign Power has acknowledged the independence of the new State upon her border? It is a question of national sovereignty, and we cannot dodge it without national dishonor. Would England or France, in a like case, wait to ask us? Would they wait our movements? Would they not feel themselves disgraced by the mention of such a thing? What! leave the decision whether they shall or shall not recognise a rising State in Europe to the decisions of an American Congress? Can we, then, be so lost to honor as to pursue a course which they would despise? Do we want their authority, the shield of their precedence, before we dare to acknowledge the independence of a new State in our own America—upon this our own continent—a State upon our borders—a State filled with our own citizens? No. This is purely an American question. And shall we refer it to the potentates of Europe? I cannot but say that, as an American Senator, I feel myself somewhat degraded by the mere suggestion. Are we to ask of the Powers of Europe how we are to conduct our foreign relations? Why, any more than our domestic? Recognition is the mere admission of a fact, and one which we must decide upon our own judgment, and not that of any European monarch.

But we are told in the public prints that a vote has been taken in Texas on the question of annexing that State to these United States. I am not to be driven into that matter now. It is a totally distinct question. The two must not be mixed up; they are wholly separate. The one does not follow from the other; and you have no right to connect them together. They are not connected either in fact or in law. Shall this Senate adopt the principle, that though there may, in fact, be an independent Government in Texas, we must refuse to recognise it, because the people who conquered Texas are in fact Americans, the descendants of a glorious ancestry—our own children—who have carried our language, our laws, our free institutions, and our pure religion, into that fertile soil? Are we prepared to give this as a reason to the civilized world: that we cannot recognise them because they love their native soil, because they had left it and gone into another State, under a solemn guarantee that they should still live under a free Government? Because in this hope they have resisted oppression and expelled all invaders? Because, when they have established their independence, they are unambitious? Because they are ready to lay all their laurels at the feet of the mother republic? Is this the ground we are ready to take and to avow? Because they love their mother, shall we hate them? No. We must have better grounds than this to show. If they had sought to repose upon the mighty arm of England, and had offered her a treaty of free trade; if she had sought to become a Southern Canada, then I suppose we should hasten to acknowledge her; but because she has sought another connexion, because she is ambitious that the banner of this Union shall float over her, and seeks to have a share in the blessings of our laws and our institutions, shall we on this account refuse to do her justice? Yet I have heard no other ground taken, no better argument advanced.

Were it in order, I would refer to another resolution, adopted by a different body, and which leaves the question to the President of the United States. I ask the Senate, will they now avoid the question, and remain silent? I have the highest confidence in the President elect, as well as in him who still fills the presidential chair, and have no doubt that right will be done; but still it becomes us to express our opinion, as a branch of this Government. We might as well turn over to the President our domestic relations as to leave him the sole judge of all that belongs to our foreign. The resolutions passed by both Houses assume that Congress should take the responsibility of this matter upon itself. And shall we now skulk from it? shall we trust a question which belongs to us to the decision of the President? Does not the President himself say, in his message, that it is inexpedient that the Executive alone should act in a matter of this character? Does he not declare it to be the duty of Congress to judge of it? We have the facts of the case before us. [Here Mr. W. went into a recapitulation of the chief points he had made.] With all these things before us, we are called to vote down the resolution, and thereby to say that these are not facts. Can any gentleman consent to do so? Will any man lay his hand upon his heart and say that Mexico still retains and exercises sovereign power over the province of Texas? I cannot bring myself to believe that such will be the decision of the Senate. No; with all those feelings which are natural to honorable men, to American freemen, I trust we shall come up to the mark, and declare what we know to be the fact, that Texas is an independent and sovereign State.

IN SENATE, FEBRUARY 23.

REDUCTION OF THE TARIFF.

Mr. BENTON made a low reply to Mr. DAVIS, in which he was in part understood to say that the bounties on the fisheries were a reimbursement of so much money as was paid by the fishermen as a duty on salt. Mr. B. had information on this subject as well as the Senator from Massachusetts; and no American citizen, at all acquainted with the affairs of the country and the history of France and England, was ignorant of the value of the fisheries. Yet, Mr. B. had authority in his hands to say that, from the foundation of the Government, the encouragement here to the fisheries was smaller than in Great Britain. At an early stage of the Government here reports were made in Congress for and against the bounty on the fisheries, and the allowance was revoked by Government. At that time the first allowance was made on fish cured and exported; and in the very same clause of the same act the same bounty was granted on exported beef and pork, all resting on the same principle of refunding the duty on the salt used in curing these three articles. In 1789, when the duty on salt was six cents, and afterwards when it was increased to twelve and a half, the drawbacks on salt were increased in the same proportion. Laws to the same effect were afterwards passed, so that fish, beef, and pork, kept company in this respect, till, on the breaking out of the war, the salt tax was retained as a war tax, the fish bounty was continued, while the drawbacks on beef and pork were discontinued. For this gentlemen give a satisfactory reason: that it was not possible to export beef and pork during the war. But, when the war was ended, and the compromise to take the tax off salt was disregarded on account of the public debt, the fish bounty was still continued, while beef and pork were dropped. The classes were separated, and they made fish of one and flesh of the other. The fisheries draw about $250,000 per annum from the public Treasury, while the constitution requires that taxes should be laid equally; and what is got by taxes on one part of the Union is thus bestowed on another. But let it be; Mr. B. would not oppose it. Still, he would appeal to the friends of the fisheries to say whether this was not an immense money-making business. They ought at least to relieve the West of the burden; and while they got a bounty of $250,000, they ought to allow the salt tax to be taken off. Mr. B. here read an extract from a former speech of his, against the fish bounty. These remarks, he said, were made for the purpose of showing the Senator from Massachusetts that the salt duties rest on one leg only. The fisheries draw back their share of the tax, but the West did not. Mr. B. also alluded to extensive frauds on these drawbacks, said to be discovered by Mr. Ingham.

Mr. DAVIS said he knew the subject of the fish bounty would interweave with the duty on salt. Mr. Ingham, he said, was hostile to the bounty on the fisheries, and he therefore found it very easy to make out supposed frauds, which might be correct or incorrect. But Mr. D. wished that frauds might not be stamped on the fisheries without the proper and adequate proof. He thought the Senator from Missouri had made his remarks because he foresaw that the fish bounty would interweave with the salt tax; but, when the proper opportunity should come, Mr. D. would show that the fisheries stand upon two legs.

IN SENATE, FEBRUARY 24.

REDUCTION OF THE TARIFF.

Mr. PRESTON observed that what he had meant to say when last up was, that the tariff question, so far as party was concerned, was an open question, on which each individual might hold and advocate his own opinion, without derogation to his standing with his own party; and that, therefore, assurances as to the sentiments of the President elect ought not to have that weight with the Senate to which they would otherwise be entitled. He had said that the Senator from Pennsylvania was a high tariff man, and his State a high tariff State. In making this remark in regard to the honorable gentleman, Mr. P. had had reference to his course in former years. The grounds on which that gentleman had advocated the retaining of the duty on coal were distinctly tariff grounds; and when a man advanced arguments of this description, for a protection duty on such an article as coal, Mr. P. was in the habit of calling him a tariff man. He would not, however, call the Senator from Pennsylvania a tariff man, if that gentleman was indisposed to be so denominated. Mr. P. should certainly consider him as a very great and valuable acquisition to the anti-tariff cause.

Mr. BUCHANAN observed, in reply, that the Senator from South Carolina was at full liberty to call him a tariff man; for such he proposed to be. As to the present duty on coal, it was not extravagant, amounting, as it did, to less than five cents a bushel, or one dollar per ton. Mr. B. had said, and he still maintained, that, on all the principles of the protection policy, foreign coal should pay a duty for the protection of the home article. The gentleman from South Carolina himself was in favor of the compromise bill, and would vote for this duty though he spoke against it. Mr. B. contended that the repeal of this duty would violate the compromise, while it would go to destroy a branch of business in which there had been invested, within the State of Pennsylvania alone, a capital of more than forty millions of dollars. Yet the gentleman from South Carolina employed the weight of his powerful name for persuading others to vote for this measure, and thus to violate the compromise of 1833; while, at the same time, he professed, for himself and his State, and the whole South, to be bound to observe it. The country was now resting on that compromise; and the "high tariff State," to which the gentleman alluded, had never uttered a murmur against it. Mr. B. had trusted that her reputation might have escaped such commentaries. Pennsylvania loved to do to others as she would have others to do to her. Mr. B. put it to the gentleman, whether, had he risen in his place, and solemnly declared that that gentleman was "permitted" to argue against the compromise while he voted in its favor, whether the honorable Senator would have considered him quite as courteous as he ought to be. Would not such a remark have implied that the gentleman was under an irresistible authority, which governed and controlled all his public actions; but that, on this particular point, that authority had relaxed the leading strings, and allowed him to play the freeman?

Mr. PRESTON regretted that the honorable Senator did not still appear quite to comprehend what had been the scope and meaning of his remarks. The word "permit" had been used by him in its technical meaning, as applied exclusively to party politics. It had been contended, that to support the present administration would be the means to secure the ascendancy of the anti-tariff policy. This position Mr. P. did not admit; and, to prove that it was unsound, had adverted to the fact that the tariff was an open question with the party, on which members of the party might differ and oppose each other, without forfeiting or disturbing their party relations; just as in England the Catholic question was held to be an open question, on which members of the same political party advocated opposite opinions. There were every day political questions on which gentlemen must vote in one particular way, or not be recognised as members of the same party; while there were other questions on which they were free to vote differently, and still be held as good members of their own party. The party arrangements "permitted" them so to vote. It was in this parliamentary and technical sense alone that Mr. P. had made use of the word. As to the compromise of 1833, the end and purpose of it was a reduction of duties. For this the whole South went as one man. The only question was whether, according to that act, the reduction went on fast enough. The act proposed to continue all duties above twenty per cent. until the year 1842; after which time there was to be a rapid deduction. As there seemed to be an acquiescence, on the part of the South, in this arrangement, Mr. P. supposed that he was not at liberty to depart from it. He had come to the conclusion that the faith of the South was pledged. They had shaken hands with their Northern brethren over this bargain; and he was not for going to war against it. Mr. P. preferred the mode of reduction provided by the act of 1833 to the mode proposed by the bill now before the Senate. He was in favor of all reduction; but he preferred the compromise, because he believed that it would reduce the tariff more certainly. Holding himself bound to adhere to that arrangement, he could not, of course, vote for the present amendment, which would otherwise receive his decided support. The Senator from Pennsylvania had said that the present duty on foreign coal was not enormous. The duty amounted to between forty-five and fifty per cent.; and it struck Mr. P. that this was enormous.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 24.

DISTRIBUTION QUESTION.

[The beginning of this speech is inserted on pages 1926 and 1927; the concluding part having been accidentally omitted, the speech is given in full here.]

Mr. BELL said he rose for the purpose of calling the attention of members to a few facts connected with the subject under consideration, and with the subject of the Treasury, and the expenditures of the Government generally, which he thought were either unknown to many honorable members, or, if known, had not received that attention which, from their extraordinary nature, they were entitled to receive from the representatives of the people and the guardians of the public interest.

The fact that the permanent expenditures of the Government had been doubled in amount within a few years past had been noticed heretofore. I wish (said Mr. B.) to bring to the notice of honorable gentlemen another most improper and unprecedented anomaly in the action of Congress upon the subject of the appropriation and expenditure of the public moneys. The Committee of Ways and Means have given their sanction to appropriations for the service of the present year, amounting to upwards of thirty millions, if I have not made some mistake in the estimate of this amount. Besides these, there are other bills, reported by the standing committees of the House, which will swell them to about thirty-five millions—an amount but little short of the appropriations to the same objects made at the last session of Congress. Do the members of this House know what proportion of the appropriations of the last year remains unexpended? The honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has told us that the present bill appropriates about nine hundred thousand dollars to fortifications; and that he contends ought to be noted, because it does not exceed the usual amount annually appropriated to the same objects. Sir, it is true that this does not exceed the amount usually appropriated; but the honorable gentleman has omitted to inform us that there was, on the 1st of January, a balance of upwards of six hundred thousand dollars remaining in the Treasury of the appropriations of the last year to the same objects, besides between two and three hundred thousand in the hands of the disbursing officers yet unexpended. He has neglected to inform us that, in fact, about nine hundred thousand dollars of the last year's appropriations to fortifications remain to be expended during the present year; for I take it for granted that the work upon the fortifications has not been persisted in to any great extent during the winter. Thus, sir, instead of the amount proposed to be applied to this branch of the public service, during the present year, we propose to apply double that amount. Is there any thing in the present high prices of labor and materials, any thing in the great demand for laborers of all kinds, or is there any thing in the present prospect of peace with all nations, which calls for this unusual amount to be applied to fortifications? Are we not pushing these works too rapidly to admit of solid constructions? But, sir, (said Mr. B.,) I do not attach much importance to this view of the subject. Not only double, but treble and quadruple the amount of these appropriations can be expended by the Government, if it is found necessary in order to increase appropriations—if we shall, by our imprudent compliance with the demand of the Executive, encourage a race between appropriations and disbursements—if the appropriations are to be increased according to the ability of the Government to expend, or rather waste, as much as this House shall, from year to year, be found willing to appropriate. I repeat, if this shall be the measure of our appropriations, we need not care how large they are, they will all be expended.

But it is a practice exactly the opposite of this which I wish to bring to the notice of the members of this House. It appears, from the executive reports which have been laid on our tables, that there were in the Treasury unexpended balances of the appropriations of the year 1836, on the first day of the present year, of nearly $14,000,000, besides the large amount drawn from the Treasury in advance of the actual demands of the public service, and now in the hands of the disbursing officers. The official organ of the Government (the Globe) has informed us that the amount thus withdrawn from the Treasury by requisitions, and remaining in the hands of the disbursing agents in the beginning of the year, is six millions. I have but little doubt, if the whole truth were known, that the amount thus withdrawn from the Treasury at the close of the year was nearer twelve millions; but, taking the statement of the Globe to be true, it shows, on the first day of the year, there were $20,000,000 remaining unexpended of the appropriations of the year 1836. It is thus manifest that we are a year in advance of the actual demands of the public service in our appropriations. I call upon the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] who is at the head of the Committee of Ways and Means, to explain and justify this extraordinary practice. How is it that we are called upon to make increased appropriations for the present year, when twenty millions or upwards remain unexpended of the last year's appropriations? This state of things certainly demands an explanation. The average balances in the Treasury, until within the last two years, have never exceeded five millions; I believe I might say four. Whence is it that we have this sum quadrupled? Let it not be said that the appropriations for the last year were not made until half the year had elapsed; and that that is a sufficient explanation. The amount in the Treasury unexpended on the first day of the year 1836 was, if I do not forget, more than double the usual average; and when we were voting the appropriations of the last year, the House was repeatedly reminded that the year was so far advanced that it was not possible to expend the large sums which were demanded by the Government; yet, sir, they were voted. The true explanation is, that we then had a large surplus in the Treasury. We anticipated a still greater one, and the majority of Congress were determined to keep pace with the increased revenue by increased appropriations. If the surplus could not thus be actually exhausted, it was intended that it should be so apparently. The same policy directs the same course at the present session. Whether the land bill shall pass or not, it is now certain that we shall have a considerable surplus in the Treasury at the end of the year. Under any probable contingency, it cannot be less than ten millions; it will probably be much larger. To diminish the amount of surplus at the beginning of the present year, the device of withdrawing large amounts from the Treasury, and placing them in the hands of disbursing agents, was fallen upon. This practice, however unsafe, will be continued; and, instead of six millions at the end of the present year, we may have twenty millions so disposed of, if there shall be no interest created to counteract it. Again, sir: some remedy is imperiously demanded, by the most sacred and vital considerations, against the perpetual temptation which, under the present state of things, is held out to increased, unnecessary, and prodigal expenditures by the Federal Government. I can think of none better at present than the one which I now propose, and will send to the Chair. I do not intend to enter into an elaborate argument upon the proposition I shall submit. It is too late in the session for such a course. Besides, I consider the argument is already before the House and country, and I entreat gentlemen who are favorable to the measure to forbear discussion.

Mr. B. concluded by moving to amend the bill by adding thereto the following:

Be it enacted, That the money which shall be in the Treasury of the United States on the 1st day of January, 1838, reserving a sum of five millions of dollars, shall be deposited with the several States, on the terms of the 13th, 14th, and 15th provisoes of the act regulating the deposits of the public money, approved the 23d of June, 1836.

APPENDIX

TO THE REGISTER OF DEBATES IN CONGRESS.

TWENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS—SECOND SESSION.

MESSAGE

OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, TO BOTH HOUSES OF CONGRESS,

At the commencement of the Second Session of the Twenty-fourth Congress.

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives:

Addressing to you the last annual message I shall ever present to the Congress of the United States, it is a source of the most heartfelt satisfaction to be able to congratulate you on the high state of prosperity which our beloved country has attained. With no causes at home or abroad to lessen the confidence with which we look to the future for continuing proofs of the capacity of our free institutions to produce all the fruits of good government, the general condition of our affairs may well excite our national pride.

I cannot avoid congratulating you, and my country particularly, on the success of the efforts made during my administration by the Executive and Legislature, in conformity with the sincere, constant, and earnest desire of the people, to maintain peace, and establish cordial relations with all foreign Powers. Our gratitude is due to the Supreme Ruler of the Universe, and I invite you to unite with me in offering to him fervent supplication, that his providential care may ever be extended to those who follow us, enabling them to avoid the dangers and the horrors of war, consistently with a just and indispensable regard to the rights and honor of our country. But, although the present state of our foreign affairs, standing without important change as they did when you separated in July last, is flattering in the extreme, I regret to say that many questions of an interesting character, at issue with other Powers, are yet unadjusted. Amongst the most prominent of these is that of our northeastern boundary. With an undiminished confidence in the sincere desire of his Britannic Majesty's Government to adjust that question, I am not yet in possession of the precise grounds upon which it proposes a satisfactory adjustment.

With France, our diplomatic relations have been resumed, and under circumstances which attest the disposition of both Governments to preserve a mutually beneficial intercourse, and foster those amicable feelings which are so strongly required by the true interest of the two countries. With Russia, Austria, Prussia, Naples, Sweden, and Denmark, the best understanding exists, and our commercial intercourse is gradually expanding itself with them. It is encouraged in all these countries, except Naples, by their mutually advantageous and liberal treaty stipulations with us.

The claims of our citizens on Portugal are admitted to be just, but provision for the payment of them has been unfortunately delayed by frequent political changes in that kingdom.

The blessings of peace have not been secured by Spain. Our connexions with that country are on the best footing, with the exception of the burdens still imposed upon our commerce with her possessions out of Europe.

The claims of American citizens for losses sustained at the bombardment of Antwerp, have been presented to the Governments of Holland and Belgium, and will be pressed, in due season, to settlement.

With Brazil, and all our neighbors of this continent, we continue to maintain relations of amity and concord, extending our commerce with them as far as the resources of the people and the policy of their Governments will permit. The just and long-standing claims of our citizens upon some of them are yet sources of dissatisfaction and complaint. No danger is apprehended, however, that they will not be peacefully, although tardily, acknowledged and paid by all, unless the irritating effect of her struggle with Texas should unfortunately make our immediate neighbor, Mexico, an exception.

It is already known to you, by the correspondence between the two Governments communicated at your last session, that our conduct in relation to that struggle is regulated by the same principles that governed us in the dispute between Spain and Mexico herself; and I trust that it will be found, on the most severe scrutiny, that our act have strictly corresponded with our professions. That the inhabitants of the United States should feel strong prepossessions for the one party, is not surprising. But this circumstance should, of itself, teach us great caution, lest it lead us into the great error of suffering public policy to be regulated by partiality or prejudice; and there are considerations connected with the possible result of this contest between the two parties of so much delicacy and importance to the United States, that our character requires that we should neither anticipate events, nor attempt to control them. The known desire of the Texans to become a part of our system, although its gratification depends upon the reconciliation of various and conflicting interests, necessarily a work of time, and uncertain in itself, is calculated to expose our conduct to misconstruction in the eyes of the world. There are already those who, indifferent to principle themselves, and prone to suspect the want of it in others, charge us with ambitious designs and insidious policy. You will perceive by the accompanying documents, that the extraordinary mission from Mexico has been terminated, on the sole grounds that the obligations of this Government to itself and to Mexico, under treaty stipulations, have compelled me to trust a discretionary authority to a high officer of our army, to advance into territory claimed as part of Texas, if necessary, to protect our own or the neighboring frontier from Indian depredation. In the opinion of the Mexican functionary, who has just left us, the honor of his country will be wounded by American soldiers entering, with the most amicable avowed purposes, upon ground from which the followers of his Government have been expelled, and over which there is at present no certainty of a serious effort on its part being made to re-establish its dominion. The departure of this minister was the more singular, as he was apprized that the sufficiency of the causes assigned for the advance of our troops by the commanding general had been seriously doubted by me, and that there was every reason to suppose that the troops of the United States, their commander having had time to ascertain the truth or falsehood of the information upon which they had been marched to Nacogdoches, would be either there in perfect accordance with the principles admitted to be just in his conference with the Secretary of State, by the Mexican minister himself, or were already withdrawn in consequence of the impressive warnings their commanding officer had received from the Department of War. It is hoped and believed that his Government will take a more dispassionate and just view of this subject, and not be disposed to construe a measure of justifiable precaution, made necessary by its known inability in execution of the stipulations of our treaty to act upon the frontier, into an encroachment upon its rights or stain upon its honor.

24th Cong. 2d Sess.]

In the mean time, the ancient complaints of injustice, made on behalf of our citizens are disregarded, and new causes of dissatisfaction have arisen, some of them of a character requiring prompt remonstrance, and ample and immediate redress. I trust, however, by tempering firmness with courtesy, and acting with great forbearance upon every incident that has occurred, or that may happen, to do and to obtain justice, and thus avoid the necessity of again bringing this subject to the view of Congress.

It is my duty to remind you that no provision has been made to execute our treaty with Mexico for tracing the boundary line between the two countries. Whatever may be the prospect of Mexico's soon being able to execute the treaty on its part, it is proper that we should be, in anticipation, prepared at all times to perform our obligations, without regard to the probable condition of those with whom we have contracted them.

The result of the confidential inquiries made into the condition and prospects of the newly declared Texan Government, will be communicated to you in the course of the session.

Commercial treaties, promising great advantages to our enterprising merchants and navigators, have been formed with the distant Governments of Muscat and Siam. The ratifications have been exchanged, but have not reached the Department of State. Copies of the treaties will be transmitted to you, if received before, or published, if arriving after, the close of the present session of Congress.

Nothing has occurred to interrupt the good understanding that has long existed with the Barbary Powers, nor to check the good will which is gradually growing up in our intercourse with the dominions of the Government of the distinguished chief of the Ottoman Empire.

Information has been received at the Department of State, that a treaty with the Emperor of Morocco has just been negotiated, which, I hope, will be received in time to be laid before the Senate previous to the close of the session.

You will perceive, from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, that the financial means of the country continue to keep pace with its improvement in all other respects. The receipts into the Treasury during the present year will amount to about $47,691,898; those from customs being estimated at $22,523,151; those from lands at about $24,000,000; and the residue from miscellaneous sources. The expenditures for all objects during the year are estimated not to exceed $32,000,000, which will leave a balance in the Treasury for public purposes, on the 1st day of January next, of about $41,723,959. This sum, with the exception of five millions, will be transferred to the several States, in accordance with the provisions of the act regulating the deposits of the public money.

The unexpended balances of appropriation on the 1st day of January next, are estimated at $14,636,062, exceeding by $9,636,062 the amount which will be left in the deposit banks, subject to the draft of the Treasurer of the United States, after the contemplated transfers to the several States are made. If, therefore, the future receipts should not be sufficient to meet these outstanding and future appropriations, there may be soon a necessity to use a portion of the funds deposited with the States.

The consequences apprehended when the deposit act of the last session received a reluctant approval, have been measurably realized. Though an act merely for the deposit of the surplus moneys of the United States in the State treasuries for safe-keeping, until they may be wanted for the service of the General Government, it has been extensively spoken of as an act to give the money to the several States, and they have been advised to use it as a gift, without regard to the means of refunding it when called for. Such a suggestion has doubtless been made without a due consideration of the obligation of the deposit act, and without a proper attention to the various principles and interests which are affected by it. It is manifest that the law itself cannot sanction such a suggestion, and that, as it now stands, the States have no more authority to receive and use these deposits, without intending to return them, than any deposit bank, or any individual temporarily charged with the safe-keeping or application of the public money would now have for converting the same to their private use, without the consent and against the will of the Government. But independently of the violation of public faith and moral obligation which are involved in this suggestion, when examined in reference to the terms of the present deposit act, it is believed that the considerations which should govern the future legislation of Congress on this subject will be equally conclusive against the adoption of any measure recognising the principles on which the suggestion has been made.

Considering the intimate connexion of the subject with the financial interests of the country, and its great importance in whatever aspect it can be viewed, I have bestowed upon it the most anxious reflection, and feel it to be my duty to state to Congress such thoughts as have occurred to me, to aid their deliberation in treating it in the manner best calculated to conduce to the common good.

The experience of other nations admonished us to hasten the extinguishment of the public debt; but it will be in vain that we have congratulated each other upon the disappearance of this evil, if we do not guard against the equally great one of promoting the unnecessary accumulation of public revenue. No political maxim is better established than that which tells us that an improvident expenditure of money is the parent of profligacy, and that no people can hope to perpetuate their liberties, who long acquiesce in a policy which taxes them for objects not necessary to the legitimate and real wants of their Government. Flattering as is the condition of our country at the present period, because of its unexampled advance in all the steps of social and political improvement, it cannot be disguised that there is a lurking danger already apparent in the neglect of this warning truth, and that the time has arrived when the representatives of the people should be employed in devising some more appropriate remedy than now exists, to avert it.

Under our present revenue system, there is every probability that there will continue to be a surplus beyond the wants of the Government; and it has become our duty to decide whether such a result be consistent with the true objects of our Government.

Should a surplus be permitted to accumulate beyond the appropriations, it must be retained in the Treasury as it now is, or distributed among the people of the States.

To retain it in the Treasury, unemployed in any way, is impracticable. It is, besides, against the genius of our free institutions to lock up in vaults the treasure of the nation. To take from the people the right of bearing arms, and put their weapons of defence in the hands of a standing army, would be scarcely more dangerous to their liberties, than to permit the Government to accumulate immense amounts of treasure beyond the supplies necessary to its legitimate wants. Such a treasure would doubtless be employed at some time, as it has been in other countries, when opportunity tempted ambition.

To collect it merely for distribution to the States, would seem to be highly impolitic, if not as dangerous as the proposition to retain it in the Treasury. The shortest reflection must satisfy every one that, to require the people to pay taxes to the Government merely that they may be paid back again, is sporting with the substantial interests of the country, and no system which produces such a result can be expected to receive the public countenance. Nothing could be gained by it, even if each individual who contributed a portion of the tax could receive back promptly the same portion. But, it is apparent, that no system of the kind can ever be enforced, which will not absorb a considerable portion of the money to be distributed in salaries and commissions to the agents employed in the process, and in the various losses and depreciations which arise from other causes; and the practical effect of such an attempt must ever be to burden the people with taxes, not for purposes beneficial to them, but to swell the profits of deposit banks, and support a band of useless public officers.

A distribution to the people is impracticable and unjust in other respects. It would be taking one man's property, and giving it to another. Such would be the unavoidable result of a rule of equality, (and none other is spoken of, or would be likely to be adopted,) inasmuch as there is no mode by which the amount of the individual contributions of our citizens to the public revenue can be ascertained. We know that they contribute unequally; and a rule, therefore, that would distribute to them equally, would be liable to all the objections which apply to the principle of an equal division of property. To make the General Government the instrument of carrying this odious principle into effect, would be at once to destroy the means of its usefulness and change the character designed for it by the framers of the constitution.

But the more extended and injurious consequences likely to result from a policy which would collect a surplus revenue for the purpose of distributing it, may be forcibly illustrated by an examination of the effects already produced by the present deposit act. This act, although certainly designed to secure the safe-keeping of the public revenue, is not entirely free in its tendencies from any of the objections which apply to this principle of distribution. The Government had, without necessity, received from the people a large surplus, which, instead of being employed as heretofore, and returned to them by means of the public expenditure, was deposited with sundry banks. The banks proceeded to make loans upon this surplus, and thus converted it into banking capital; and in this manner it has tended to multiply bank charters, and has had a great agency in producing a spirit of wild speculation. The possession and use of the property out of which this surplus was created belonged to the people; but the Government has transferred its possession to incorporated banks, whose interest and effort it is to make large profits out of its use. This process need only be stated to show its injustice and bad policy.

And the same observations apply to the influence which is produced by the steps necessary to collect as well as to distribute such a revenue. About three-fifths of all the duties on imports are paid in the city of New York; but it is obvious that the means to pay those duties are drawn from every quarter of the Union. Every citizen in every State, who purchases and consumes an article which has paid a duty at that port, contributes to the accumulating mass. The surplus collected there, must, therefore, be made up of moneys or property withdrawn from other points and other States. Thus the wealth and business of every region from which these surplus funds proceed, must be to some extent injured, while that of the place where the funds are concentrated and are employed in banking are proportionably extended. But both in making the transfer of the funds which are first necessary to pay the duties and collect the surplus, and in making the re-transfer which becomes necessary when the time arrives for the distribution of that surplus, there is a considerable period when the funds cannot be brought into use; and it is manifest that, besides the loss inevitable from such an operation, its tendency is to produce fluctuations in the business of the country, which are always productive of speculation, and detrimental to the interests of regular trade. Argument can scarcely be necessary to show that a measure of this character ought not to receive further legislative encouragement.

By examining the practical operation of the ratio for distribution adopted in the deposit bill of the last session, we shall discover other features that appear equally objectionable. Let it be assumed, for the sake of argument, that the surplus moneys to be deposited with the States have been collected and belong to them in the ratio of their federal representative population—an assumption founded upon the fact that any deficiencies in our future revenue from imposts and public lands must be made up by direct taxes collected from the States in that ratio. It is proposed to distribute the surplus, say $30,000,000, not according to the ratio in which it has been collected and belongs to the people of the States, but in that of their votes in the colleges of electors of President and Vice President. The effect of a distribution of that ratio is shown by the annexed table, marked A.

By an examination of that table, it will be perceived that in the distribution of the surplus of $30,000,000 upon that basis, there is a great departure from the principle which regards representation as the true measure of taxation; and it will be found that the tendency of that departure will be to increase whatever inequalities have been supposed to attend the operation of our federal system in respect to its bearings upon the different interests of the Union. In making the basis of representation the basis of taxation, the framers of the constitution intended to equalize the burdens which are necessary to support the Government; and the adoption of that ratio, while it accomplished this object, was also the means of adjusting other great topics arising out of the conflicting views respecting the political equality of the various members of the confederacy. Whatever, therefore, disturbs the liberal spirit of the compromises which established a rule of taxation so just and equitable, and which experience has proved to be so well adapted to the genius and habits of our people, should be received with the greatest caution and distrust.

A bare inspection, in the annexed table, of the differences produced by the ratio used in the deposit act compared with the results of a distribution according to the ratio of direct taxation, must satisfy every unprejudiced mind that the former ratio contravenes the spirit of the constitution, and produces a degree of injustice in the operation of the Federal Government which would be fatal to the hope of perpetuating it. By the ratio of direct taxation, for example, the State of Delaware, in the collection of $30,000,000 of revenue, would pay into the treasury $188,716; and in a distribution of $30,000,000 she would receive back from the Government, according to the ratio of the deposit bill, the sum of $306,122; and similar results would follow the comparison between the small and the large States throughout the Union; thus realizing to the small States an advantage which would be doubtless as unacceptable to them as a motive for incorporating the principle in any system which would produce it, as it would be inconsistent with the rights and expectations of the large States. It was certainly the intention of that provision of the constitution which declares that "all duties, imposts, and excises" shall "be uniform throughout the United States," to make the burdens of taxation fall equally upon the people, in whatever State of the Union they may reside.—But what would be the value of such a uniform rule, if the moneys raised by it could be immediately returned by a different one, which will give to the people of some States much more, and to those of others much less, than their fair proportions? Were the Federal Government to exempt, in express terms, the imports, products, and manufactures of some portions of the country from all duties, while it imposed heavy ones on others, the injustice could not be greater. It would be easy to show how, by the operation of such a principle, the large States of the Union would not only have to contribute their just share towards the support of the Federal Government, but also have to bear in some degree the taxes necessary to support the Governments of their smaller sisters; but it is deemed unnecessary to state the details where the general principle is so obvious.

A system liable to such objections can never be supposed to have been sanctioned by the framers of the constitution, when they conferred on Congress the taxing power; and I feel persuaded that a mature examination of the subject will satisfy every one that there are insurmountable difficulties in the operation of any plan which can be devised, of collecting the revenue, for the purpose of distributing it. Congress is only authorized to levy taxes "to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." There is no such provision as would authorize Congress to collect together the property of the country, under the name of revenue, for the purpose of dividing it equally or unequally among the States or the People. Indeed, it is not probable that such an idea ever occurred to the States when they adopted the constitution. But, however this may be, the only safe rule for us, in interpreting the powers granted to the Federal Government, is to regard the absence of express authority to touch a subject so important and delicate as this, as equivalent to a prohibition.

Even if our powers were less doubtful in this respect, as the constitution now stands, there are considerations afforded, by recent experience, which would seem to make it our duty to avoid a resort to such a system.

All will admit that the simplicity and economy of the State Governments mainly depend on the fact that money has to be supplied to support them by the same men or their agents who vote it away in appropriations. Hence, when there are extravagant and wasteful appropriations, there must be a corresponding increase of taxes; and the people, becoming awakened, will necessarily scrutinize the character of measures which thus increase their burdens. By the watchful eye of self-interest, the agents of the people in the State Governments are repressed, and kept within the limit of a just economy. But if the necessity of levying the taxes be taken from those who make the appropriations, and thrown upon a more distant and less responsible set of public agents, who have power to approach the people by an indirect and stealthy taxation, there is reason to fear that prodigality will soon supersede those characteristics which have thus far made its look with so much pride and confidence to the State Governments as the mainstay of our union and liberties. The State Legislatures, instead of studying to restrict their State expenditures to the smallest possible sum, will claim credit for their profusion, and harass the General Government for increased supplies. Practically, there would soon be but one taxing power, and that vested in a body of men far removed from the people, in which the farming and mechanic interests would scarcely be represented. The States would gradually lose their purity as well as their independence; they would not dare to murmur at the proceedings of the General Government, lest they should lose their supplies; all would be merged in a practical consolidation, cemented by wide-spread corruption, which could only be eradicated by one of those bloody revolutions which occasionally overthrow the despotic systems of the old world.

In all the other aspects in which I have been able to look at the effect of such a principle of distribution upon the best interests of the country, I can see nothing to compensate for the disadvantages to which I have adverted. If we consider the protective duties, which are, in a great degree, the source of the surplus revenue, beneficial to one section of the Union and prejudicial to another, there is no corrective for the evil in such a plan of distribution. On the contrary, there is reason to fear that all the complaints which have sprung from this cause would be aggravated. Every one must be sensible that a distribution of the surplus must beget a disposition to cherish the means which create it; and any system, therefore, into which it enters, must have a powerful tendency to increase rather than diminish the tariff. If it were even admitted that the advantages of such a system could be made equal to all the sections of the Union, the reasons already so urgently calling for a reduction of the revenue would, nevertheless, lose none of their force; for it will always be improbable that an intelligent and virtuous community can consent to raise a surplus for the mere purpose of dividing it, diminished as it must inevitably be by the expenses of the various machinery necessary to the process.

The safest and simplest mode of obviating all the difficulties which have been mentioned is, to collect only revenue enough to meet the wants of the Government, and let the people keep the balance of their property in their own hands, to be used for their own profit. Each State will then support its own Government, and contribute its due share towards the support of the General Government. There would be no surplus to cramp and lessen the resources of individual wealth and enterprise, and the banks would be left to their ordinary means. Whatever agitations and fluctuations might arise from our unfortunate paper system, they could never be attributed, justly or unjustly, to the action of the Federal Government. There would be some guaranty that the spirit of wild speculation, which seeks to convert the surplus revenue into banking capital, would be effectually checked, and that the scenes of demoralization which are now so prevalent through the land would disappear.

Without desiring to conceal that the experience and observation of the last two years have operated a partial change in my views upon this interesting subject, it is, nevertheless, regretted that the suggestions made by me, in my annual messages of 1829 and 1830, have been greatly misunderstood. At that time, the great struggle was begun against that latitudinarian construction of the constitution which authorizes the unlimited appropriation of the revenues of the Union to internal improvements within the States, tending to invest in the hands, and place under the control, of the General Government, all the principal roads and canals of the country, in violation of State rights, and in derogation of State authority. At the same time, the condition of the manufacturing interest was such as to create an apprehension that the duties on imports could not, without extensive mischief, be reduced in season to prevent the accumulation of a considerable surplus after the payment of the national debt. In view of the dangers of such a surplus, and in preference to its application to internal improvements, in derogation of the rights and powers of the States, the suggestion of an amendment of the constitution to authorize its distribution was made. It was an alternative for what were deemed greater evils—a temporary resort to relieve an over-burdened Treasury, until the Government could, without a sudden and destructive revulsion in the business of the country, gradually return to the just principle of raising no more revenue from the people, in taxes, than is necessary for its economical support. Even that alternative was not spoken of but in connexion with an amendment of the constitution. No temporary inconvenience can justify the exercise of a prohibited power, or a power not granted by that instrument; and it was from a conviction that the power to distribute even a temporary surplus of revenue is of that character, that it was suggested only in connexion with an appeal to the source of all legal power in the General Government, the States which have established it. No such appeal has been taken, and, in my opinion, a distribution of the surplus revenue by Congress, either to the States or the people, is to be considered as among the prohibitions of the constitution. As already intimated, my views have undergone a change, so far as to be convinced that no alteration of the constitution, in this respect, is wise or expedient. The influence of an accumulating surplus upon the legislation of the General Government and the States, its effect upon the credit system of the country, producing dangerous extensions and ruinous contractions, fluctuations in the price of property, rash speculation, idleness, extravagance, and a deterioration of morals, have taught us the important lesson, that any transient mischief which may attend the reduction of our revenue to the wants of our Government is to be borne in preference to an overflowing Treasury.

I beg leave to call your attention to another subject intimately associated with the preceding one—the currency of the country.

It is apparent, from the whole context of the constitution, as well as the history of the times which gave birth to it, that it was the purpose of the convention to establish a currency consisting of the precious metals. These, from their peculiar properties, which rendered them the standard of value in all other countries, were adopted in this, as well to establish its commercial standard, in reference to foreign countries, by a permanent rule, as to exclude the use of a mutable medium of exchange, such as of certain agricultural commodities, recognised by the statutes of some States as a tender for debts, or the still more pernicious expedient of a paper currency. The last, from the experience of the evils of the issues of paper during the Revolution, had become so justly obnoxious, as not only to suggest the clause in the constitution forbidding the emission of bills of credit by the States, but also to produce that vote in the convention which negated the proposition to grant power to Congress to charter corporations; a proposition well understood at the time, as intended to authorize the establishment of a national bank, which was to issue a currency of bank notes, on a capital to be created to some extent out of Government stocks. Although this proposition was refused by a direct vote of the convention, the object was afterwards in effect obtained, by its ingenious advocates, through a strained construction of the constitution. The debts of the Revolution were funded, at prices which formed no equivalent, compared with the nominal amount of the stock, and under circumstances which exposed the motives of some of those who participated in the passage of the act, to distrust.

The facts that the value of the stocks was greatly enhanced by the creation of the bank, that it was well understood that such would be the case, and that some of the advocates of the measure were largely benefited by it, belong to the history of the times, and are well calculated to diminish the respect which might otherwise have been due to the action of the Congress which created the institution.

On the establishment of a national bank, it became the interest of its creditors that gold should be superseded by the paper of a bank as a general currency. A value was soon attached to the gold coins, which made their exportation to foreign countries as a mercantile commodity, more profitable than their retention and use at home as money. It followed, as a matter of course, if not designed by those who established the bank, that the bank became, in effect, a substitute for the mint of the United States.

Such was the origin of a national bank currency, and such the beginning of those difficulties which now appear in the excessive issues of the banks incorporated by the various States.

Although it may not be possible, by any legislative means within our power, to change at once the system which has thus been introduced, and has received the acquiescence of all portions of the country, it is certainly our duty to do all that is consistent with our constitutional obligations, to prevent the mischiefs which are threatened by its undue extension. That the efforts of the fathers of our Government to guard against it by a constitutional provision were founded on an intimate knowledge of the subject, has been frequently attested by the bitter experience of the country. The same cause which led them to refuse their sanction to a power authorizing the establishment of incorporations for banking purposes, now exist in a much stronger degree to urge us to exert the utmost vigilance in calling into action the means necessary to correct the evils resulting from the unfortunate exercise of the power; and it is to be hoped that the opportunity of effecting this great good will be improved before the country witnesses new scenes of embarrassment and distress.

Variableness must ever be the characteristic of a currency, of which the precious metals are not the chief ingredient, or which can be expanded or contracted without regard to the principles that regulate the value of those metals as a standard in the general trade of the world. With us, bank issues constitute such a currency, and must ever do so, until they are made dependant on those just proportions of gold and silver, as a circulating medium, which experience has proved to be necessary, not only in this, but in all other commercial countries. Where those proportions are not infused into the circulation, and do not control it, it is manifest that prices must vary according to the tide of bank issues, and the value and stability of property must stand exposed to all the uncertainty which attends the administration of institutions that are constantly liable to the temptation of an interest distinct from that of the community in which they are established.

The progress of an expansion, or rather a depreciation of the currency, by excessive bank issues, is always attended by a loss to the laboring classes. This portion of the community have neither time nor opportunity to watch the ebbs and flows of the money market. Engaged from day to day in their useful toils, they do not perceive that, although their wages are nominally the same, or even somewhat higher, they are greatly reduced, in fact, by the rapid increase of a spurious currency, which, as it appears to make money abound, they are at first inclined to consider a blessing. It is not so with the speculator, by whom this operation is better understood, and is made to contribute to his advantage. It is not until the prices of the necessities of life become so dear that the laboring classes cannot supply their wants out of their wages, that the wages rise and gradually reach a justly proportioned rate to that of the products of their labor. When thus, by the depreciation in consequence of the quantity of paper in circulation, wages as well as prices become exorbitant, it is soon found that the whole effect of the adulterations is a tariff on our home industry for the benefit of the countries where gold and silver circulate and maintain uniformity and moderation in prices. It is then perceived that the enhancement of the price of land and labor produces a corresponding increase in the price of products, until these products do not sustain a competition with similar ones in other countries, and thus both manufactured and agricultural productions cease to bear exportation from the country of the spurious currency, because they cannot be sold for cost. This is the process by which specie is banished by the paper of the banks. Their vaults are soon exhausted to pay for foreign commodities; the next step is a stoppage of specie payment—a total degradation of paper as a currency—unusual depression of prices, the ruin of debtors, and the accumulation of property in the hands of creditors and cautious capitalists.

It was in view of these evils, together with the dangerous power wielded by the Bank of the United States, and its repugnance to our constitution, that I was induced to exert the power conferred upon me by the American people to prevent the continuance of that institution. But although various dangers to our republican institutions have been obviated by the failure of that bank to extort from the Government a renewal of its charter, it is obvious that little has been accomplished except a salutary change of public opinion, towards restoring to the country the sound currency provided for in the constitution. In the acts of several of the States prohibiting the circulation of small notes, and the auxiliary enactments of Congress at the last session, forbidding their reception or payment on public account, the true policy of the country has been advanced, and a larger portion of the precious metals infused into our circulating medium. These measures will probably be followed up in due time by the enactment of State laws, banishing from circulation bank notes of still higher denominations; and the object may be materially promoted by further acts of Congress, forbidding the employment, as fiscal agents, of such banks as continue to issue notes of low denominations, and throw impediments in the way of the circulation of gold and silver.

The effects of an extension of bank credits and over-issues of bank paper have been strikingly illustrated in the sales of the public lands. From the returns made by the various Registers and Receivers in the early part of last summer, it was perceived that the receipts arising from the sales of the public lands were increasing to an unprecedented amount. In effect, however, these receipts amounted to nothing more than credits in bank. The banks let out their notes to speculators; they were paid to the Receivers, and immediately returned to the banks, to be sent out again and again, being mere instruments to transfer to speculators the most valuable public land, and pay the Government by a credit on the books of the banks. Those credits on the books of some of the western banks, usually called deposits, were already greatly beyond their immediate means of payment, and were rapidly increasing. Indeed, each speculation furnished means for another; for no sooner had one individual or company paid in the notes, than they were immediately lent to another for a like purpose; and the banks were extending their business and their issues so largely, as to alarm considerate men, and render it doubtful whether these bank credits, if permitted to accumulate, would ultimately be of the least value to the Government. The spirit of expansion and speculation was not confined to the deposite banks, but pervaded the whole multitude of banks throughout the Union, and was giving rise to new institutions to aggravate the evil.

The safety of the public funds, and the interest of the people, generally, required that these operations should be checked, and it became the duty of every branch of the General and State Governments to adopt all legitimate and proper means to produce that salutary effect. Under this view of my duty, I directed the issuing of the order which will be laid before you by the Secretary of the Treasury, requiring payment for the public lands sold to be made in specie, with an exception until the fifteenth of the present month in favor of actual settlers. This measure has produced many salutary consequences. It checked the career of the Western banks, and gave them additional strength in anticipation of the pressure which has since pervaded our Eastern as well as the European commercial cities. By preventing the extension of the credit system, it measurably cut off the means of speculation, and retarded its progress in monopolizing the most valuable of the public lands. It has tended to save the new States from a non-resident proprietorship, one of the greatest obstacles to the advancement of a new country, and the prosperity of an old one. It has tended to keep open the public lands for entry by emigrants, at Government prices, instead of their being compelled to purchase of speculators at double or treble prices. And it is conveying into the interior large sums in silver and gold, there to enter permanently into the currency of the country, and place it on a firmer foundation. It is confidently believed that the country will find, in the motives which induced that order, and the happy consequences which will have ensued, much to commend, and nothing to condemn.

It remains for Congress, if they approve the policy which dictated this order, to follow it up in its various bearings. Much good, in my judgment, would be produced by prohibiting sales of the public lands, except to actual settlers, at a reasonable reduction of price, and to limit the quantity which shall be sold to them. Although it is believed the General Government never ought to receive any thing but the constitutional currency in exchange for the public lands, that point would be of less importance if the lands were sold for immediate settlement and cultivation. Indeed, there is scarcely a mischief arising out of our present land system, including the accumulating surplus of revenue, which would not be remedied at once by a restriction on land sales to actual settlers; and it promises other advantages to the country in general, and to the new States in particular, which cannot fail to receive the most profound consideration of Congress.

Experience continues to realize the expectations entertained as to the capacity of the State banks to perform the duties of fiscal agents for the Government, at the time of the removal of the deposits. It was alleged by the advocates of the Bank of the United States, that the State banks, whatever might be the regulations of the Treasury Department, could not make the transfers required by the Government, or negotiate the domestic exchanges of the country. It is now well ascertained that the real domestic exchanges, performed through discounts, by the United States Bank and its twenty-five branches, were at least one-third less than those of the deposit banks for an equal period of time; and if a comparison be instituted between the amounts of service rendered by these institutions, on the broader basis which has been used by the advocates of the United States Bank, in estimating what they consider the domestic exchanges transacted by it, the result will be still more favorable to the deposit banks.

The whole amount of public money transferred by the Bank of the United States in 1832, was $16,000,000. The amount transferred and actually paid by the deposit banks in the year ending the first of October last, was $39,319,899; the amount transferred and paid between that period and the 6th November, was $5,399,000; and the amount of transfer warrants outstanding on that day, was $14,450,000; making an aggregate of $59,168,894. These enormous sums of money first mentioned have been transferred with the greatest promptitude and regularity; and the rates at which the exchanges have been negotiated previously to the passage of the deposit act were generally below those charged by the Bank of the United States. Independently of these services, which are far greater than those rendered by the United States Bank and its twenty-five branches, a number of the deposit banks, have, with a commendable zeal to aid in the improvement of the currency, imported from abroad, at their own expense, large sums of the precious metals for coinage and circulation.

In the same manner have nearly all the predictions turned out in respect to the effect of the removal of the deposits—a step unquestionably necessary to prevent the evils which it was foreseen the bank itself would endeavor to create in a final struggle to procure a renewal of its charter. It may be thus, too, in some degree, with the further steps which may be taken to prevent the excessive issue of other bank paper; but it is to be hoped that nothing will now deter the Federal and State authorities from the firm and vigorous performance of their duties to themselves and to the people in this respect.

In reducing the revenue to the wants of the Government, your particular attention is invited to those articles which constitute the necessities of life. The duty on salt was laid as a war tax, and was no doubt continued to assist in providing for the payment of the war debt. There is no article, the release of which from taxation would be felt so generally and so beneficially. To this may be added all kinds of fuel and provisions. Justice and benevolence unite in favor of releasing the poor of our cities from burdens which are not necessary to the support of our Government, and tend only to increase the wants of the destitute.

It will be seen by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the accompanying documents, that the Bank of the United States has made no payment on account of the stock held by the Government in that institution, although urged to pay any portion which might suit its convenience, and that it has given no information when payment may be expected. Nor, although repeatedly requested, has it furnished the information in relation to its condition, which Congress authorized the Secretary to collect at their last session. Such measures as are within the power of the Executive have been taken to ascertain the value of the stock, and procure the payment as early as possible.

The conduct and present condition of that bank, and the great amount of capital vested in it by the United States, require your careful attention. Its charter expired on the third day of March last, and it has now no power but that given in the 21st section, "to use the corporate name, style, and capacity, for the purpose of suits, for the final settlement and liquidation of the affairs and accounts of the corporation, and for the sale and disposition of their estate, real, personal, and mixed, but not for any other purpose, or in any other manner whatsoever, nor for a period exceeding two years after the expiration of the said term of incorporation." Before the expiration of the charter, the stockholders of the bank obtained an act of incorporation from the Legislature of Pennsylvania, excluding only the United States. Instead of proceeding to wind up their concerns, and pay over to the United States the amount due on account of the stock held by them, the President and Directors of the old bank appear to have transferred the books, papers, notes, obligations, and most or all of its property, to this new corporation, which entered upon business as a continuation of the old concern. Amongst other acts of questionable validity, the notes of the expired corporation are known to have been used as its own, and again put in circulation. That the old bank had no right to issue or re-issue its notes after the expiration of its charter, cannot be denied; and that it could not confer any such right on its substitute, any more than exercise it itself, is equally plain. In law and honesty, the notes of the bank in circulation, at the expiration of its charter, should have been called in by public advertisement, paid up as presented, and together with those on hand, cancelled and destroyed. Their re-issue is sanctioned by no law, and warranted by no necessity. If the United States be responsible in their stock for the payment of these notes, their re-issue by the new corporation, for their own profit, is a fraud on the Government. If the United States is not responsible, then there is no legal responsibility in any quarter, and it is a fraud on the country. They are the redeemed notes of a dissolved partnership, but, contrary to the wishes of the retiring partner, and without his consent, are again re-issued and circulated.

It is the high and peculiar duty of Congress to decide whether any further legislation be necessary for the security of the large amount of public property now held, and in use by the new bank, and for vindicating the rights of the Government, and compelling a speedy and honest settlement with all the creditors of the old bank, public and private, or whether the subject shall be left to the power now possessed by the Executive and Judiciary. It remains to be seen whether the persons, who, as managers of the old bank, undertook to control the Government, retained the public dividends, shut their doors upon a committee of the House of Representatives, and filled the country with panic to accomplish their own sinister objects, may now, as managers of a new bank, continue with impunity to flood the country with a spurious currency; use the seven millions of Government stock for their own profit, and refuse to the United States all information as to the present condition of their own property, and the prospect of recovering it into their own possession.

The lessons taught by the Bank of the United States cannot well be lost upon the American people. They will take care never again to place so tremendous a power in irresponsible hands; and it will be fortunate if they seriously consider the consequences which are likely to result on a smaller scale from the facility with which corporate powers are granted by their State Governments.

It is believed that the law of the last session, regulating the deposit banks, operates onerously and unjustly upon them in many respects; and it is hoped that Congress, on proper representation, will adopt the modifications which are necessary to prevent this consequence.

The report of the Secretary of War ad interim, and the accompanying documents, all which are herewith laid before you, will give you a full view of the diversified and important operations of that Department during the past year.

The military movements rendered necessary by the aggressions of the hostile portions of the Seminole and Creek tribes of Indians, and by other circumstances, have required the active employment of nearly our whole regular force, including the marine corps, and of large bodies of militia and volunteers. With all these events, so far as they were known at the seat of Government before the termination of your last session, you are already acquainted; and it is, therefore, only needful in this place to lay before you a brief summary of what has since occurred.

The war with the Seminoles, during the summer, was, on our part, chiefly confined to the protection of our frontier settlements from the incursions of the enemy; and, as a necessary and important means for the accomplishment of that end, to the maintenance of the posts previously established. In the course of this duty, several actions took place, in which the bravery and discipline of both officers and men were conspicuously displayed, and which I have deemed it proper to notice, in respect to the former, by the granting of brevet rank for gallant services in the field. But as the force of the Indians was not so far weakened by these partial successes as to lead them to submit, and as their savage inroads were frequently repeated, early measures were taken for placing at the disposal of Governor Call, who, as commander-in-chief of the territorial militia, had been temporarily invested with the command, an ample force, for the purpose of resuming offensive operations, in the most efficient manner, so soon as the season should permit. Major General Jesup was also directed, on the conclusion of his duties in the Creek country, to repair to Florida, and assume the command.

The result of the first movement made by the forces under the direction of Governor Call, in October last, as detailed in the accompanying papers, excited much surprise and disappointment. A full explanation has been required of the causes which led to the failure of that movement, but has not yet been received. In the mean time, as it was feared that the health of Governor Call, who was understood to have suffered much from sickness, might not be adequate to the crisis, and as Major General Jesup was known to have reached Florida, that officer was directed to assume the command, and to prosecute all needful operations with the utmost promptitude and vigor. From the force at his disposal, and the dispositions he has made, and is instructed to make, and from the very efficient measures which it is since ascertained have been taken by Governor Call, there is reason to hope that they will soon be enabled to reduce the enemy to subjection. In the meantime, as you will perceive from the report of the Secretary, there is urgent necessity for further appropriations to suppress these hostilities.

Happily for the interests of humanity, the hostilities with the Creeks were brought to a close soon after your adjournment, without that effusion of blood which at one time was apprehended as inevitable. The unconditional submission of the hostile party was followed by their speedy removal to the country assigned them west of the Mississippi. The inquiry as to alleged frauds in the purchase of the reservations of those Indians, and the cause of their hostilities, requested by the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 1st of July last, to be made by the President, is now going on, through the agency of commissioners appointed for that purpose. Their report may be expected during your present session.

The difficulties apprehended in the Cherokee country have been prevented, and the peace and safety of that region and its vicinity effectually secured, by the timely measures taken by the War Department, and still continued.

The discretionary authority given to General Gaines to cross the Sabine, and to occupy a position as far west as Nacogdoches, in case he should deem such a step necessary to the protection of the frontier, and to the fulfilment of the stipulations contained in our treaty with Mexico, and the movement subsequently made by that officer, have been alluded to in a former part of this message. At the date of the latest intelligence from Nacogdoches, our troops were yet at that station; but the officer who has succeeded General Gaines has recently been advised, that, from the facts known at the seat of Government, there would seem to be no adequate cause for any longer maintaining that position; and he was accordingly instructed, in case the troops were not already withdrawn under the discretionary powers before possessed by him, to give the requisite orders for that purpose, on the receipt of the instructions, unless he shall then have in his possession such information as shall satisfy him that the maintenance of the post is essential to the protection of our frontiers, and to the due execution of our treaty stipulations, as previously explained to him.

Whilst the necessities existing during the present year, for the service of militia and volunteers, have furnished new proofs of the patriotism of our fellow-citizens, they have also strongly illustrated the importance of an increase in the rank and file of the regular army. The views of this subject, submitted by the Secretary of War, in his report, meet my entire concurrence, and are earnestly commended to the deliberate attention of Congress. In this connexion, it is also proper to remind you, that the defects in our present militia system are every day rendered more apparent. The duty of making further provision by law, for organizing, arming, and disciplining this arm of defence, has been so repeatedly represented to Congress by myself and my predecessors, that I deem it sufficient, on this occasion, to refer to the last annual message and to former Executive communications, in which the subject has been discussed.

It appears, from the reports of the officers charged with mustering into service the volunteers called for under the act of Congress of the last session, that more presented themselves at the place of rendezvous in Tennessee, than were sufficient to meet the requisition which had been made by the Secretary of War upon the Governor of that State. This was occasioned by the omission of the Governor to apportion the requisition to the different regiments of militia, so as to obtain the proper number of troops, and no more. It seems but just to the patriotic citizens who repaired to the general rendezvous, under circumstances authorizing them to believe that their services were needed, and would be accepted, that the expenses incurred by them, while absent from their homes, should be paid by the Government. I accordingly recommend that a law to this effect be passed by Congress, giving them a compensation which will cover their expenses on the march to and from the place of rendezvous, and while there; in connexion with which, it will also be proper to make provision for such other equitable claims, growing out of the service of the militia, as may not be embraced in the existing laws.

On the unexpected breaking out of hostilities in Florida, Alabama, and Georgia, it became necessary, in some cases to take the property of individuals for public use. Provision should be made by law for indemnifying the owners; and I would also respectfully suggest whether some provision may not be made, consistently with the principles of our Government, for the relief of the sufferers by Indian depredations, or by the operations of our own troops.

No time was lost, after the making of the requisite appropriations, in resuming the great national work of completing the unfinished fortifications on our seaboard, and of placing them in a proper state of defence. In consequence, however, of the very late day at which those bills were passed, but little progress could be made during the season which has just closed. A very large amount of the moneys granted at your last session accordingly remains unexpended; but as the work will be again resumed at the earliest moment in the coming spring, the balance of the existing appropriations, and in several cases which will be laid before you, with the proper estimates, further sums for the like objects may be usefully expended during the next year.

The recommendations of an increase in the engineer corps, and for a reorganization of the topographical corps, submitted to you in my last annual message, derive additional strength from the great embarrassments experienced, during the present year, in those branches of the service, and under which they are now suffering. Several of the most important surveys and constructions, directed by recent laws, have been suspended in consequence of the want of adequate force in these corps.

The like observations may be applied to the ordnance corps, and to the general staff, the operations of which, as they are now organized, must either be frequently interrupted, or performed by officers taken from the line of the army, to the great prejudice of the service.

For a general view of the condition of the Military Academy, and of other branches of the military service not already noticed, as well as for fuller illustrations of those which have been mentioned, I refer you to the accompanying documents; and among the various proposals contained therein for legislative action, I would particularly notice the suggestion of the Secretary of War, for the revision of the pay of the army, as entitled to your favorable regard.

The national policy, founded alike in interest and in humanity, so long and so steadily pursued by this Government, for the removal of the Indian tribes originally settled on this side of the Mississippi to the west of that river, may be said to have been consummated by the conclusion of the late treaty with the Cherokees. The measures taken in the execution of that treaty, and in relation to our Indian affairs generally, will fully appear by referring to the accompanying papers. Without dwelling on the numerous and important topics embraced in them, I again invite your attention to the importance of providing a well-digested and comprehensive system for the protection, supervision, and improvement of the various tribes now planted in the Indian country. The suggestions submitted by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and enforced by the Secretary, on this subject, and also in regard to the establishment of additional military posts in the Indian country, are entitled to your profound consideration. Both measures are necessary, for the double purpose of protecting the Indians from intestine war, and in other respects complying with our engagements to them, and of securing our Western frontier against incursions which otherwise will assuredly be made on it. The best hopes of humanity in regard to the aboriginal race, the welfare of our rapidly extending settlements, and the honor of the United States, are all deeply involved in the relations existing between this Government and the emigrating tribes. I trust, therefore, that the various matters submitted in the accompanying documents, in respect to those relations, will receive your early and mature deliberation; and that it may issue in the adoption of legislative measures adapted to the circumstances and duties of the present crisis.

You are referred to the report of the Secretary of the Navy for a satisfactory view of the operations of the department under his charge during the present year. In the construction of vessels at the different navy yards, and in the employment of our ships and squadrons at sea, that branch of the service has been actively and usefully employed. While the situation of our commercial interests in the West Indies required a greater number than usual of armed vessels to be kept on that station, it is gratifying to perceive that the protection due to our commerce in other quarters of the world has not proved insufficient. Every effort has been made to facilitate the equipment of the exploring expedition authorized by the act of the last session, but all the preparation necessary to enable it to sail has not yet been completed. No means will be spared by the Government to fit out the expedition on a scale corresponding with the liberal appropriations for the purpose, and with the elevated character of the objects which are to be effected by it.

I beg leave to renew the recommendation made in my last annual message respecting the enlistment of boys in our naval service, and to urge upon your attention the necessity of further appropriations to increase the number of ships afloat, and to enlarge generally the capacity and force of the navy. The increase of our commerce, and our position in regard to the other Powers of the world, will always make it our policy and interest to cherish the great naval resources of our country.

The report of the Postmaster General presents a gratifying picture of the condition of the Post Office Department. Its revenues, for the year ending the 30th June last, were $3,398,455 19, showing an increase of revenue over that of the preceding year of $404,878 53, or more than thirteen per cent. The expenditures for the same year were $2,755,623 76, exhibiting a surplus of $642,831 43. The Department has been redeemed from embarrassment and debt; has accumulated a surplus of more than half a million of dollars; has largely extended, and is preparing still further to extend, the mail service, and recommends a reduction of postages equal to about twenty per cent. It is practising upon the great principle which should control every branch of our Government, of rendering to the public the greatest good possible, with the least possible taxation to the people.

The scale of postages suggested by the Postmaster General recommends itself, not only by the reduction it proposes, but by the simplicity of its arrangement, its conformity with the Federal currency, and the improvement it will introduce into the accounts of the Department and its agents.

Your particular attention is invited to the subject of mail contracts with railroad companies. The present laws providing for the making of contracts are based upon the presumption that competition among bidders will secure the service at a fair price. But on most of the railroad lines there is no competition in that kind of transportation, and advertising is therefore useless. No contract can now be made with them, except such as shall be negotiated before the time of offering or afterwards, and the power of the Postmaster General to pay them high prices is, practically, without limitation. It would be a relief to him, and no doubt would conduce to the public interest, to prescribe by law some equitable basis upon which such contracts shall rest, and restrict him by a fixed rule of allowance. Under a liberal act of that sort, he would, undoubtedly be able to secure the services of most of the railroad companies, and the interest of the Department would be thus advanced.

The correspondence between the people of the United States and the European nations, and particularly with the

Message of the President of the United States.

British islands, has become very extensive, and requires the interposition of Congress to give it security. No obstacle is perceived to an interchange of mails between New York and Liverpool, or other foreign ports, as proposed by the Postmaster General. On the contrary, it promises, by the security it will afford, to facilitate commercial transactions, and give rise to an enlarged intercourse among the people of different nations, which cannot but have a happy effect. Through the city of New York most of the correspondence between the Canadas and Europe is now carried on, and urgent representations have been received from the head of the Provincial Post Office, asking the interposition of the United States to guard it from the accidents and losses to which it is now subjected. Some legislation appears to be called for, as well by our own interest as by comity to the adjoining British Provinces.

The expediency of providing a fire-proof building for the important books and papers of the Post Office Department is worthy of consideration. In the present condition of our Treasury it is neither necessary nor wise to leave essential public interests exposed to so much danger, when they can so readily be made secure. There are weighty considerations in the location of a new building for that Department, in favor of placing it near the other Executive buildings.

The important subjects of a survey of the coast, and the manufacture of a standard of weights and measures for the different custom-houses, have been in progress for some years, under the general direction of the Executive, and the immediate superintendence of a gentleman possessing high scientific attainments. At the last session of Congress, the making of a set of weights and measures for each State in the Union, was added to the others by a joint resolution.

The care and correspondence, as to all these subjects, have been devolved on the Treasury Department during the last year. A special report from the Secretary of the Treasury will soon be communicated to Congress, which will show what has been accomplished as to the whole; the number and compensation of the persons now employed in these duties, and the progress expected to be made during the ensuing year; with a copy of the various correspondence deemed necessary to throw light on the subjects which seem to require additional legislation. Claims have been made for retrospective allowances in behalf of the superintendent and some of his assistants, which I did not feel justified in granting; other claims have been made for large increases in compensation, which, under all the circumstances of the several cases, I declined making without the express sanction of Congress. In order to obtain that sanction, the subject was, at the last session, on my suggestion, and by request of the immediate superintendent, submitted by the Treasury Department to the Committee on Commerce of the House of Representatives. But no legislative action having taken place, the early attention of Congress is now invited to the enactment of some expressed and detailed provisions in relation to the various claims made for the past, and to the compensation and allowances deemed proper for the future.

It is further respectfully recommended that, such being the inconvenience of attention to these duties by the Chief Magistrate, and such the great pressure of business on the Treasury Department, the general supervision of the coast survey, and the completion of the weights and measures, if the works are kept united, should be devolved on a board of officers organized specially for that purpose, or on the Navy Board attached to the Navy Department.

All my experience and reflection confirm the conviction I have so often expressed to Congress in favor of an amendment of the constitution which will prevent, in any event, the election of the President and Vice President of the United States devolving on the House of Representatives and the Senate; and I therefore beg leave again to solicit your attention to the subject. There were various other suggestions in my last annual message not acted upon, particularly that relating to the want of uniformity in the laws of the District of Columbia, that are deemed worthy of your favorable consideration.

Before concluding this paper, I think it due to the various executive departments to bear testimony to their prosperous condition, and to the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted. It has been my aim to enforce in all of them a vigilant and faithful discharge of the public business, and it is gratifying to me to believe that there is no just cause of complaint from any quarter, at the manner in which they have fulfilled the objects of their creation.

Having now finished the observations deemed proper on this, the last occasion I shall have of communicating with the two Houses of Congress at their meeting, I cannot omit an expression of the gratitude which is due to the great body of my fellow-citizens, in whose partiality and indulgence I have found encouragement and support, in the many difficult and trying scenes through which it has been my lot to pass during my public career. Though deeply sensible that my exertions have not been crowned with a success corresponding to the degree of favor bestowed upon me, I am sure that they will be considered as having been directed by an earnest desire to promote the good of my country; and I am consoled by the persuasion that whatever errors have been committed will find a corrective in the intelligence and patriotism of those who will succeed us. All that has occurred during my administration is calculated to inspire me with increased confidence in the stability of our institutions; and should I be spared to enter upon that retirement which is so suitable to my age and infirm health, and so much desired by me in other respects, I shall not cease to invoke that beneficent Being to whose providence we are already so signally indebted, for the continuance of his blessings on our beloved country.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR AD INTERIM.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR,

December 3, 1836.

SIR: In compliance with your directions, I have the honor to lay before you the usual annual reports of the several divisions of this Department, and to submit, for your consideration, a summary of the contents of those documents, together with such additional statements and suggestions as seemed to me to be required by the present condition and necessities of the public service.

I. THE ARMY.

1. Organization and force.—It appears, from the report of Major General Macomb, and the tables annexed to it, that the regular army of the United States consists of 648 commissioned officers, and 7,310 non-commissioned officers, musicians, artificers, and privates; making an aggregate of 7,958, organized as follows: General Staff 14, viz., one major general commanding; two brigadier generals, each commanding one of the two military districts into which the United States are divided; one adjutant general; two inspectors general; one quartermaster general, and four quartermasters; and one commissary general of subsistence, and two commissaries; Pay department 18, viz., one paymaster general and seventeen paymasters; Medical department 76, viz., one surgeon general, fifteen surgeons, and sixty assistant surgeons; Purchasing department 3, viz., one commissary general of purchases and two military storekeepers; corps of Engineers 22; Topographical Engineers 10; Ordnance department (including 294 non-commissioned officers and enlisted men) 308; two regiments of dragoons, each containing ten companies of sixty privates each; four regiments of artillery, each containing nine companies of forty-two privates each; and seven regiments of infantry, each containing ten companies of forty-two privates each.

The present actual force of the regular army, according to the last general return, is 6,283; but it also appears from that return, that after making the necessary deductions for sickness, and other circumstances, the available force for service in the field, at the latest dates, was 4,282.

The difference between the actual force (6,283) and the force allowed by law (7,958) is 1,320, and is occasioned by the fact, that only 360 recruits have yet been obtained for the new regiment of dragoons authorized by the act of the last session, and by the vacancies caused by expiration of service and other casualties in the other regiments.

2. Distribution and present position of the troops.—The Eastern department, under the command of Major General Scott, includes thirty posts, from twenty of which the troops have been mostly withdrawn for service in the Creek country and in Florida. The whole number of officers of the line and men at the several stations in the Eastern department, including absentees, is therefore now only 1,124. Of that number 113 are at Fort Winnebago, 114 at Fort Brady, 105 at Fort Mackinac, 149 at Fort Howard, 67 at Fort Dearborn, 122 at Fort Gratiot; all which posts are on the Northwestern frontier, or in that vicinity, and the remainder at posts in the Atlantic States.

The Western department, under the command of Major General Gaines, now includes twenty posts and four temporary stations. Several of these posts have also been evacuated, and the troops ordered to Florida, so that the whole number of officers of the line and men now stationed at them, including absentees, amounts only to 2,458. Of that number 233 are at Fort Snelling, 185 at Fort Crawford, 321 at Fort Leavenworth, 132 at Fort Gibson, 158 at Fort Towson, 44 at Fort Coffee, 360 at Fort Jesup, and 124 at a station twenty miles from that place, 147 at Camp Sabine, and 428 at Camp Nacogdoches; all which posts and stations are in the Northwest or on or near the Western frontier; 136 at Fort Mitchell, Alabama, and 53 at Fort Cass, Tennessee.

The regular force serving in Florida consists of the four regiments of artillery, (five companies excepted;) eight companies of the fourth regiment of infantry, one company of dragoons, and a battalion of three hundred and twenty marines; making, in the aggregate, about two thousand, according to the latest returns received at the Adjutant General's office. After deducting the number reported sick, and absentees, the efficient regular force for field service in Florida will not exceed fifteen hundred.

For want of the necessary returns of the volunteers serving in that quarter, the estimate of that auxiliary force, at this time, is less accurate; but, from the best data in the Adjutant General's office, it may be thus computed: Tennessee volunteers, about 1,200; Alabama do., 300; Florida do., 250; and Washington city do., 59; amounting in all to about 1,800, besides seven hundred and thirty volunteer Creek Indians who have been mustered into the service of the United States, and are now employed with the army. The whole active force, then, regular, volunteer, and Indian, now in Florida, is probably somewhat less than four thousand.

Besides the volunteers above mentioned, there are also now employed, of that description of force, 361 in Tennessee, under the command of Brigadier General Wool; 537 in Arkansas, under the command of Brigadier General Arbuckle; and 58 in Alabama; making, when added to those serving in Florida, an aggregate of near 2,800.

3. Movements during the last year, and now in progress.—At the date of the last annual report from this Department, several companies had been placed in Florida, under the command of Brigadier General Clinch, for the purpose of restraining any hostile intentions on the part of the Seminole Indians, and of enforcing the execution of the treaty providing for their removal. It was then hoped that an open rupture would be prevented, and it was confidently believed that the eleven companies actually in Florida, amounting to five hundred and thirty-six officers and men, would be amply sufficient, with the reinforcements then under orders, and with such aid as might be derived from the local militia and volunteers, to put down any hostile attempt which might be made by the disaffected portion of the tribe. Both these expectations were disappointed, and a protracted warfare ensued, which has not yet been terminated.

The most important military operations growing out of this state of things, are mentioned in the accompanying report of Major General Macomb, which brings down the narrative of events in Florida to the retirement of the forces under Governor Call from the Withlacoochee, in October last. Authentic intelligence of that event reached the Department on the 1st ultimo, through the medium of letters received by some of the bureaus and of officers direct from Florida. By the same channels of information it was also ascertained that the health of Governor Call had been so much impaired by sickness and fatigue as to make it doubtful whether he could renew the campaign with the promptitude and energy demanded by the crisis. On the fourth ultimo, no report having been received from that officer, and it being deemed necessary that the Department should act, without further delay, on the information then in its possession, despatches were sent by express to Governor Call and to Major General Jesup, expressing to the former the surprise and disappointment of the President at the failure of his movement, and calling for an explanation, and directing the latter to assume the command. General Jesup was also instructed to establish posts at or near the mouth of the Withlacoochee, at Fort King, and at Volusia; and after taking the proper measures for securing, through them, the safety of the frontier, and for procuring sufficient and regular supplies, to concentrate all his disposable forces, and to proceed, without delay, to possess himself of the positions occupied by the Indians, and of the whole country between the Withlacoochee and Tampa bay. Should the war thereafter be continued, he was then directed to take such advanced positions to the south of Volusia, and to the east and south of Tampa bay, as the nature of the country might admit, and to push from them such further operations as might be necessary to the most speedy and effectual subjugation of the enemy.

No acknowledgment of the receipt of the despatches of the 4th of November has yet reached the Department; but it is known that Governor Call and General Jesup have both been very actively engaged in preparing for offensive movements, and the latest intelligence gives reason to hope that the objects of the campaign will soon be accomplished. But as these expectations may be disappointed, and as the term of service of the Tennessee volunteers, who compose a very important part of the force serving in Florida, will expire on the 1st of January, it has been deemed important to make provision for supplying their places, in part at least, from the regular army. With this view the commanding officer of the second regiment of dragoons was directed, on the 26th ultimo, to organize the recruits enlisted for that corps into companies, and to hold them in readiness to be moved to Florida on the shortest notice. It is also expected that two additional companies of artillery may be prepared for the like purpose during the present month. After maturing these arrangements, information was received at the Department that General Jesup had recently called on the Governor of Alabama for a battalion, and on the Governor of Georgia for a regiment of volunteers, to meet the contingency of a want of force on the discharge of the Tennessee brigade. This call has been approved as a proper precautionary measure; but it is believed that the other troops now in Florida will be sufficient, especially when reinforced as above suggested, for all available purposes, even should the war be continued, and that the services of the volunteers last called for may therefore very soon be dispensed with.

I beg leave to refer to the report of the General-in-chief for a succinct account of the operations rendered necessary by the hostile movements of the Creek Indians. To that account, however, it is but just to add that the marine corps, at a very alarming juncture, generously volunteered their services to aid in suppressing those hostilities, and were accordingly employed for that purpose. Since the termination of their tour of duty in the Creek country, they have been moved to Florida, where they now compose a most efficient portion of General Jesup's force.

Indications of a mischievous disposition having been exhibited by the Winnebagoes and other tribes in the Northwest, some movements of troops in the Upper Mississippi were had in the months of July and August last, which produced the desired effect of awing them into quietness.

The movements of the forces under the personal command of Major General Gaines, on the western frontiers of Louisiana and Arkansas, are sufficiently stated in the report of the General-in-chief. General Gaines has recently been relieved of this command by Brigadier General Arbuckle, who was instructed, under date of the 10th of October last, to make a full report of the condition of things in that quarter. He was also particularly advised that, under the instructions previously given to General Gaines, that officer was not to advance into the territory claimed by Mexico; and if he should have advanced, was to retire, unless the Indians were actually engaged in hostilities against the United States, or unless he had undoubted evidence that such hostilities were intended and were actually in preparation within that territory. On the 11th ultimo a communication was received from the officer in command at Camp Nacogdoches, giving an unfavorable account of the health of the troops at the post, and stating that their continuance there during the winter would make it necessary to construct barracks and quarters for their comfortable accommodation. In consequence of this communication, Brigadier General Arbuckle was instructed, under date of the 12th ultimo, to take all necessary measures to restore the health of the troops; and, in the event of his deciding to retain possession of Camp Nacogdoches, to provide at that place all needful accommodations. He was also informed that it was not in the power of the Department, with the limited information then in its possession, to give any positive order in regard to the further occupation of the post. The opinion was, however, expressed, that there seemed to be no adequate cause for any longer maintaining a position so unhealthful and inconvenient; and he was instructed, in case he had not already withdrawn the troops, to give the requisite orders for that purpose immediately on the receipt of that communication, unless he should then have in his possession information satisfying him that the maintenance of the post is essential to the protection of our frontiers and to the due execution of our treaty stipulations, as explained in the previous instructions to General Gaines and to himself.

In the month of June last it became necessary to call on the Governor of Tennessee, under the act of the last session, for a volunteer force sufficient to put down any hostile attempt on the part of the disaffected Cherokees, and to ensure the peaceful execution of the treaty then lately concluded with that tribe. The command of the troops to be raised for this purpose was committed to Brigadier General Wool, who immediately repaired to the Cherokee country, and is yet in command there. The force under him amounted, at one time, to about 2,450, but has lately been reduced to 361, a number sufficient, from present appearances, to prevent any difficulty in that quarter. Much praise is due to General Wool for the promptitude and zeal with which he has devoted himself to the execution of his duties.

The whole number of militia and volunteers mustered into the service of the United States, in the various movements and operations above mentioned, appears, from the rolls received in the office of the Adjutant General, to have been about 24,500. In the case of the Tennessee volunteers, mustered by General Wool, a larger number appeared than had been called for; but as they acted in good faith and under patriotic impulses, and as the commanding general deemed it best to receive them, it seems proper that provision should be made for their pay.

Legal provision will also be required for the just settlement of many of the accounts growing out of the employment of militia and volunteers, and for the satisfaction of claims which, though equitable, cannot be allowed by the accounting officers.

In executing the first section of the act of the 28th of May last, "to provide for the payment of expenses incurred, and supplies furnished, on account of the militia or volunteers received into the service of the United States for the defence of Florida," it has been decided that this section does not authorize any allowance for horses or other property impressed into the service of the United States, nor for any special damage done to individuals or their property by the troops of the United States, or the enemy. Some of these cases ought, undoubtedly, to be provided for by Congress; and, perhaps, under the peculiar circumstances which attended them, provision should be made for embracing the whole.

In addition to the movements now in progress, already mentioned, the troops stationed at Fort Dearborn, Chicago, have been ordered to proceed to Fort Howard, and to join the garrison at that post, and seventy-five recruits are on their way to join the first regiment of dragoons at Fort Gibson. The public property at Fort Dearborn will remain in charge of the late commandant of the post.

4. General Staff.—The reports of the chiefs of the different staff departments exhibit a perspicuous view of their operations during the past year.

I beg leave to call your attention to the communication of the Adjutant General, setting forth the difficulties which have been, and are yet, experienced in various branches of the public service for the want of additional staff officers.

The fiscal operations of the Quartermaster's and Subsistence departments have been unusually heavy, in consequence of the hostilities in which the army has been employed. It is due to these two important arms of the service that I should state that, from the time when adequate means were placed at their disposal by Congress, nothing has been omitted, on their part, to provide the necessary supplies for the troops in the field.

The report of the acting Quartermaster General states the progress made, or rather the inability to make progress, in the construction of the roads and other works with which the department is charged. It also exposes, in a lucid and convincing manner, the utter insufficiency of this branch of the service, as now organized by law, to the execution of the duties committed to it.

The expenditures incurred during the past year in the emigration and subsistence of Indians, will appear in the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, to whose office that business was transferred by a regulation made on the 1st ultimo. This change was made from a conviction that the interests of the service would be promoted by bringing all matters belonging to any one branch under the care of the bureau to which they properly belonged. The clerks and messenger, allowed by law, have been transferred with the business.

The complaints made in the accompanying papers as to the want of sufficient strength in the staff departments, appear to me to be well founded.

The present system seems to have been framed upon the principle of concentrating the business of those departments at the seat of Government, and of employing therein a very small number of officers commissioned in the staff, the deficiencies being supplied by selections from the lines. This arrangement is very well adapted to a time of profound peace, when officers can be spared from the line without injury to the service, when the positions of the troops are chiefly permanent; and when the changes which occur are made with so much deliberation as to afford ample time for preparing adequate means of transportation and supply. But, when large bodies of troops, whose numbers and movements may be varied by unforeseen contingencies, are to be supplied in the field, and at a great distance from the seat of Government, the system is worse than insufficient—it is the parent of expense, confusion, and delay. During the time necessarily occupied in the transmission of despatches to, and of instructions from, the War Department, the state of things may be so entirely changed as to render the instructions inapplicable; and, even if it remain unaltered, the loss of time in military operations is always a great evil, and sometimes a fatal one. To prevent inconveniences of this sort, it is evidently necessary that staff officers of experience and rank should be associated with the commander, and, to supply such associates, the staff departments must be enlarged. On the other hand, to make the line of the army truly effective, officers should not be taken for staff service or other detached duties, in large numbers, nor for long periods, from their companies. And when, to relieve the weakness of the staff on a pressing contingency, officers are selected from the line, the difficulty, instead of being remedied, is only exchanged for a new, and possibly a greater one. The embarrassments occasioned by these causes, during the operations of the year, have been of constant recurrence, and of the most serious character.

5. Pay department.—So far as the regular army is concerned, there is nothing in the report of the Paymaster General demanding particular remark. His suggestions in regard to the services and responsibilities of the paymasters who have been, or who may be, employed in making payments to militia and volunteers, undoubtedly demand the attention of Congress. In order to a clear understanding of this subject, it should be observed that after the reduction of the army, on the conclusion of the late war, and until the act of July 14, 1832, the Secretary of War appears, in several instances, to have exercised the power of making discretionary allowances to paymasters of the army of the United States, for the risks and losses sustained by them in making payments to militia and volunteers. These allowances were made in the shape of commissions on the money paid, and were usually fixed at two and a half per cent. The only ground on which such a power could have been exercised, was the absence of any legislative provision making it a part of the regular duty of the army paymasters to make payments to militia and volunteers. But by the third section of the act of the 14th of July, 1832, it was made the duty of the district paymasters of the army of the United States, "in addition to the payments required to be made by them to the regular troops, to make payment to all other troops in the service of the United States, whenever required thereto by order of the President." The discretionary power, before possessed by the Secretary of War, to make an extra allowance for payments to the militia and volunteers, was, as I suppose, taken away by this provision; and it was, doubtless, in consequence of this change that the second section of the act of the 2d of March, 1833, expressly provided "that the Secretary of War be authorized, at his discretion, out of the moneys appropriated by this or any former act, for the payment of the militia ordered into the service of the United States, according to law, during the last year, to allow and pay to the district paymasters of the army of the United States, employed in making such payments, a commission on the sums respectively paid by them, not exceeding one per centum upon the amount."

The act of the 14th of January, 1836, making appropriations for the suppression of hostilities commenced by the Seminole Indians, provides "that the sum of one hundred and twenty thousand dollars be, and the same hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expense attending the suppression of hostilities with the Seminole Indians in Florida, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, conformably to the provisions of the act of April 5, 1832, 'making appropriations for the support of the army;'" and the same reference is in effect made in the subsequent acts. When the act of the 5th of April, 1832, thus referred to, was passed, the discretionary power, spoken of above, was possessed by the Secretary of War, and was exercised in the settlement of the paymaster's accounts, under that act, by the allowance of a commission of two and a half per cent. In a case of peculiar hardship, and of just merit, also, which occurred before the resignation of the late Secretary of War, the Paymaster General, under the impression that the general reference to the act of the 5th of April, 1832, contained in the acts of the last session, included authority to allow a per centage, recommended such an allowance to the extent of one per cent. The Secretary of War referred the case to me, as Attorney General, and called for my opinion as to the power of the Department to allow the proposed commission. My opinion was, that the discretionary power was taken away by the act of 1832, above quoted, and also by the act of the 3d of March, 1835, making additional appropriations for the Delaware breakwater and other works, and that the intent to confer such a power was not sufficiently apparent in the general reference to the act of 1832, to authorize the allowance applied for. But as it would seem, from the report of the Paymaster General, that justice requires that additional compensation should be allowed, I concur in recommending a special provision, similar to that inserted in the act of the 2d of March, 1833.

6. Medical department.—The number of cases treated by the officers of the Medical department, during the year ending the 30th of September last, was 14,356, of which number only 139 died. This result may be well taken as evidence of the professional skill of the surgeons and assistant surgeons, and of the care with which their duties are performed. For other matters respecting this department, I beg leave to refer to the report of the Surgeon General ad interim. His suggestions in regard to the pay of hospital stewards, and the repairing and erection of hospitals at the different military posts, appear to me to be worthy the attention of Congress.

7. Purchasing department.—The report of the Commissary General of Purchases exhibits the several amounts drawn and disbursed for clothing, camp equipage, &c. during the present year, with estimates for the like service for the year 1837.

8. Engineers and Topographical Engineers.—The reports of the Chief Engineer and of the head of the Topographical bureau exhibit the progress made during the last year upon the fortifications and other works under their care.

The failure during the session of 1834-'5, of the bill containing the usual appropriations for fortifications, occasioned a suspension of those works during the year 1835; and though liberal appropriations for resuming them were made at the last session of Congress, yet it unfortunately happened that the season for active operations was too far advanced, at the time of the passing of the appropriation laws, to allow of much progress during the present year. Operations have been also retarded by the difficulty of procuring laborers, and still more by the insufficiency of the Engineer department to furnish an adequate number of engineers to superintend the constructions. Several important works authorized at the last session have not even been commenced; and but little has been done towards the completion of those previously undertaken. The like remarks are applicable to the various improvements in harbors on the seaboard and lakes, and at the mouths and in the channels of navigable rivers.

From the causes above stated, but a small portion of the sums appropriated by the present Congress for the engineer and topographical service has yet been expended.

The balances of those appropriations may, however, be expended without any further law, and measures will be taken for resuming operations at an early day, and with all practicable vigor.

In the last annual report of the Secretary of War he stated the insufficiency of the corps of engineers, and of the topographical corps, to the expeditious and economical performance of the duties committed to them, and recommended their increase. His suggestions on this subject were approved by you, and the attention of Congress was invited to them in your message. The propriety of such a measure is greatly strengthened by the present condition of those branches of the service, and by the delays and embarrassments occasioned by a want of the necessary force. In connexion with the proposed reorganization of the topographical corps, it may well be questioned whether the existing arrangement as to the civil engineers attached to that corps, and the practice of lending the topographical engineers to the States and to incorporated companies, ought longer to be continued. In my judgment it would be better that all the engineers in the service of the United States should belong to one or other of the organized military corps. And the information derived from the services of engineers, when employed by the States, or by companies, though useful in a military point of view, does not seem to me sufficiently important to counterbalance the inconveniences and objections incident to the practice.

9. Ordnance department.—It appears from the report of the Colonel of Ordnance, that $857,570 45 have been expended and accounted for during the first three quarters of the present year, being about $207,000 more than was expended in the same service during the corresponding quarters of the year 1835. These moneys have been expended in the manufacture, repair, and purchase of ordnance, ordnance stores, small-arms, and accoutrements, and in building materials, the details of all which will appear by the statements annexed to Colonel Bomford's report.

During the year ending on the 30th September, 1836, the sum of $220,813 38 was expended in procuring and distributing artillery, small-arms, accoutrements, &c. under the act of 1808, for arming and equipping the militia of the States and Territories.

The munitions of war issued during the year ending on the 30th of September, 1836, have been very large, in consequence of the actual hostilities in which the army has been engaged.

No returns of lead made at the United States lead mines have been delivered to the superintendent during the last year, and there yet remains due to the United States, on account of rent-lead which accrued prior to the 30th September, 1835, an aggregate of 493,313 pounds. It appears that the refusal to account for and to pay over the rent reserved in the leases mentioned in the last annual report has become general, the lessees denying the validity of the laws under which the leases were made, and that suits have been commenced against several of the delinquents, but are not yet determined. Colonel Bomford recommends the selling of the mineral lands, as the most effectual mode of terminating difficulties now existing between the Government and the inhabitants, and of securing to the United States the value of the mines.

Of the works authorized by acts passed at the last session of Congress, and belonging to the Ordnance department, all have been greatly delayed, and some entirely suspended, by the want of the necessary officers to conduct them. The interests of the service, as well as the just claims of contractors, whose payments are frequently delayed from inability to make the proper inspections, call loudly for an increase of this corps.

10. Proposed increase in rank and file of artillery and infantry.—In compliance with the suggestion of General Macomb, and with my own convictions of duty, I beg leave to invite your attention to a proposal for the increase of the rank and file of the artillery and infantry.

The insufficiency, in several respects, of our present military establishment has already been noticed. It is the greatest in the general staff and the rank and file; those arms of the service being much less numerous, in proportion, than the officers retained in the line of the army. The object of Congress in this arrangement evidently was, on the one hand, to reduce the rank and file and the general staff to the lowest allowable point; and on the other, to retain in the line officers enough to preserve an amount of military knowledge and experience competent to the direction of a large effective force, whenever such a force might be required by special emergencies, or by the permanent interests of the country. This policy was recommended at the time of its adoption (1821) by the existence of other and more pressing claims on the Treasury, and by the comparatively few calls then made for active military operations. In both these respects our condition is now widely different. The extinction of the public debt, whilst it gives us the ability to attend to other subjects of national importance, lays us under new obligations to do so. We have a much larger number of fortifications and other posts to be garrisoned; and our Indian relations have now reached a point which demands an effective military provision.

There are thirty-two forts on the Atlantic seaboard and the Gulf of Mexico, each of which ought to be garrisoned by a force adequate at least to the preservation of the public property, and to the retaining of some knowledge of artillery practice. This will require, as I understand, an average of about ninety-six men to each post, or about three thousand in the whole. The rank and file of the present regular army, supposing the new regiment of dragoons to be filled, amounts in the total to seven thousand and sixteen; from which number a large deduction must always be made for sickness, arrests, occasional absence, and time lost in recruiting and marching. The effective force, exclusive of officers, which may be relied on under the present arrangement, can, therefore, scarcely ever exceed six thousand men; a force utterly inadequate to the necessities of the public service, inasmuch as it affords, after the scanty provision for the seaboard above suggested, only about three thousand for the interior.

In that part of this report which relates to Indian affairs, I shall have occasion to specify some of the weighty reasons which make it necessary that we should establish additional posts on our Western borders and in the Indian country, and that each should be permanently garrisoned by a respectable force. We have now in that region sixteen posts, including three temporary stations, the whole of which are now occupied by about three thousand men, including a regiment of Arkansas volunteers recently called into the service. All, probably, will agree that the present force at several of the existing posts is inadequate, and a deliberate survey of the immense field of operations, and the various interests involved, will, I think, lead to the conclusion that this branch of the service cannot safely be left, for the next five or ten years, with a force at any time less than from five to seven thousand men.

The seaboard may be provided for in the manner above suggested, and adequate protection may be given to the interior and to the Indian country, by augmenting the number of men in each company of artillery and infantry to one hundred. This would increase the legal force, independently of commissioned officers and non-commissioned officers of artillery and infantry, to twelve thousand and thirty, from which we might at all times expect to command an available force of not more than about ten thousand effective men. Two plans for a similar increase in the rank and file of the army were submitted to Congress in the report of the Secretary of War of the 8th of March, 1836, and the accompanying communication of General Macomb of the 7th of that month, both of which communications were laid before the Senate of the United States in compliance with a resolution of that body. I refer to these documents for the details of those plans, and for an estimate of the expense, which, according to the statement then made, would be, for the increase above proposed, about $850,000 per annum. Such an addition to the heavy expenses of our present establishment should undoubtedly be well weighed before it is incurred; but, if we may judge from the experience of the last few years, the measure is as plainly called for on the score of economy as it is by other and more impressive considerations. The expenses occasioned by the hostile aggressions of the Sac and Fox Indians in 1832, amounted to more than $3,000,000; and the several appropriations for suppressing Indian hostilities, made by Congress at the last session, and amounting to five millions of dollars, have already been drawn from the Treasury; and, though a considerable amount is yet in the hands of disbursing officers, the whole will be required to meet expenses already incurred.

If it be one of the first objects of legislation to guard against the evils of war, then must it be admitted that the prevention of Indian hostilities, so far as human foresight is competent to that end, should be the great care of the Congress of the United States. For, whilst our exposure to such hostilities is imminent, the evils which attend them are so peculiar and unmitigated as to bring on those public agents who may neglect to guard against them the most fearful responsibility. The presence of an adequate military force at or near each of the points where the Indians are numerous, is the most effectual, if not the only effectual means of security and defence. In my judgment, such a force cannot be furnished by our present establishment; and, as neither militia nor volunteers can be employed for permanent garrisons, the object can only be effected by the increase of the regular army. I trust it will be provided for without delay.

11. Proposed revision of the pay of certain officers.—My attention having been called, by repeated resignations and other circumstances, to the pay of the subordinate grades, I have looked into the subject with some care, and the result is a decided conviction that the pay of the several grades above that of second lieutenant, and below that of colonel, ought to be increased; and that a new principal of periodical increase in each grade ought also to be introduced.

By the law, as it now stands, there is no increase of the fixed pay and emoluments, except when the officer is promoted; and, as promotion in time of peace is generally very slow, officers may serve over ten years in a single grade, and, after a service of twenty or thirty years' may still rise no higher than a majority, or even a captaincy. On the other hand, it will occasionally happen that resignations or other casualties may produce numerous vacancies, within a comparatively short period, in particular regiments, which may lead to rapid promotions, so that a second lieutenant may, within three or four years after entering the service, be advanced to a captaincy. To remedy the inadequacy of the present system, when promotion is slow, and to prevent its inequality, when its movement in particular regiments is rapid, it has occurred to me that it would be expedient and just to introduce the additional feature of increasing the pay after five years' service in any one grade, agreeably to the precedents established by the act of 1834, in relation to surgeons and assistant surgeons of the army, and by the act of 1835, regulating the pay of surgeons in the navy.

Concurrently with the introduction of this principle, I would also revise the scale of pay and emoluments, with a view to a moderate increase of the different grades above that of second lieutenants, and under that of colonel. I think it would be just to allow to second lieutenants, for the first five years from the dates of their commissions, the present pay and emoluments of their grade; and to those who have been in commission over five years, the present pay and emoluments of the first lieutenant; to first lieutenants, for the first five years, the present pay and emoluments of a captain; and to those who have been commissioned over five years, a corresponding increase; and, in like manner, to provide for an increase in the pay of those captains, majors, and lieutenant colonels, who shall have been in commission over five years—taking care, however, that the increase, by means of five years' service in one grade, shall not be more than one-half the difference between the first pay of such grade and the first pay of the next grade. The effect of this double arrangement for increase of compensation would be to secure to the officer the certainty of an increase of pay, at periodical stages, corresponding to the probable increase in his wants, and in the value of his services. But it would not interfere with the ancient and just practice of increasing the pay of the officer on his advancement to a higher grade. When promotions are slow the principle is greatly needed, and then it would apply; when they are rapid it would not be needed, and would not take place.

As the pay, emoluments, and allowances now given by law, depend on the grade of the officer, the corps to which he belongs, and his particular position and circumstances, the attempt to state them in this place would lead to inconvenient prolixity; and should you think proper to submit the subject to Congress, the proper information can be laid before the committees of that body. It is, however, deserving of consideration whether the principle adopted in the act of 1835, regulating the pay of the navy, by which all allowances (except for travelling expenses when under orders) are prohibited, and a gross sum in lieu thereof added to the pay may not, to some extent at least, be advantageously followed. The whole subject undoubtedly demands revision, especially with a view to retain in the departments of engineering and other branches requiring scientific attainments of a high order, experienced and valuable officers. Several of that class have retired from the army during the year, induced, as I have reason to suppose, by the inadequacy of the existing compensation, and the great demand for their services in civil life.

12. Proposed increase of the pay of privates—land bounty on re-enlistments.—I think it highly expedient that the pay of privates should also be increased. They are now allowed, when serving as cavalry in the regiment of dragoons, eight dollars per month; in all other cases six dollars per month. No bounty is given except on a second enlistment, which is encouraged by a gratuity of two months' pay. In consequence of the great increase in the price of labor, it has been found difficult, during the last year, to procure able-bodied men to supply the places of those soldiers whose term of service had expired; and the recruiting of the second regiment of dragoons, and to fill up vacancies in the other regiments, goes on very slowly. I submit whether it be not advisable to increase the regular pay; and as the services of an experienced and disciplined soldier are far more valuable than those of a new recruit, I cannot doubt the propriety of increasing the bounty on re-enlistment. It might be granted in land, at less inconvenience to the Government than if paid in money, and would probably be equally acceptable to the soldier. And as the service of the army, for some years to come, will be chiefly on our Western frontiers, most of the men, when discharged in that region, would probably find it for their interest to become actual settlers. The policy of the Government, in regard to the disposition of the public lands, would thus be promoted; and the settlers whom this arrangement would plant on the frontiers, would be found, from their military knowledge, among the most useful of their class. These objects might be still further promoted by giving an increased quantity of land on the condition of actual settlement.

13. Proposal for employment of chaplains.—Some provision, as it appears to me, should be made for securing to the army the services of chaplains. The act of April 12, 1808, required one chaplain, with the pay and emoluments of a major of infantry, to be appointed to each brigade. This provision was continued in force until superseded by the act of the 3d of March, 1815, fixing the military peace establishment; and there is now no authority for employing such an officer in the army at the public expense, except at the Military Academy.

The constitution of the United States has wisely provided that Congress "shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof;" but this cannot lessen the obligation of Congress to furnish to the officers and men employed in the military service, such opportunities of religious worship and of moral culture as may be compatible with the appropriate duties of the army. And when it is considered that even the common soldier resumes, sooner or later, the character of a citizen, how important does it become that he should be shielded as much as possible from the pernicious influences to which a military life is usually exposed! The enlightening and tranquillizing effects of a regular attendance on public worship, and the aid which a judicious and devoted chaplain may give, in the promotion of discipline and subordination, ought not to be overlooked in the organization of an army.

Since 1815, the services of chaplains at the fixed posts have frequently been secured by voluntary contributions, collected and applied, as I understand, by the council of administration. As the officers composing that council will be enabled to consult the wishes of the garrison, and are, in other respects, better qualified to make judicious selections for services of this nature than the authorities at the seat of Government, I recommend the passage of a law authorizing them to select and employ chaplains from time to time, and giving to the persons so employed the pay and emoluments of such grade as Congress may think proper to prescribe. To each regiment, when employed in the field, the like arrangement might be extended.

14. General condition of the army, &c.—The vacancies in the rank and file being numerous, and many officers of the line being engaged on detached service, or absent with leave or on furlough, the army, though in a high state of discipline, has not been found in the fittest condition for active field service. And notwithstanding the successive orders which have been issued, directing officers to join their regiments, the deficiency in officers has not yet been supplied—many having resigned, and others being so situated, by reason of sickness, or other causes, as to make a suspension of the orders, in respect to them, unavoidable. These circumstances, however, only enhance the merits of the officers and men, whether regulars, marines, militia, or volunteers, who have encountered the difficulties, privations, and perils of field service on the Western frontier and in the South. Several instances have occurred, during the war with the Seminoles, in which our troops have nobly sustained the honor of the American name; and those who will dispassionately consider the events of the past year, will find, in the services of the army, many strong claims on the confidence and gratitude of the nation.

The General-in-chief has noticed in his report, and in appropriate terms, the gallantry and good conduct of Brigadier General Clinch, who commanded in Florida on the breaking out of hostilities in that quarter. The merits of that officer were so highly appreciated by this Department, that his resignation was not accepted until it had been ascertained to have been rendered necessary by important private affairs. In consequence, doubtless, of pending inquiries, General Macomb's report intimates no opinion as to the conduct or operations of any other general officer in Florida, or in the Creek country. This forbearance was manifestly proper, and will be imitated by the Department. But it is not inconsistent with the rule thus adopted, to express the hope that it may ultimately appear that nothing has occurred to justify permanent estrangement between soldiers who trod together the path of renown, nor to dim the lustre of those honorable services which each has rendered to his country.

II. MILITIA AND VOLUNTEERS.

It has already been stated that, within the last year, no less than about 24,500 militia and volunteers have been mustered into the service of the United States. As these forces, when in actual service, form a part of the army of the United States, such particulars concerning those employed during the year, as seemed proper to be noticed in this report, have been presented under the preceding head.

The defective organization of the militia was noticed at length in the last annual report of the Secretary of War; and the outlines were suggested of a plan for its improvement, which received your sanction, and was submitted to Congress in the opening message of the last session. No legislative action having been had upon the subject, I deem it my duty to invite to it your renewed attention. If any arguments, in addition to those heretofore urged, were needed on this point, they would be found in the experience of the last year. Whilst the calls on the militia have been answered in a manner highly honorable to their patriotism, they have led to new illustrations of their deficiencies in organization and discipline. The matter has very often been presented to the consideration of Congress; and, until the constitutional power of organizing, arming, and disciplining this arm of national defence shall have been more adequately exercised, it will continue to be a duty to invoke their enlightened interposition.

III. FORTIFICATIONS, ARSENALS, ROADS, &c.

The present condition of our fortifications, arsenals, and other works of public defence, will sufficiently appear by reference to the accompanying documents from the Engineer and Ordnance departments; and the elaborate and very able report of the Secretary of War of the 7th of April last, transmitted to the Senate with your message of the following day, contains so full a view of the measures proper to be taken for their completion and armament, as to make any further observations on that point superfluous in this place. I would, however, particularly invite your attention, and also that of Congress, to the proposal contained in that paper, and in the last annual report, for the establishment of a national foundry for cannon, and to the suggestions on the subject of depots for arms, then also submitted.

The reports of the Chief Engineer and of the head of the Topographical bureau must also be referred to, for a succinct account of the present condition of the Cumberland and other roads, and of the harbors and other improvements authorized by law.

IV. MILITARY ACADEMY AT WEST POINT.

The report of the Board of Visitors, giving the results of the last annual examination, is well calculated to confirm the favorable opinion so generally entertained in respect to this institution. It also states some facts which, it may be hoped, will remove some of those misapprehensions which have occasionally prevailed to the prejudice of that establishment.

By the existing law, each cadet, on his appointment, is required to sign articles, by which he engages to serve five years, unless sooner discharged. As four years of this term, by the regulations in force since 1819, are to be spent at the Academy, the engagement secures to the United States only one year's service after graduation. It appears, however, from the report of the Visitors, that out of 841 graduates, the total number from the commencement of the institution, only sixty five had resigned at the end of their term of enlistment. The Visitors also ascertained that, out of the same number, 403 still remained in the army; and that, of the others, fifteen had been killed in battle, and 106 had otherwise died in the service. These facts illustrate the value of the institution as one of the effective means of providing for the national defence.

Whilst it thus appears that the public service has not been materially prejudiced by the early resignation of the graduates, I am yet inclined to think that its interests should be more effectually secured. In my judgment, the engagement for service after graduation, should be considerably prolonged; and the graduate should be made liable by law, in case of his discharge, after graduation and short of the prescribed term, for neglect of duty or other misconduct, to pay to the Government an equivalent for the expenses incurred in his education and support. Such a provision would not only be just in itself, but seems due to other considerations. As there is no constitutional authority to maintain the institution, except as a part of the military establishments necessary to the defence of the country, it should be so regulated as to contribute directly to that end. Such, also, seems to have been the design of the act of 1812, in prescribing the articles above referred to. There was at that time no prescribed term of study; and, as the position of the cadet, on his entrance, was regulated by the extent of his attainments, he might, and, as I understand, usually did, complete his course in about two years. It was, therefore, intended by the framers of the act of 1812, that a term of army service should be secured, equivalent, in some measure, to the expense incurred by the Government. I recommend the reassertion of this principle in a new enactment, adapted to the changes since made in the term of study.

The Board of Visitors having submitted various propositions for the enlargement of the public buildings, and of the courses of instructions, I have deemed it due to the subject, as well as to the high character of the Board, to present their suggestions to your consideration and to that of Congress. They are accordingly embraced in the estimates made by the Chief Engineer, with a single exception, which could not be submitted in that form. The recommendation thus excepted relates to the duties of the chaplain. By the second section of the act of the 14th of April, 1818, it is provided that there shall be one chaplain stationed at the Military Academy at West Point, who shall also be professor of geography, history, and ethics. To assist the chaplain in the duties of his professorship, an officer of the army has been associated with him, and the two instruct in the branches above named, and also in grammar and rhetoric, and in the elements of political science, including the law of nations and the constitutional law of the United States. It has been found physically impossible for the chaplain to give adequate attention to his clerical duties, and, with the aid of one assistant, to instruct in a suitable manner in the various studies above named. The consequence is, that the religious instruction of the cadet receives less attention than is commensurate with its importance, and with the probable intent of the act of Congress. The Visitors therefore recommend, and the suggestion strikes me as important, either that the functions of the chaplain be separated from those of the professor, or that another assistant be provided to aid him in the professorship. The latter mode of relief may be extended by executive regulation; but the former is deemed most appropriate, and for that reason the interposition of Congress is solicited.

V. INDIAN AFFAIRS.

The report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, herewith laid before you, embraces a detailed account of the operations of his office during the past year.

It appears from that document, that, within this period, more than 18,000 Indians, of whom 400 were Seminoles, 16,900 Creeks, and the remainder Pottawatamies, have reached the west bank of Mississippi, on their way to their new homes; and that arrangements have been made for the removal of the residue of those tribes at as early a day as circumstances shall allow. The mere process of removal has been conducted with greater expedition, as much economy, and as little of suffering and privation to the Indians, as in former years; but the opposition made by the hostile portions of the Seminoles and Creeks, already noticed under a former head, has subjected the Government, in those cases, to the painful necessity of resorting to coercive measures, which, in respect to the Seminoles, are yet continued.

The same report also exhibits the progress made by the commissioners appointed in pursuance of the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 1st of July, 1836, requesting the President of the United States "to cause measures to be taken for investigating certain alleged frauds in the purchase of the reservations of the Creek Indians, and the causes of their hostilities." The investigations, thus directed, have necessarily suspended the action of the Executive, on many contracts for the sale of Creek reservations, and there are also other difficulties in respect to them, which will probably require the intervention of Congress.

A commissioner has recently been appointed to certify contracts and to take proof of residence, under the treaty with the Choctaws of the 27th of September, 1830, and has probably entered on the duties assigned him.

The provisions in the treaties of 1832 and 1834, with the Chickasaws, which are to be carried into effect before their removal, have been nearly completed; and an arrangement, it is hoped, will soon be concluded between them and the Choctaws west of the Mississippi, for a portion of the territory assigned to the latter.

Measures have been taken for fulfilling the engagements of the United States contained in the treaties with the Chippewas and Ottawas, the Swan-creek and Black-river bands of the Chippewas, and the Wyandots, ratified at the last session of the Senate; and, so far as allowed by the short time which has since elapsed, those engagements have been faithfully executed.

Immediately after the ratification of the treaty with the Cherokees east of the Mississippi, the initiatory measures for carrying it into effect were taken by the Department; and though much retarded by various unforeseen occurrences, they are now going on with all the despatch of which the case is susceptible. The military movements deemed necessary to the maintenance of peace, and to the enforcement of the treaty, have already been noticed. Efforts have recently been made by Mr. John Ross, and by those of his people of whom he is understood to be the leader, to excite opposition to the treaty, and to prevent its execution; but it is believed that the steps taken by the Government will be sufficient to counteract those efforts. The more intelligent part of the Cherokees are well satisfied with the treaty, and the prompt and faithful execution, on our part, of its very liberal provisions, will doubtless secure the good-will of the great mass of the nation, and issue in their peaceful establishment with their brethren in the West.

Treaties have been made with the Indians who have emigrated from New York to Green bay, for lands on both sides of Fox river; and with four bands of Pottawatamies residing in the State of Indiana, for the extinguishment of their title to the sections of land reserved for them in the treaties of October, 1832. Negotiations have also been commenced with the Indians of New York, for the extinguishment of their title to lands in that State, and for their removal to the west of the Mississippi. With a view to the extinguishment of the Indian title to the country between the State of Missouri and the Missouri river, negotiations were opened with the tribes interested therein for the relinquishment of their rights; and treaties to that effect have already been concluded with the Iowas and Sacs of Missouri, Omahas, Yanceton and Santie Sioux, and Ottos and Missourias. Measures have also been taken for opening negotiations with the united nation of Ottawas, Chippewas, and Pottawatamies, for an exchange of the lands north of the Missouri river, assigned to them by the treaty of Chicago of 1833, for lands south of that river; and with the Miamies, for a cession of their lands in Indiana.

The Commissioner points out several defects in the laws relative to Indian affairs, and, for the purpose of remedying those defects, submits various propositions, to which I beg leave to call your attention, as worthy of being presented to the consideration of Congress. He also recommends the removal of the seat of the superintendency of Indian affairs from St. Louis (where it is now fixed by law) to Fort Leavenworth, or some other point on the Missouri river: and the substitution of full agencies for the present sub-agencies of the Creeks, Cherokees, and Osages, as measures rendered necessary by the onerous nature of the duties now pressing on the incumbents of those offices, and by the great accessions recently made, and hereafter to be made, to the tribes west of the Mississippi.

From the facts stated by the Commissioner, it would seem that the proviso to the act of the 3d of March, 1835, making appropriations for the Delaware breakwater, &c. operates harshly on the military officers in the Indian department. I concur in the propriety of asking from Congress, as an act of justice to those officers, the allowance of a commission on disbursements, as recommended by the Commissioner.

Connected with the general subject of our Indian relations are two measures, proposed by the Commissioner, which I deem of great moment. They are, the organization of an efficient system for the protection and government of the Indian country west of the Mississippi, and the establishment of military posts for the protection of that country and of our own frontiers, in addition to those now authorized by law.

These measures are due to the numerous tribes whom we have planted in this extensive territory, and to the pledges and encouragements by which they were induced to consent to a change of residence. We may now be said to have consummated the policy of emigration, and to have entered on an era full of interest to both parties. It involves the last hopes of humanity in respect to the Indian tribes; and though, to the United States, its issues cannot be equally momentous, they yet deeply concern our prosperity and honor. It therefore behoves us, at this juncture, seriously to examine the relations which exist between the United States and the inhabitants of the Indian country, to look into the duties which devolve on us, and to mature a system of measures for their just and constant execution.

In almost every treaty providing for the emigration of an Indian tribe, the impossibility of preserving it from extinction if left within the limits of any of the States or organized Territories of the United States, and thus exposed to the advances of the white population, is expressly recognised. The advantages which the tribe will derive from its establishment in a territory to be exclusively occupied by red men, under the solemn guaranties and the paternal care of the United States, are uniformly insisted on. In the treaty with the Choctaws of the 27th of September, 1830, the wish of the tribes to be allowed the privilege of a delegate in the House of Representatives of the United States is expressly mentioned; and though not acceded to by the commissioners of the United States, yet they insert it in the treaty, "that Congress may consider of and decide the application."

In the late treaty with the Cherokees east of the Mississippi, it is expressly stipulated "that they shall be entitled to a delegate in the House of Representatives whenever Congress shall make provision for the same." It is not to be doubted that the hopes thus held out to these tribes had an important influence in determining them to consent to emigrate to their new homes in the West.

Although some of the Indians have made considerable advances in civilization, they all need the guardianship of the United States. To leave them to the barbarism of their own institutions, with the inadequate assistance of an agent and the slight control of the general superintendent, would be imprudent as it regards ourselves, and unjust towards them. Under such a system, hostilities will frequently break out between the different tribes, and sometimes between them and the inhabitants of our frontiers, attended, in both cases, by the usual consequences of savage warfare. To fulfil in their true spirit the engagements into which we have entered, we must institute a comprehensive system of guardianship, adapted to the circumstances and wants of the people, and calculated to lead them gradually and safely to the exercise of self-government. And, at as early a day as circumstances will allow, the expectations authorized by the passage above quoted from the treaties with the Choctaws and Cherokees should be fulfilled. Indeed, from the facts stated by the Commissioner, it is scarcely to be doubted that the Choctaws are already in a condition to justify the measure. The daily presence of a native delegate on the floor of the House of Representatives of the United States, presenting, as occasion may require, to that dignified assembly, the interests of his people, would, more than any other single act, attest to the world and to the Indian tribes the sincerity of our endeavors for their preservation and happiness. In the successful issue of these endeavors, we shall find a more precious and durable accession to the glory of our country than by any triumph we can achieve in arts or in arms.

The duty of planting a line of posts near the borders of the Indian country, and of opening along it a free communication for the passage of troops, has already been recognised by the present Congress, by the act of the 2d of July, 1836, "to provide for the better protection of the Western frontier." This law authorizes the President to cause to be opened a military road from some point upon the right bank of the Mississippi, between the mouth of the St. Peter's and the mouth of the Des Moines, to Red river; and it contemplates the establishment of military posts "at such places along said road as the President may deem most proper" for the protection of the frontier, and for the preservation of the necessary communication. But this line of posts, though it will probably be sufficient, if well garrisoned, to protect our own frontier, will not be all that caution and good faith will require. To exercise the necessary supervision over the emigrated Indians, to preserve peace among the different tribes, and to protect them from their savage neighbors, we must also establish posts at convenient positions in the interior of their country.

The establishment and maintenance of these various posts is due to the emigrated tribes for other reasons. By the most sacred pledges, the territory in which we have planted them is to be perpetually theirs; the white man, with certain specified exceptions, is not to reside among them. The pledges have been given in the utmost sincerity, and the American people cannot but desire that they should be honorably redeemed. Without a strong military force—a force adequate to repress the encroachments of the civilized and more powerful race, how can we hope for their fulfilment? In the history of the Indian tribes, from the Atlantic to the Mississippi, and, indeed, in the history of barbarians in every quarter of the globe when pressed upon by a civilized population, we may read the issue of these pledges, unless we take early and efficient measures for their fulfilment. The measures must be such as will arrest the causes which, in all other cases, have ended in the extinction of the weaker race. The operation of those causes cannot be controlled by parchment guaranties, or mere moral considerations; to resist and counteract them, a physical force must be employed, sufficiently powerful and vigilant to keep them constantly in check. To my view, nothing is clearer than the ultimate failure of the great experiment we have commenced with the emigrated Indians, unless we secure to them, by military protection, the place and the time for the fair trial of that experiment. If we leave them unprotected, they will fade away as other tribes have faded; and the process, as in their cases, will be diversified by the same sanguinary events. The only difference will be, that, as the Indians on our Western frontiers are concentrated in greater force than has ever before been known in the history of the race, their inroads, if not more frequent, will probably be more terrible and disastrous than any which have yet occurred.

When it is considered that the emigration of the present year includes great numbers recently engaged in open hostilities, and that, besides these, there are probably many others who cherish unfriendly feelings, though never manifested in overt acts, is it unreasonable to suppose that they will seize the first favorable opportunity to gratify the strongest of savage passions, and to re-enact the scenes which have been so recently exhibited in the South? From them, and from the events yet passing before us, we may learn how much of individual suffering and of national calamity may be occasioned by even a small Indian force, organized by stealth, and acting with characteristic quickness and ferocity. If those events shall only teach us to provide, by wise forecast, against the repetition of similar disasters, they will not have been without their use. It is to guard against the recurrence of any such event, as well as to fulfil our plighted faith to the tribes now settled in the West, that I have felt it my duty to enforce, at such length, the views presented by the Commissioner.

VI. PENSIONS, &c.

The sums paid to pension agents for disbursements during the current year, amount to two millions six hundred and ninety-nine thousand four hundred and thirty dollars and sixty-six cents, viz:

For paying invalid pensioners	$276,450 00
For paying revolutionary pensioners, under the act of March 18, 1818	675,112 66
For paying pensioners, under the act of June 7, 1832, including payments made in 135 cases, allowed under the act of July 4, 1836	1,563,376 00
For paying pensioners, under the act of May 15, 1828	137,320 00
For paying claims, under the act of July 5, 1832, granting half pay to the officers of the Virginia State troops	47,172 00
	$2,699,430 66

The particulars of which will appear by the report of the Commissioner of Pensions and the accompanying tables.

Under the act of the 4th of July last, granting half pay to widows and orphans in certain cases, four hundred and thirty-six claims have been presented, of which one hundred and thirty-five have been admitted and twenty-two rejected. The remainder have not yet received official decision. The payments already made under this act have been from the standing appropriation made by the act of June 7, 1832; but it would seem to be more appropriate that they should be specially provided for, and an estimate for that purpose will accordingly be submitted.

It is observed by General Macomb, and also by the Commissioner of Pensions, in their reports, that the existing pension laws do not extend to the widows and orphans of officers and soldiers of the regular army all the benefits now enjoyed by the widows of officers and soldiers in other branches of the service. This arises from the circumstance that the first section of the act of the 4th of July last is expressly confined to the widows and orphans of persons who served as militia or volunteers. I concur in the suggestion that this difference ought to be removed. The third section of this law has been construed to apply to those widows only whose husbands died before its passage. As this construction, though demanded by the words employed, makes a distinction in the operation of the law which may not have been designed, it is, perhaps, worthy of being submitted to the attention of Congress.

It appears from the accompanying report of the operations of the Bounty Land Office, that eight hundred and seventy six claims for services rendered in the revolutionary war, and six hundred and ninety-two for services rendered during the last war, were presented during the year ending on the 30th of September last; and that of the former, 40, and of the latter and similar claims previously presented and suspended, 128 were allowed.

VII. FISCAL CONCERNS OF THE DEPARTMENT.

To exhibit, at one view, a summary of the various fiscal operations of this Department during the year 1836, I have caused to be prepared the tabular statement, marked A, hereunto annexed, to which I beg leave respectfully to refer.

It appears from that document, that, on the 1st day of January, 1836, the various sums then under the control of the Department, as unexpended balances of former appropriations, or by virtue of the standing appropriations made by the revolutionary-pension and claims acts of May 15, 1828, June 7, 1832, and July 5, 1832, and the acts of April 23, 1808, and April 29, 1816, for arming and equipping the militia, amounted, in the aggregate, to $5,675,746 12.

The estimates made by this Department for the service of 1836, and transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, and by him laid before Congress at the commencement of the last session, amounted to $8,393,282 49; making when added to the above sum of $5,675,746 12, an aggregate of $14,069,028 61, which was all then supposed by the Department to be required for the service of 1836, on account of the objects then authorized by law. But, in consequence of the military operations which became necessary during the session, the conclusion of the treaty with the Cherokees and other Indian tribes, and the various increased or new expenditures directed by Congress, there was appropriated at the last session, for the service of this Department, an aggregate of $23,242,331 28; being an excess of appropriations over the estimates of $14,840,048 79; and making, when added to the unexpended balances and standing appropriations above mentioned, the sum of $28,918,077 40, applicable to the service of 1836, and liable to be drawn out of the Treasury during the year, if needed, for disbursement; although it was doubtless known, when the appropriations were made, that in many cases only portions thereof would be so needed during the year.

During the first three quarters of the year 1836, there was drawn from the Treasury, and placed in the hands of disbursing officers, the aggregate amount of $13,514,456 27; the expenditure of which, so far as the accounts have been rendered and settled, will appear by the reports of the several bureaus and of the accounting officers, hereunto annexed.

It is estimated that the expenditures which will be made during the fourth quarter of 1836 will amount to $6,807,626 92. In this sum is included all that remained, at the end of the third quarter, of the different appropriations, amounting to $5,000,000, made during the last session for the suppression or prevention of Indian hostilities. Indeed, those appropriations have already been expended, or drawn from the Treasury and placed in the hands of disbursing officers for expenditure.

Should the expenditures of the fourth quarter of 1836 conform to the preceding estimate, the expenditures of the year will have amounted to $20,322,083 19; and the unexpended balance which will remain in the Treasury on the 31st day of December, 1836, applicable to the service of 1837, will be $8,595,994 21; but under the standing appropriations for pensions, &c., and for arming the militia, above mentioned, there will also be under the control of the Department, for the year 1837, so much as may be required for those objects.

The aggregate of the estimates made by this Department, for the service of the year 1837, and transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, to be included in his general estimate to be laid before Congress, is $10,758,431 33; which, if confirmed by the requisite appropriations, will make, when added to the balance of $8,595,994 21, estimated to remain in the Treasury on the 31st day of December, 1836, an aggregate of $19,354,425 54, applicable to the service of 1837; besides the amount which may be required from the standing appropriations above mentioned.

The various bureaus and offices of the Department to which the sums making the above-mentioned aggregates are respectively referrible, will appear by the table annexed, marked A; and the details of each aggregate, except those of the estimates, will appear in the documents from those bureaus and from the accounting officers accompanying this report. The details of the estimates for 1837 are included in the statement transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, as above mentioned.

The estimates for the year 1837 include only those objects which are authorized by existing laws. The estimates for the Engineer office, the Topographical bureau, and the Ordnance department, embrace, in accordance with the usual course of legislation, various amounts which, when added to the present unexpended balances, will constitute, in the case of each of those bureaus, an aggregate amount much larger, in all probability, than can be actually expended in the year 1837.

On the other hand, the estimates above mentioned include nothing for the suppression of Indian hostilities, nor for new works, or any other objects not already authorized by law.

A further appropriation is immediately needed for the suppression and prevention of Indian hostilities, including the maintenance of the volunteers on the Southwestern frontier. The subject does not admit of specific estimates; but there is danger that at least $1,000,000 will be required for this purpose.

In concluding, I desire to express my obligations to the experienced and able heads of the several branches of the Department, for the aid they have given me in the preparation of this report. Having very recently undertaken the temporary care of the Department, and many of its affairs being very foreign to my ordinary studies and pursuits, I have had, in this matter as well as in others, constant occasion for their assistance. They cannot be held responsible for all the suggestions contained in this paper; but from me, at least, are justly entitled to this tribute.

I have the honor to be, sir, with high respect, your obedient servant,

B. F. BUTLER,

Secretary of War ad interim.

To the PRESIDENT of the United States.

REPORT OF THE MAJOR GENERAL.

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
Washington, November, 1836.

Sir: In compliance with the instructions of the acting Secretary of War, under date of the 9th of September last, I have the honor, herewith, to submit the following statements and returns:

1. A report showing the organization of the army, marked A.
2. A general return of the army, marked B.
3. Distribution of the troops in the Eastern department, marked C.
4. Distribution of the troops in the Western department, marked D.
5. Statement showing the number of recruits enlisted in the army from the 1st of January, 1836, marked E.

Since my last annual report giving an account of the operations of the army, the troops have been variously engaged.

In consequence of the indisposition of the Seminole Indians to comply with the treaty stipulations entered into with the Government, in regard to their emigrating to the country west of the Mississippi allotted to them, and the hostile attitude taken by some of their principal chiefs, three companies of artillery were ordered, on the 24th of November, 1834, to Tampa bay; and the company at St. Augustine was at the same time ordered to Fort King, then garrisoned by a company of infantry. The same order placed brevet Brigadier General Clinch in command of the troops in Florida. On the 14th of February, 1835, five additional companies of artillery were ordered to join the command of General Clinch, in Florida, making the whole force in Florida ten companies. On the 22d of October, 1835, General Clinch was authorized to order the two companies of artillery from Forts Wood and Pike, Louisiana, to Florida; these, with the two companies placed at his disposal on the 15th of October, would increase his command to 14 companies. On the 9th December, 1835, General Clinch was informed that the Governor of Florida had been requested to place at his disposal such militia force as he might require. It appears that, on the 30th November, 1835, the regular force in Florida consisted of 11 companies, amounting to 536 officers and men, and posted as follows:

St. Augustine, 1 company; Fort King, 6 companies; Fort Brooke, 3 companies; and Key West, 1 company.

The four companies placed at the disposal of General Clinch in October, arrived at Fort Brooke between the 27th of November and 28th of December.

On the 23d December, a detachment of 110 men, including officers, took up the march from Tampa bay for Fort King, to join General Clinch. On the fifth day, on the march, the detachment was attacked by a large body of Indians, concealed, and cut off, with the exception of one or two men.

On the 29th December, General Clinch, with six companies of regular troops, amounting to about 200 men, proceeded from Fort King towards the Withlacoochee, to attack the Seminoles, who were in force on the left bank of that river. In this expedition he was joined by Governor Call, with between 400 and 500 volunteers of Florida.

On the 31st December, General Clinch, with the regular troops under his command, crossed the Withlacoochee. He was here attacked by a large body of Indians, and, after a spirited engagement, the Indians were finally defeated and fled into the hammocks. In this affair, it will appear that the regular troops bore the brunt of the action: out of the 200 regular troops who crossed the river with General Clinch, 57 were killed or wounded, including four officers. Of the 400 or 500 volunteers who had joined General Clinch with a view of aiding in subduing the Indians, only 27 men and 3 officers took part in the action. Why so many remained out of the action is not explained. Had the same zeal and bravery been displayed by the whole force as was evinced by the regular troops, there is little doubt but that the war would have been terminated with the battle of Withlacoochee.

As soon as information of this affair reached the War Department, it was determined, lest the communication with General Clinch might be interrupted, to call on the Governor of South Carolina to place at the disposal of General Eustis, commanding officer at Charleston, such a force as he might call for, which was accordingly done, and this officer was directed to proceed with that force, together with the United States troops stationed at Charleston and Savannah, to St. Augustine, thence to open a communication with General Clinch, and co-operate with him.

About this time it was intimated to the War Department that there was reason to apprehend that parties of the Creek Indians might join the Seminoles. In consequence of this intimation, and from the belief that the operations might become more extended, Major General Scott was ordered, on the 21st January, to proceed to the theatre of hostilities, and there assume the command. He was invested with authority to call on the Executives of Florida and the adjoining States for such militia force as he might deem necessary; at the same time, six companies of artillery and 100 dragoon recruits, all from the seaboard, were ordered to Florida. It was estimated that the whole number of regular troops in Florida and on their way at that time amounted to 1,200, including officers.

While General Scott was making his preparations for the campaign, General Gaines, who was at Pensacola, hearing of the hostile conduct of the Seminoles, and of the attack made by them on the detachment which marched from Tampa bay on the 23d of December, immediately proceeded to New Orleans, and there, with the assistance of the Governor of Louisiana and the citizens of that place, raised a corps of volunteers of about 1,000 men, and with the detachment of the regular troops in that vicinity, proceeded to Tampa bay, and thence marched to Fort King, and from Fort King to the Withlacoochee, near to the battle-ground of General Clinch, where he encountered the Indians. Finding his provisions and ammunition nearly consumed, he formed a camp, protected by fallen timber, and sent a despatch to General Clinch, at Fort Drane, for supplies. In this situation, he was relieved by the arrival of General Clinch with provisions, when the whole force moved to Fort Drane, when General Gaines, in consequence of previous orders received by him to repair to the frontier of Louisiana, turned his command over to General Clinch, and left Florida. About this time General Scott reached Fort Drane, for the purpose of prosecuting the war according to his plan of operations.

With a considerable force of regular troops and volunteers he marched into the Indian country, in three divisions, one conducted by General Clinch, from Fort Drane, one by General Eustis, from Volusia, and another by Colonel Lindsey, from Tampa bay, concentrating on a point near the Withlacoochee, where the Indians were believed to be imbedded. After a fruitless search for the enemy, the three divisions finally concentrated at Tampa bay, where finding the term of service of the volunteers had nearly expired, and the season near at hand when, in the opinion of General Scott, it would, on account of the insalubrity of the climate, be unsafe longer to keep the field, he determined to return with his troops through the Indian country bordering on the Withlacoochee, still with a hope of finding the Indians and bringing them to battle. But again failing to do so, General Scott ordered the volunteers to be discharged, and distributed the regulars in positions proper to cover the frontier, and at the same time to give repose to them after the fatigues and sufferings of long and painful marches. General Scott returned to St. Augustine, and there learning that hostilities had broken out among the Creek Indians in Georgia and Alabama, left Florida about the 21st of May, and repaired, according to orders previously received by him from the War Department, to Columbus, in Georgia. Not knowing whether General Scott, in consequence of his ill health as reported by him, would be able to take the direction of affairs in the Creek country, brevet Major General Jesup was in the month of May invested with the command, and charged with the removal of the Creeks to the lands allotted them beyond the Mississippi. In order to enable him to carry into effect his instructions, authority was given him to call out a suitable volunteer force from the adjoining States and Territory, all the remaining troops on the seacoast, including the marine corps, were placed at his disposal, making a force in regular troops of about 1,500 men, and of volunteers 9,000. Generals Scott and Jesup met at Columbus, and there concerted and arranged the plan of operations. It being determined by the Executive to leave the direction of the Creek affairs in the hands of General Jesup, General Scott was, on the 28th day of June last, recalled, when he resumed the command of the Eastern department. General Jesup, having a competent force, caused the hostile Creeks to submit; and having fulfilled the object of his appointment, he discharged all the volunteers except the Tennessee brigade, amounting to about 1,500 mounted men, and the regular troops, which he retained for prosecuting the war against the Seminoles, under Governor Call, of Florida, who had been invested with the command of the troops in Florida, and charged with the conduct of the war in that quarter.

Whilst preparations were making for entering Florida with additional troops, several handsome affairs took place between the regulars and the Indians, in all of which the regular force was successful against superior numbers, especially at Micanopy and Fort Drane.

General Jesup was directed to assume the command in Florida as soon as he could accomplish his arrangements for sending off the Creeks to the westward; but his instructions, by some accident, did not reach him. He, however, met Governor Call at Tallahassee in the month of September, when the Governor offered to resign to him the command; but as the Governor had made his arrangements for the campaign, General Jesup declined taking the command, but entered into the views of Governor Call, and consented to act with a body of troops in aid thereof.

On the 19th day of September, Governor Call, with the Tennessee mounted volunteers, and about one hundred and forty Florida militia, marched to Suwannee Old Town, with ten days' rations. He was met at Fort Drane by brevet Lieutenant Colonel Pierce, of the regular army, with a supply of provisions for about seven days more, and 160 men of the regular army, who had been stationed at Garey's ferry. On the receipt of this supply, Governor Call made a forward movement to the Withlacoochee, when his advanced parties skirmished with the Indians, but owing to the rise of the waters of that river, it having overflowed its banks, the troops were unable to ford it.

Governor Call finding his supplies of provisions short, and having no depots established in the country, he was obliged to retire upon Fort Drane with his whole force. The regular troops, and the friendly Indians under Captain Lane, who afterwards joined him, he retained in that position, and sent the Tennessee brigade to Garey's ferry, until he could establish his depots of provisions more in advance, and resume offensive operations.

While Governor Call was on his march to the Withlacoochee, General Jesup was using his endeavors to send the regular troops, marines, and the regiment of friendly Creeks above mentioned, to Tampa bay; but, owing to the fall of the water in the Appalachian, the transports could not navigate that river without great difficulty and a considerable loss of time. The friendly Indians under Captain Lane, however, with a small detachment of regular troops, reached Tampa about the 5th of October, and proceeded towards the main body under Governor Call, and having passed through the Seminole country, joined that officer at Fort Drane. General Jesup had been in the mean time to Tampa, but finding there but few supplies and no means of transport, returned to St. Mark's and ordered from New Orleans the necessary supplies and equipage, and by our last advices is using his endeavors to get on the remaining troops, consisting of the marine corps and detachments of the regular army.

The troops on the Northwestern frontier have been in motion from the Mississippi to the lakes, within the Wisconsin Territory, with a view of producing some effect on the Winnebago and other tribes of Indians in that quarter, said to be disposed to be mischievous, but have resumed their respective stations. These movements had the desired effect.

In the month of January Major General Gaines was ordered to the western frontier of Louisiana, to assume the personal command of all the troops of the United States employed in any part of the region adjoining the Mexican boundary, and in February, the 6th regiment of infantry was ordered from Jefferson barracks to Fort Jesup, a post within 25 miles of the Sabine, with a view of protecting the frontier from the incursions of the Indians, and at the same time to keep peace among the Indian tribes themselves, which inhabit the adjoining country.

Instructions were also given to General Gaines to fulfil the treaty stipulations entered into between Mexico and the United States in reference to the Indians on the Western frontier, whether belonging to the territory of the United States or Mexico, and especially to maintain a strict neutrality in regard to the contending parties in Texas.

From information received by General Gaines that the Indians meditated hostilities, he conceived it his duty to call on the Executives of Louisiana, Mississippi, Tennessee, and Alabama, for a force consisting of three brigades and one battalion, to aid him in maintaining peace on the frontiers, and repelling any attack from the Indians. Shortly after, finding that he had been deceived in reference to the intentions of the Indians, he recalled his requisition for militia on the States above mentioned, before they could be imbodyed.

At a subsequent period, General Gaines becoming convinced that the necessity of a military force on the frontier did actually exist, repeated his requisition for militia, which proceeding being disapproved by the President, they did not march to the frontiers. The General, however, as a precautionary measure, ordered the squadron of United States dragoons, and six companies of the 7th regiment of infantry stationed at Fort Gibson, to march to Fort Towson, on the Red river, where they arrived about the 17th of May, and finally pushed these corps in advance, as far as Nacogdoches, where they still were at the last reports from that place, dated in September. A camp was also formed on the left bank of the Sabine.

From the reports received from the commanding officer of Nacogdoches, he is of opinion that there is no necessity for the continuance of the force at that place; and from the views taken of the state of affairs on the Mexican frontier by the general-officer who has succeeded General Gaines in the immediate command in that quarter, and the instructions he has received, the belief is entertained that, by this time, the United States troops at Nacogdoches have been withdrawn and returned to their respective stations within our border.

By instructions from the War Department, brevet Brigadier General Wool was directed to proceed to the Cherokee country, with a view of settling the difficulties and allaying the excitements which prevailed among different parties of that tribe, lest they should eventually lead to open rupture. A competent force of volunteers was placed at the disposal of General Wool to check any irregularities, and to maintain order. General Wool is still on that duty, but with a very limited force, having brought matters to such a state as not to require more at present.

Early in the season, Inspector General Wool made a tour along the coast, and inspected the troops and arsenals, and reported favorably of their condition; but having been ordered to the Cherokee country to take charge of affairs there, as well as the command of a portion of the volunteers called into the service of the United States, his inspections have in consequence been limited. Inspector General Croghan is now on a tour of inspection up the Mississippi, and along the Western frontier; no report has, as yet, been received from him.

I feel it my duty to report to the War Department the insufficiency of the present military establishment for the purpose of protecting the frontiers, and garrisoning the forts on the seacoast, and of performing the many and arduous duties required of the troops. It was proposed at the last session of Congress to increase the army by augmenting the rank and file, so as to make the whole number ten thousand men; and, at the instance of the Secretary of War, I submitted a project for that purpose, dated the 7th of March, 1836, which was communicated to Congress by him on the following day, and to which I beg leave to refer.

The regiments of artillery and infantry have, since the late war with Great Britain, been placed on the lowest possible establishment as to rank and file, consistent with a regard to the preservation of military knowledge and discipline among them; but for operations in the face of an enemy, the rank and file were reduced too low for any efficient service, a company of artillery having, when full, only forty-eight rank and file, and that of the infantry forty-six. Taking into consideration the short period of enlistment, which is now three years; the fatigue and exposure of the troops when in the field, which is for the most part in wilderness countries, where there are to be had no other comforts than those they carry with them; the diseases to which they are subjected by constant exposure, especially in insalubrious climates, without reckoning the casualties of war, it is not to be expected that any company will be able, one month after taking the field, to present, under arms, more than two-thirds of its original number; for, independently of the casualties just alluded to, the soldiers of the regular army are obliged to become the drivers of the trains of artillery, of provisions, and of other supplies, as well as the laborers on all occasions where labor for the service is required, as no troops for these special duties are provided by law in the American army as are in other services; and experience has proved, wherever militia and volunteers have been called into the service, that these duties have devolved on the regular troops. I would then recommend, in order to render the army efficient and capable of performing all the duties required of it, as well as on the score of economy, that every company of artillery and infantry be augmented to one hundred rank and file, so that there may always be in each regiment for duty, with arms, a respectable force.

I would also respectfully submit to your consideration the propriety of increasing the number of officers in the Engineer department, including the topographical engineers, in the Ordnance department, and in the Quartermaster's department. The duties required of these several staff departments have been so extensive and multifarious that they have not been able to perform them without the aid of a great number of officers from the line of the army, and consequently has measurably diminished the efficiency of the regiments from which these officers have been withdrawn. It would be better, in my opinion, to provide at once a sufficient number of officers for the several branches of the service, and to organize them into distinct corps or departments, so that, being constantly employed on one duty, they will be better acquainted with that duty, and more competent to perform it. The chiefs of the several branches of the staff will, in their reports, indicate what is required to render their respective branches of the service most efficient.

In closing this report, I beg leave to draw your attention to the fact that there is no provision made by law for the widows and orphans of the officers of the regular army who may die in consequence of wounds or diseases contracted by exposure in the service; while there is a provision of that nature for all other descriptions of troops, whether militia, rangers, sea-fencibles, or volunteers, as will appear by the act of the 4th July, 1836. There are the widows and orphans of several meritorious officers and soldiers to whom the extension of the provisions of that law would be a great relief, and I trust that you will see the justice of urging on Congress the application of that law to the members of the regular army.

Documents accompanying the President's Message.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

ALEXANDER MACOMB,
Major General, commanding in chief.

To the Hon. B. F. BUTLER,
Secretary of War ad interim.

LETTER OF THE ADJUTANT GENERAL.

ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, November 26, 1836.

SIR: The importance of the subject, I trust, will justify me in respectfully requesting your attention to the correspondence of your predecessor, Mr. Cass, with Mr. Preston and Mr. Goldsborough, of the Senate, and members of the Committee on Military Affairs, relative to the proposed augmentation of the General Staff, when the new bill for increasing the army was under revision in June last. The correspondence referred to, and the incipient measures then taken by the Secretary of War, will be found on the records of the War office. As the time and occasion for a recurrence to this subject appear to be proper, it may be also useful now briefly to advert to former organizations of the general staff of the army; since a retrospect to the well-adjusted systems, under obsolete laws, may serve to show the importance of the Adjutant General's department of the staff at former periods of the service, and now aid in forming a more just estimate of its usefulness and relative value.

After various modifications of the general staff pending the declaration of and during the late war with Great Britain, the act of March 3, 1813, provided for one adjutant and one inspector general of the army, with the rank of brigadier general, and eight adjutants general of division, each with the rank of colonel of cavalry. The duties of a division adjutant general were limited to the particular division in which he served, while those of the adjutant and inspector general extended to the entire army; being then, as the adjutant general now is, stationed in the War office, and then an indispensable functionary of that department of the Executive Government. The Inspector's department consisted of eight inspectors general, each with the rank of colonel of infantry, and sixteen assistants, with the rank of major. (See organization No. 1 of the table.)

At the close of the war, in 1815, nearly the entire staff of the army was abolished; but such were the requirements of the public service, that President Madison provisionally retained such branches of the staff as were deemed to be indispensably necessary for the service. Of this provisional staff, so retained, were the adjutant and inspector general of the army, and two adjutants general of division, each of whom was assigned to one moiety of the army for duty with the troops, under the orders of the respective commanding generals, while the principal staff officer, with the rank of brigadier, continued to discharge his important functions in the War office. The act of April 24, 1816, confirmed the provisional arrangement of the President; and the staff, retained in virtue of his authority, was now incorporated in the permanent peace establishment. (See organization No. 2 of the table.) This organization of the staff, under the confirmatory act of 1816, was still less perfect than it should have been; and, among other improvements, as seen by the act of the 14th of April, 1818, it was further completed by the addition of another important officer, that of quartermaster general of the army, with the rank of brigadier; and, like the adjutant and inspector general of the army, he was also assigned to duty in the War office. (See organization No. 3 of the table.)

This efficient and harmonious system, which the experience of the war with Great Britain, and six years' subsequent peace, had tested and matured, continued in successful operation until the reduction of the army in 1821, when the whole structure was greatly disturbed and impaired.

The department of orders and military correspondence, of inspection, instruction, &c., was reduced, dismembered, and nearly broken up. The incumbents were all disbanded, namely, the adjutant and inspector general of the army, the two adjutants general of division, and their four assistants; and, in lieu of these, one adjutant general was retained, on whom devolved all the duties of the central office of orders and military correspondence in the War Department, with the reduced rank of colonel, being the precise grade of the staff officer which had been deemed, formerly, to be no more than requisite for a single division of the army.* The only staff officers of the adjutant and inspector general's department retained for habitual duties with the troops in the field, or in garrison, were the division inspectors general, whose services generally alternate between the Eastern and Western departments, a geographical arrangement analogous to the previous North and South divisions of the army. The four assistant inspectors were also disbanded under the act.

It cannot be doubted that the public service has suffered, and continues to suffer, for want of an adequate staff for service in the field, and habitual duty with the troops. This has been demonstrated in our recent military operations; and the lamentable deficiency, both in number and of the proper description of staff officers at every point where troops, whether regular or militia, have been concentrated, or been put in motion, is too palpable, and ought not to be doubted by any whose duty it may be to know the wants and understand the true condition of the army. The military operations under Generals Gaines, Scott, Jesup, Clinch, Eustis, &c., and various official reports, show the destitute state of the service as to the inadequacy of the adjutant general's, inspector's, and quartermaster's departments of the staff in the field. Like the diseases of the human body, which baffle the skill of the ablest physician when concealed by the timid patient, so, if the wants of the army be kept out of view, or remedial measures be unessayed, then the evils so long felt, and now much complained of, by officers of experience and known devotion to the public weal, can never be cured. In order, therefore, to illustrate this subject, and with the view to spread some facts before you, I beg leave to make the following extracts from my communication to the Secretary of War dated the 26th of June, 1836: "While at St. Augustine, in command of the army in Florida, Major General Scott was without a single officer for duty in his personal staff, no one to act as adjutant general, or even to perform the duty of aid-de-camp. And, more recently, on changing the scene of his operations to the Creek nation, that general has been compelled, from the necessity of the case, to seize upon that excellent officer, Paymaster Edmund Kirby, (who is always ready and ever amongst the first for active service with the troops,) and assign him to the performance of duty in almost every branch of the staff. He is, at the same time, his adjutant general, his inspector general, his aid-de-camp, and has performed duty as quartermaster and commissary, has mustered in and out of service, and paid the militia; all this, when the execution of his appropriate duties, assigned him by the Paymaster General, required his presence elsewhere."† "In another point of the frontier, the Southwest, Major General Gaines, in his communication to the Secretary of War, dated Camp Sabine, 20th of April, writes: 'At this moment I know not an officer or soldier sufficiently acquainted with the topography of this whole line of frontier, to be able to conduct a single day's movement upon it, without the risk of suffering severely from an enemy better acquainted with the country.” “The same distinguished general, in another communication to the Secretary of War, dated the 10th of May, states: ‘I avail myself of the occasion to request that legal provision may be recommended by the President, which will enable me to have an assistant adjutant general and an assistant inspector general permanently attached to my staff, by which means I should have, in the appropriate way, the services of my aid-de-camp, and be thereby relieved of much of the sedentary labor of copying, and of many other duties such as usually, in all respectable armies, devolve upon aids-de-camp, but which have long occupied much of my time.’”

In his communication to the adjutant general of the 17th of October, 1835, being then in command of all the troops serving in Florida, brevet Brigadier General Clinch states that “It is now nearly twelve months since I was placed in command of the troops in Florida, during which time I have had no staff, not even a private with me, whose services I could claim, except as a matter of courtesy. A colonel commanding a regiment has his regimental staff, to aid him in the discharge of his duties; I, however, whilst assigned by the general-in-chief to an arduous and important command, have not even a confidential private to copy my letters and orders.”

And in his letter of the 16th of May, from St. Augustine, brevet Brigadier General Eustis writes that, “Major General Scott being still indisposed, and having no staff officer with him, has directed me to address this to you.”

The like destitution of the service is seen at other points; and the consequences are now injuriously felt by brevet Brigadier General Arbuckle, on whom has devolved the highly responsible command of the Southwestern army, and the general direction of affairs on the frontiers of Louisiana and Arkansas. And that officer has neither assistant adjutant general nor inspector; even an aid-de camp, it is said, is not allowed him by law.

To the testimony of the experienced officers above mentioned I must now add that of my own, relative to the central office of the adjutant general of the army, pertaining to the War office, and as established at the seat of Government. And I deem it useful to remark that, for want of the proper denomination of officers of the Adjutant and Inspector General's department in the field—officers who from habit and experience are conversant and familiar with the practical duties of this branch of service—no monthly return of all the forces serving in the Creek nation, or in Florida, has been received from any commanding general of either army; and the War office is now destitute of these important returns, which are not only now necessary for present use, but are also required for the archives of the Department.

To supply these obvious wants of the service in the department of orders and military correspondence, to ensure better accountability with reference to the personnel of the army, and of the militia when in the service of the United States, the rendition of exact returns and reports enjoined by the articles of war and general regulations, and of musters and inspections of the troops, militia as well as regulars, I respectfully submit for your consideration the expediency of requesting legal provision for the appointment of eight assistant adjutants general, four of whom to be of the brevet rank of major, and four of the brevet rank of captain of cavalry, each with the pay and emoluments of their respective cavalry grades; provided that they shall also perform the duties of assistant inspectors general, when the exigencies of the service may require. Even in a state of peace and perfect tranquillity at every point of our widely-extended Western frontier, yet ever liable as these are to be disturbed, the public interest now, and at all times, requires the habitual services of not less than five or six of the class of staff officers herein proposed to be provided for.

Of this class, two should always be on duty with the commanding general of the Western department; one, but preferably two, should serve under the orders of the general commanding the Eastern department; and the presence of one, if not two, with the officer, of whatever rank he may be, charged with the immediate command and conduct of affairs on the Southwestern and Western frontiers, is indispensably necessary. To ensure exact uniformity and regularity of official action in the central office of orders, military correspondence, and of the initiatory duties relative to “military commissions” in the War Department, it is also necessary that one assistant adjutant general, but preferably two, should be assigned to duty there, in lieu of the two officers which the necessities of the case, now, and for several years past, require to be taken from their regiments for duty as acting assistants to the adjutant general of the army.

As the number of officers of the line is fully adequate, in my humble opinion, to furnish the offices necessary to fill appointments in the staff which may be clothed with rank in the army, I respectfully recommend that the provisions of the 4th section of the “act for the better organization of the general staff of the army,” approved March 3d, 1813, be made applicable by law to the assistant adjutants general, should authority for their appointment be granted by Congress.* A recurrence to this salutary practice, adopted in time of war, and continued until very recently, will not only best subserve the public interest in every military point of view whatever, but, widening the field by guarantying promotion in the line, would thereby enable the Executive to make the best selections for all subordinate staff appointments. For, it should not be doubted, if subordinate appointments in the staff be only granted at the price of the regimental commission, the most competent, active, and aspiring young officer, who regards the army as his profession, and who looks forward to the chances of better advancement and higher rank in the line than can be opened to him by any staff organization, would reject unhesitatingly the boon at such a sacrifice. This is no fiction, for the records show that the case has occurred. Again, if economy is to be at all regarded, (and it may perhaps be the least considered in any question of the public good,) the additional annual expense of the assistant adjutants general, if taken from the line, would only be $7,524, being the difference of pay between the grades in the line and the staff, supposing the eight staff officers herein proposed to be taken equally from the captains and subalterns. If these eight staff appointments be not based upon commissions in the line, then the requisite annual appropriation would be $15,100.

In affirming that the number of officers of the line is adequate to the supply of staff appointments which may confer rank in the army, the opinion should be qualified with the proviso that the employment of the officers of the line away from their regiments and companies should be restricted to the military staff of the army proper, and that the practice of assigning them to any description of business not congenial to the spirit and character of military duty proper be discontinued. I may here appropriately remark that, to the long separation† of so many officers from the troops, and their consequent estrangement from all military duty by reason of their more civil vocations, which gradually but surely allure them to other pursuits, in the reasonable hope of better fortune than can await them in the army, should they return to it, may probably be ascribed as one of the causes of many of the resignations tendered during the present year. Of the number of officers absent in the interior whose civil pursuits may have been interrupted, had they joined their regiments on the frontiers when required to do so by recent orders, many resignations were tendered almost immediately on receiving the order, and others were forwarded almost immediately after complying with its first mandate.

† There are instances of officers being separated from their companies for ten, twelve, and even fifteen years, and there are also instances of officers holding commissions in the army for several years who resigned without ever having joined or performed any military duty with the army.

The right of an officer to quit the army, under ordinary circumstances, with a view to the improvement of his fortune and prospects in life, may not be doubted; but the policy of our system (now beginning to be corrected by "general order" 69, of October 15) which separates him for years from the line of his profession, and employs him on business which teaches him so to rate the value of his commission as often to throw it up, when remanded to his regiment under any requirement of the public service, must be admitted to be greatly at variance with the true interest and primary object for which it is presumed that the army was created and destined to subserve. And if this system of indiscriminate and onerous detail of so many officers for business, which estranges them from the line of their professional duties, be continued, the army certainly must become less and less efficient for active field service, at any crisis which may arise. In respectfully adding, incidentally, these remarks, I speak as one who looks only to the efficiency of the army, with a view to the fulfilment, in the best manner, of all the high duties which it may be supposed to owe to the republic, as an institution for whose military service it was created, and by which its members have been educated with a view to the national defence.

I respectfully submit, herewith, table A, which may be useful for general reference, as it comprises a relative view of the three branches of the general staff at the several periods of our military history therein specified, to wit: 1st. During the late war, or, according to the act of March 3, 1813; 2d. After the first years of peace, as provided by the act of April 24, 1816; 3d. As altered and increased by the act of April 24, 1818; 4th. As reduced and diminished by the act of March 2, 1821; and, 5th. As provided for by existing laws.

My remarks relative to the proposed increased staff, it will be seen, are, for proper reasons, restricted to the Adjutant General's department, as the wants in other branches have doubtless been communicated by the respective chiefs, who best understand the description and measure of all necessary augmentation.

I am, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,
R. JONES,
Adjutant General of the Army.

The Hon. B. F. BUTLER,
Secretary of War.

REMARKS.

1. All the officers of the Adjutant and Inspectors' General department, during the war and after the peace, inclusive of March 2, 1821, when the peace establishment was reduced, held rank in the army, except the adjutant and inspector general of the army, in virtue of commissions by brevet. 2. Of the sixteen colonels of the staff, of whom eight were adjutants general, and eight inspectors general of division, all, except three, were taken from and held rank in the line of the army, contemporaneously with their commissions and brevet rank in the staff, according to the provision of the fourth section of the "act for the better organization of the general staff of the army," approved March 3, 1813; and the thirty-two assistant adjutants and assistant inspectors general, having the brevet rank of major, were required by the act to retain their regimental commissions.

REPORT OF THE ACTING QUARTERMASTER GENERAL.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, November 22, 1836.

SIR: In compliance with your present order, I have the honor to submit a report of the operations of the Quartermaster's department during the first, second, and third quarters of the present year; and, as heretofore, to make it more complete, the fourth quarter of the last year is included.

By the last annual report, which embraced, in part, the operations of the third quarter of the year 1835, the balance remaining in the hands of disbursing officers, for which accounts had not then been rendered, was $162,126 16

To which is to be added—

1st. Remittances.

In the 4th quarter of 1835	-	$220,729 58
In the 1st quarter of 1836	-	574,296 02
In the 2d quarter of 1836	-	804,375 62
In the 3d quarter of 1836	-	1,452,626 50
		<hr/> 3,052,027 72

2d. The proceeds of the sales of public property become unfit for service or no longer required for public use, and rents received for public grounds and buildings not required for military purposes - 19,778 49

Making the total to be accounted for - 3,071,806 21

Of which the following sums have been accounted for:

1st. By expenditures, viz:

In the 1st, 2d, and 3d quarters of 1835, the accounts for which were received after the date of last annual report	-	$28,650 90
In the 4th quarter of 1835	-	202,141 26
In the 1st quarter of 1836	-	446,694 77
In the 2d quarter of 1836	-	619,615 09
In the 3d quarter of 1836, so far as the accounts have been received	-	692,766 18
		<hr/> 1,989,868 20

2d. By payments into the Treasury, and warrants rendered unavailable by the casualties of service; returned and cancelled - 80,399 30

Making the total accounted for during the fiscal year - 2,070,267 50

And leaving a balance in the hands of disbursing officers, to be hereafter accounted for, of - 1,001,538 71

The outstanding balance is unusually large, but it will be observed that the fiscal operations of the year have exceeded three millions of dollars. It results, in part, from the heavy remittances which were necessarily made towards the close of the third quarter, the employment of irregular agents, and the difficulty of rendering accounts promptly during active operations.

In consequence of the want of officers for active service in the field, most of the public works under the direction of the department at the date of the last report have been necessarily suspended during the present year. But little progress has, therefore, been made with them; nor can they be resumed or prosecuted to advantage, under existing circumstances, with the present limited number of officers at the disposal of the department.

It became necessary, early in the season, when operations had just been commenced, to withdraw from the Delaware breakwater the officers charged with superintending the construction of that important work, and no alternative presented but to seek relief from it altogether. It was, accordingly, with the sanction of your predecessor, transferred to the Engineer department.

The total amount of the various appropriations which had been made for that object, prior to its transfer in June last, is $1,530,000 00

Of which there was expended by the Navy

Department, while the work was under its direction - $10,804 36

And by the Quartermaster's department - 1,454,813 61

Making the total expended - $1,465,617 97

And leaving a balance, subject to the disposal of the Engineer department, of - $64,382 03

The operations on the various roads in Arkansas were suspended in the month of August; the services of the officer charged with their superintendence being required at one of the military stations, in consequence of the collection of troops on the Sabine frontier. Considerable progress, however, had been made with these works prior to their suspension, and it is believed that the balances of the appropriations applicable to them had been nearly expended before the operations ceased. I have not deemed it my duty to estimate for any further appropriations for those roads. They are chiefly in the interior, connecting places of but little importance, and having no relation to military operations, may now, with propriety, it is thought, be committed to the superintending authority of the State.

A detachment of sixty men, detailed from the army, were placed at work in February last, on the road leading from Fort Towson to the northern boundary line of Louisiana. The party was withdrawn in June, in consequence of the approach of the sickly season in that country, but it had passed over eighty-five miles of the road, making the necessary repairs, and rebuilding the bridges over the principal streams. The work was probably resumed early in the present month, and will be prosecuted through the season as rapidly as circumstances will permit.

The road from Fort Howard, at Green bay, to Fort Crawford, at Prairie du Chien, in the Wisconsin Territory, has been in progress by the labor of the troops during the present season, and has probably been completed by this time, as well as the limited appropriation made for that object would authorize. This road, passing as it does by Fort Winnebago, and thus connecting three of our military posts, is deemed of high importance in its relation to the defence of that frontier, and a further appropriation is recommended to give it a more perfect finish, and to keep it in repair.

Appropriations were made at the last session of Congress for continuing the improvement of several rivers in Florida, and there were unexpended balances remaining of former appropriations for various roads there. The active military operations which have been carried on in that Territory during the whole season, have necessarily suspended such of those works as were in progress, and prevented any measures being taken to commence others. Nothing can be done towards those objects until hostilities shall have ceased there, and quiet be restored to the country.

The various appropriations made for other special objects coming under the authority of the department, have been put in a course of application, with the following exceptions, namely: That for the removal of the troops from Fort Gibson; that for barracks at Fort Jesup; and that for a wharf at Fort Wolcott, at Newport, Rhode Island. In reference to the first object, the department awaits the action of higher authority in selecting the new position which is to be occupied, before the arrangements connected with the building operations can be made. The second has been suspended, upon the suggestion that Fort Jesup, being twenty-five miles from the Sabine, is too remote from the frontier, and that a more advanced position would probably be occupied. As the appropriation is specifically for Fort Jesup, legal provision will be necessary to authorize its expenditure elsewhere; and as accommodations are much wanted for the troops on that frontier, I submit the expediency of obtaining authority to apply the appropriation to the erection of barracks and quarters at such place in the vicinity of Fort Jesup as it may be deemed proper to occupy. The wharf at Fort Wolcott has been postponed for want of an officer to attend to its construction.

Charged as I am but temporarily with the direction of the Quartermaster's department, I feel restrained from making many suggestions in relation to it, which would come with more propriety from its chief, now absent on a high and important command; but there are some that I cannot omit consistently with a faithful discharge of the trust confided to me. The necessity for an improved organization of the department is one of them. This has been represented heretofore to your predecessor, and was by him brought before Congress at the last session. It is now my duty to repeat the suggestion, and to urge it with earnestness.

There is, perhaps, no country, considering the relative force, where the duties of the Quartermaster's department are so arduous as they are in our own; especially in conducting our Indian wars. It necessarily results from difference of circumstances. In highly-improved and thickly-settled countries, where the facilities of transportation are great, and the means of supply abundant, there cannot be much difficulty in moving and supporting armies; and, even in our own country, on the Atlantic border, and on the great lines of communication in the West, where those advantages exist, the difficulty is comparatively small. But these are not the scenes of our Indian wars. They lie beyond the frontier; in the swamps and fastnesses of the wilderness, far removed from the sources of supply; and the heavy task of moving and sustaining our armies under these circumstances, belongs to the Quartermaster's department.

Experience had shown that the present organization, both as to number and grades, was barely sufficient to meet the demands of the service ten years ago, when the army was measurably inactive. It is altogether inadequate now to a proper discharge of the heavy and important duties which devolve upon the department under present circumstances, when not merely the regular army, but large masses of volunteers and militia, are called into active service. During the present year there have been four separate armies in the field, mustering from two to ten thousand men each, and operating under circumstances involving great difficulties in regard to transportation and supplies; and, considering our extensive and complicated Indian relations, a similar state of things will, in all probability, too often recur. If it be supposed that the present organization of the department, whose executive officers consist of but four majors, six captains, and fourteen lieutenants, drawn from the line, is equal to such an emergency, it is undoubtedly an error.

Prior to the year 1818, there were division quartermaster generals, with the rank of colonel, who were executive officers, and attended the army in the field when occasions required. In my humble judgment, there has not been a period since the war of 1812, when the necessity for such officers was half so urgent as it is at the present time. There is now no executive officer whose rank is sufficient to give him precedence in his own department in a campaign; and the case has twice occurred recently, where the quartermaster general of a territory, by virtue of his superior rank as colonel, became entitled to the chief direction of the operations of that department of the staff by whose agency the army was to be moved and supported—a duty second only in importance to the chief command. I submit whether it is right that the advantages of twenty years' experience in the details of the department should thus be measurably lost to the service for want of adequate rank to render it available.

By an act of the last session of Congress, ten thousand volunteers were authorized to be received into service, and the duty of moving and supplying these also devolves upon the Quartermaster's department. It must be obvious that, in proportion as an irregular and temporary force is substituted for a regular and permanent one, so is the necessity for an increased regular staff, especially in that department which is to move and supply the army. It will be found the surest, if not the only means of rendering that description of troops efficient, and of enforcing any thing like system and economy in their operations.

I would, therefore, without entering further into the details of the subject at this time, respectfully recommend that at least four officers corresponding with the former division quartermaster generals, and two quartermasters and eight assistant quartermasters, be added to the present organization of the department, the whole to be separated from the line; and also that provision be made for a limited number of forage and wagon masters, whose services are so important at the large depots of forage and in conducting the wagon trains. The expense would not be worth a moment's consideration when compared with the military advantages alone which would result from the improvement; but it would, in fact, be a measure of wise economy.

Another point to which I would ask your attention is the necessity of having the duties of the department prescribed and limited by law. Inadequate as it is, with its present organization, to do justice to its own appropriate duties, it is nevertheless burdened with duties appertaining to other departments of the service, involving much labor and heavy pecuniary responsibility. Among these are the payment of Indian annuities and the purchase of supplies for the department of Indian affairs, amounting, in the present year, to near eight hundred thousand dollars, not included in my report, and which is disbursed at great risk by the officers of the Quartermaster's department, without compensation. This business has no connexion with the military service; and as it frequently requires the officers to quit their stations, and leave their own duties to be performed by agency during their absence, it is clearly incompatible with their primary obligations, and they should, therefore, be relieved from it; but if they must continue to be charged with it, I trust that some compensation will be provided for them. It has already been the subject of complaint, which the following extract of a report from one of the officers engaged in that service will show is not without just grounds: "My Indian account (he observes, under date 11th October) for the last quarter, is over half a million of dollars, a great portion of which has been disbursed under circumstances that involved unusual risk of error and loss. It is unjust, I conceive, to subject officers to the hazard of being ruined or seriously embarrassed, without awarding them any corresponding remuneration." I will only add, in reference to this subject, that, apart from the objections stated, it is worthy of consideration whether the imposition of such heavy extra duties upon a public agent may not affect the validity of the bond given by him for the faithful performance of his own duties, and thus impair the security for the public funds.

A further source of embarrassment to the operations of the department is the liability of its officers to be called upon to make good the deficiencies in other branches of the staff. Beside their subjection to duty in the Subsistence department, which, being of a kindred character to their own, occasions no serious inconvenience, it is provided by law "that, in addition to their duties in the field, they shall, when thereto directed by the Secretary of War, purchase military stores, camp equipage, and other articles requisite for the troops;" and under this authority the officers of the department are frequently required, in active service, to provide large supplies of camp equipage, to purchase medicines and hospital stores, and occasionally arms and ammunition—duties which they are not altogether prepared for by their ordinary pursuits, and which have the injurious effect of diverting to other objects the funds provided to meet the engagements of their own department.

In the distribution of the mass of duties appertaining to the staff of the army, the governing principle, I humbly conceive, should be the greatest subdivision consistent with the preservation of unity and concert of action. From the extent of the extra calls which are made upon the Quartermaster's department, a doubt may well be entertained whether the adjustment of the relative duties of the several departments, which was supposed to constitute the chief merit of the system, has been so fully attained as is desirable. It is at least questionable whether a department whose own duties are arduous, and on the prompt discharge of which so much depends, should be subjected to so wide a range of responsibility for other branches of the staff. But if the necessities of the service shall be deemed to require a continuance of this feature of the system, it forms a strong additional reason for the improved organization which is herein suggested.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

T. CROSS,

Major, acting Quartermaster General.

actually in possession of the disbursing officers of the department, applicable to the expenditures of the fourth quarter of the year.

Of 142 officers disbursing the public money on account of subsistence for the first three quarters of the year, the accounts of eight only were not received at the completion of the statement, three have been rendered since, and the remaining five are those of officers actively engaged in the Indian campaign, which no doubt will be promptly rendered the moment that a relaxation from duty affords the proper opportunity.

The amount due by Lieutenant Allston at the period of his decease, it is believed, is sufficiently secured, and will eventually be paid; so that not a cent will be lost to the Government of the amounts remitted the present year.

The balance to the credit of the appropriation for subsistence, on the 31st of Dec'r, 1835, was	$208,954 85
The amount appropriated for 1836	495,400 00

The amount expended by the disbursing officers of the department, it will be perceived by the statement, is $984,282 44, being an excess of $513,282 82, which sum has been drawn from the various appropriations for suppressing Indian hostilities, which, being exhausted, the balance on account of subsistence will now be held strictly applicable to the purchase of such stores as may be required for all the troops of every description at present mustered into the service of the United States.

Very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

GEO. GIBSON, C. G. S.

Hon. B. F. BUTLER,

Secretary of War ad interim.

REPORT OF THE SURGEON GENERAL.

SURGEON GENERAL'S OFFICE,
December 2, 1836.

SIR: In consequence of the death of the late Surgeon General, by which melancholy event the service has lost one of its most valuable and meritorious officers, it becomes my duty to report the condition of the department over which he presided with so much honor to himself and advantage to the Government.

The amount advanced on account of the Medical department of the army during the first three quarters of the present year, has been eight thousand three hundred dollars; of which sum five thousand and ninety-one dollars and seventy-six cents have been expended, and for which accounts have been rendered and settled; leaving a balance in the hands of the disbursing officers of three thousand two hundred and eight dollars and twenty-four cents, and for which they are accountable.

The amount paid by warrants on the Treasury for claims presented and admitted during the same period, has been twelve thousand five hundred and twenty-four dollars sixty-one and a half cents. During the same period there has also been advanced to Surgeon Thomas G. Mower, the purveyor of medical supplies for the army, on account of Indian hostilities, eight thousand five hundred dollars, of which seven thousand one hundred and ninety-six dollars and one cent have been expended, and for which his accounts have been received and settled.

The annual medical and hospital supplies for the army were all transmitted in due time to the several posts, and received in good order, which, with the other property in charge of the officers of the department, have been fully and satisfactorily accounted for by the returns of the surgeons and assistant surgeons; from which it is also perceived that the hospitals are all well supplied with every article necessary for the comfort of the sick, and of the best quality; and in consequence of the well-arranged system of responsibility which has been adopted and practised in relation to the supply as well as expenditure, the expenses of the department continue about the same as for the last year.

The whole number of cases which have been treated by the medical officers of the department, during the year ending the 30th of September last, has been fourteen thousand three hundred and fifty-six; of which number only one hundred and thirty-nine have died: of these, seventeen died at Fort Gibson, (fourteen in the fourth quarter of 1835,) seven at Fort Towson and vicinity, thirteen at Fort Jesup and vicinity, eight at Camp Sabine and Nacogdoches, five at Fort Mitchell, seventy-five at the different posts and stations in Florida, and fourteen at other posts.

Of the whole number of deaths, three were of yellow fever, twenty-five of remittent fever, two of typhus fever, ten of congestive fever, nine of intemperance, nineteen of consumption, thirteen of dysentery, nineteen of gunshot wounds, seven of gastro-enteritis, and thirty-two from other causes, (twenty of which occurred during the third quarter of the present year, at Camp Call, Suwannee Old Town, Florida, principally from yellow, remittent, and congestive fevers.)

The law requiring an examination by a medical board previous to appointment in the army, has proved of the greatest advantage, by securing that professional knowledge so essentially necessary to enable an officer of the Medical department faithfully to perform the important duties required of him.

Fifty-six applicants who were recommended as qualified for appointment have been authorized since the last annual report to present themselves for examination. Of this number, twenty-one failed to attend; seven, after presenting themselves, withdrew without an examination; and of the remainder, only thirteen were found qualified to receive the commission they had applied for; being less than one-fourth of those who had been authorized to attend.

The nature of the service requires that the examinations should be rigid; not only in relation to the professional requirements of the candidates, but also as to their physical qualifications and moral habits; for every surgeon and assistant surgeon in the army, from the very nature of the service, is at all times subject to be called on to decide in the most important cases, when so far distant from any settlement as to render it impossible for him to obtain any professional advice or assistance, which under similar circumstances in civil life would be resorted to.

I would respectfully call your attention to the present regulations relative to hospital stewards. There are no persons in the service who are so badly paid for their services (which are important and very arduous) as they are. It is essentially necessary they should be honest, intelligent, and sober; and such individuals, who are competent to compound and administer the medicines as prescribed by the surgeon, cannot be obtained for the present compensation. I therefore most respectfully suggest that a steward to an hospital, at a post of more than four companies, be allowed the pay, clothing, and rations of a sergeant of ordnance, and at all other posts the pay, clothing, and rations of the first sergeant of a company. For the propriety and necessity of asking an appropriation for repairing and erecting hospitals at the different military posts, I must refer you to the very full and lucid report of the late Surgeon General on that subject.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
BENJAMIN KING,
Surgeon General ad interim.

Hon. B. F. BUTLER,
Secretary of War ad interim.

REPORT OF THE PAYMASTER GENERAL.

PAYMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington December 1, 1836.

SIR: I have the honor herewith to lay before you a tabular statement showing the sums advanced to the several paymasters of the army from the Treasury, from the 1st day of October, 1835, to the 1st day of October, 1836; to which are added the balances remaining to be accounted for on the 1st of October, 1835; the amount unexpended and forming part of their estimates for the fourth quarter of 1836; the balances to be accounted for, and the periods to which the troops have been paid.

It was not until late in the season that the additional paymasters authorized by the act of last session, except one, entered on duty. This left to the old officers the whole burden of paying the volunteers and militia serving in Florida, Georgia, and Alabama, amounting to three times the number of the regular army. This duty, always a difficult one, has been performed with less delay and inconvenience to the troops than generally attend such payments, and much less than I anticipated, but in doing it the officers of this department have been unavoidably subjected to great hazard, and, I fear, to serious losses. It has been the practice, in previous Indian wars, to have the muster-rolls of the volunteers and militia sent to this place to be examined and approved by the accounting officers, before they were placed in the hands of paymasters. In most cases the pay-rolls were prepared in this office and audited before settlement, and notwithstanding the paymaster was thus relieved from much responsibility, the Secretary of War was authorized to allow a per centage on the amount disbursed to cover losses.

At the commencement of the late and present hostilities, it was considered highly important to hold out inducements to the militia of the adjacent country to volunteer their services, and one of the inducements was prompt payment. This could not be effected if the rolls were to be first examined and the accounts audited at this place: your predecessor, therefore, after maturely considering the subject, determined to suspend so much of the regulation relating to the payment of volunteers and militia as required the rolls to be transmitted to this place and audited before settlement. This removed the safeguard of the officers of the Pay department, and they have since been, and now are, subject to a most hazardous and I fear in some cases ruinous duty, unless some provision is made to cover disallowances in the settlement of their accounts. To form an opinion of the losses to which they are liable, it is necessary to have a knowledge of the circumstances under which the duty is performed. One great difficulty arises from the militia serving under the different organizations given to them by their State laws, and all varying from that prescribed by the laws of the United States that are to govern in the settlement of paymaster's accounts; another difficulty is caused by the irregularity of the service, and the imperfect evidence to establish it; and a third, from the pay-rolls and accounts being necessarily prepared under circumstances calculated to prevent accuracy. The troops are generally discharged by regiments, sometimes brigades, always impatient to return to their homes, and importunate to be paid. The paymaster cannot begin to prepare his accounts until after the discharge takes place; of course he must always perform that duty in a hurry, frequently surrounded by persons conversing with and questioning him. Under such circumstances he has to judge of and pay claims of doubtful character, and to make long and perplexing calculations, without time to re-examine and test their accuracy. If he differs in opinion with the accounting officers in construing the law or applying it, or if he errs in his calculations in favor of the claimant, the latter receives the benefit, and the paymaster loses the amount; if the error is favorable to the Government, the Government receives the benefit, and not the paymaster.

I trust that, on examining the subject, you will think the disbursing officers of this department equitably entitled to such additional compensation for this onerous duty as will cover the losses to which they are liable under a careful performance of it.

It was believed that the references in the appropriation laws of the last session to the act of April 5, 1832, as a guide for the disbursement, gave to the Secretary of War the same power to allow paymasters a per centage, as was exercised under the act referred to; but as the Attorney General entertains doubts of that authority, I respectfully request that you will lay the subject before Congress, with such remarks as you may think necessary and proper.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

N. TOWSON,

Paymaster General.

Hon. B. F. BUTLER,

Secretary of War ad interim.

REPORT OF COMMISSARY GENERAL OF PURCHASES.

COMMISSARY GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Philadelphia, November 1, 1836.

SIR: In obedience to instructions of the War Department, dated on the 14th October, 1836, I have prepared, and have the honor of enclosing, my moneyed estimate for the year 1837, marked A and B, as follows, viz:

A. For clothing, camp equipage, &c., for one year, ending 31st October, 1838,	$206,940 08

I likewise enclose ten statements, numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10, prepared in obedience to your order, viz:

No. 1. Statement of moneys drawn from the Treasury of the United States on account of various appropriations during the first three quarters of the year 1836.

No. 2. Statement of moneys received and disbursed on account of the Purchasing department during the same period.

No. 3. Statement of moneys received and disbursed on account of "appropriation for volunteers and militia," to the 30th September, 1836.

No. 4. Statement of moneys received and disbursed on account of "appropriation for suppressing hostilities of Creek Indians," to the 30th September, 1836.

No. 5. Statement of moneys received and disbursed on account of "appropriation for additional dragoons," &c., to 30th September, 1836.

No. 6. Statement of moneys received and disbursed on account of "appropriation for repressing hostilities of Seminole Indians," during the first three quarters of 1836.

No. 7. Statement of moneys received and disbursed on account of "appropriation for the suppression of Indian hostilities in Florida," per act of April 1, 1836, to September 30, 1836.

No. 8. Statement of the expenditure of the contingent fund of the Commissary General's office, during the first three quarters of the year 1836.

No. 9. Comparative statement of the cost of army clothing during the years 1835, 1836, and 1837.

No. 10. Statement of the cost of clothing, &c., for the United States army during the year 1837.

The above statements will, I hope, be entirely satisfactory.

Since making out the enclosed statements Nos. 1 to 7, I have received the report of the Second Auditor of the Treasury Department, by which I am informed my accounts of the second quarter of 1836 have been acted upon, and the disbursements passed to my credit.

I have deducted $30,000 from the gross amount of the moneyed estimate A, for clothing, &c., that may remain on hand after the issues for this year may have been completed, which is as much as can be deducted with safety.

Whatever balances of the different appropriations remain undrawn will be required to enable me to execute the orders of the War Department, to settle all accounts to the end of the year, and to have clothing made during the approaching winter, so as to be ready for an early spring issue. I have therefore to request the money may be reserved for the operations of this department, as the whole will be required.

The duplicates will be forwarded as soon as they can be prepared.

I have the honor to be, sir, with high respect, your most obedient servant,

C. IRVINE,

Commissary General of Purchases.

Hon. B. F. BUTLER, Secretary of War.

REPORT FROM THE CHIEF ENGINEER.

ENGINEER DEPARTMENT,
November 30, 1836.

Hon. B. F. BUTLER, Secretary of War ad interim:

SIR: In compliance with your instructions, I have the honor to submit the following report relating to the operations of this department during the year ending on the 30th of September, 1836. It is accompanied by four tabular statements, marked A, B, C, and D. The first two relate to its fiscal concerns; the third exhibits the works projected by the Board of Engineers which have not been commenced, with an estimate of their cost; and the fourth shows the respective appropriations referred to this department during the past year, with the name and station of the superintendent of each work.

FORTIFICATIONS.

The appropriation for this branch of service became available in July last. Some time necessarily elapsed in giving instructions to the several officers, and in their making and commencing their plan of operations. The difficulty, at that advanced period of the year, of procuring mechanics and laborers, nearly all of whom had made their engagements for the season, caused a tardy commencement of operations, especially at those works where they had been suspended an entire year for want of funds; and, to the time embraced by the annual report, (30th September,) they had scarcely got into full operation. This is the cause why little progress has been made during the past year; and, so far as the several works are concerned, I shall have little either of interest or importance to report.

Fort Warren, Boston harbor, Massachusetts.—The work performed at this fort, from its commencement, has been chiefly confined to those fronts which are designed to command the main channel and entrance to the harbor. The entire excavations on these fronts will probably be completed this autumn, except those for foundations of walls not commenced, and a small mass of earth on a high level on the coverface, which, to save expense, is left to be transferred to the terrepleins and parapets of the main work after the completion of the casemates. The whole quantity of earth excavated is ninety-nine thousand two hundred and eighty-seven cubic yards.

Although, since the commencement of operations in July, due efforts have been made to collect the requisite force, the masons on the work have not at any time exceeded thirty. They have been employed exclusively on the piers and walls of front No. 1. Six piers for arches of thirty feet span will be completed within the present month. Five other piers are in various stages of progress, and so far advanced that arrangements will be made to commence the arch-work next spring.

Fort Independence, Boston harbor, Massachusetts.—The small balance of former appropriations unexpended on the 30th of September, 1835, was applied, during the last quarter of that year, to the hammering of stone for facing the scarp. At the beginning of the present year, when the work was suspended for want of funds, 3,560 cubic yards had been received, of which 3,044, making 49,839 superficial feet of face, had been hammered, leaving 7,000 superficial feet to be dressed to complete the quantity required for the new scarp. $100,000 were appropriated in July last for rebuilding this fort on the plan recommended by the Board of Engineers and approved by the Executive. Since then a suitable force has been employed in demolishing the old walls and buildings, and clearing away the earth and rubbish along the fronts facing the channels; the curtains and flanks of which are among the parts of the work to be casemated. This will soon be completed, and arrangements made for commencing the masonry next spring and prosecuting it with vigor.

Fort Adams, Narragansett roads, Rhode Island.—In consequence of there being no appropriations for this work for the year 1835, the operations were discontinued from the spring of last year till July of the present year, and were resumed with vigor the moment the current appropriation was granted. The excavations of earth and rock in all the ditches of the fort are finished. A small portion of the excavation of the esplanade, and a considerable part for the parade itself, remain to be executed. Such portions of the stones removed in these excavations as were suitable have been applied to the masonry of the fort. The remainder and all the earth have been used in forming the embankments of some of the fronts. All the excavations for the communication from the fort to the redoubt are executed, and the earth has been applied to the formation of the communication parapets, which are finished. The glacis, terrepleins, and embankments of certain fronts, with their places of arms, and covert-ways, are completed, with the exception of some turfing. The masonry of the several fronts of the fort is well advanced, and in parts completed; some of them have all the arches turned, roofed, leaded, and covered with earth. On others the entire masonry is completed, with the exception of the breast-height walls. All the gun-embrasures (in number 104) and all the carronade-embrasures (in number 67) are built. The two large ovens, many of the cisterns, and fire-places for soldiers' barracks are finished. All the walls of communication from the fort to the redoubt, in length 2,340 feet, are completed, as well as about two-thirds of the walls under water for the permanent wharf. On the exterior faces of the scarp-walls, and for exposed corners, granite of a durable quality, hammered to a rough face, is used. The interior of the walls, and the inner faces, nearly the whole of the piers, and all the foundations, are of grauwacke slate, which occurs abundantly on the public domain, is obtained with good beds and faces, and costs much less than any other stone. Most of the lime used within the year has been burned in kilns on the spot; the quality is superior to any found in market and costs less. A portion of hydraulic lime is now added to all mortar designed for stone masonry; experience having shown that that composed of sand and lime alone, suffers much injury from the frost, however carefully made and applied. The estimate for 1837 is predicated upon the plan of finishing the scarp of the west front and the scarp and piers of the north front; to turn the arches of the north front; to finish the parade-wall; to finish putting on the earthen parapets of the fort; to build the breast-height walls, and to make all possible progress in the masonry of the redoubt.

Fort Schuyler, Throg's neck, East river, New York.—No exertion has been spared, since funds became available for this work, to advance the operations as rapidly as possible; but the demand for mechanics has been so great ever since the opening of the season, and even before it, that not more than 50 masons could ever be collected, whereas 200 were designed to be employed. Operations in consequence have been comparatively limited, and, in addition to other impediments, occasionally embarrassed by strikes for unreasonable prices on the part of those by whom stone was to be supplied. The sea-wall has been carried to its height around the front of the fort, and where it forms the revetment of the right flank of the glacis. A part of the foundation of the counter-scarp wall has been laid and the culvert finished. The graduation of the site has been commenced, and will be sufficiently advanced to begin the foundations of the walls of the main work so soon as the masons can be spared from the sea-wall, or others engaged to commence them.

Fort Columbus and Castle William, Governor's Island, New York.—It is anticipated that the repairs of these works will be completed the present working season. The masonry of Fort Columbus is now finished, except the construction of some offices and steps, and the laying of a small portion of coping, flagging, and paving, and the completion of some traverse circles and pintle beds. The necessary plastering and painting will be finished this month, as well as the iron-work and roofing of the barracks, at which time it is also expected the carpentry will be completed.

The flagging of the barbette platform of Castle William has been relaid on a thick bed of cement-mortar, which appears to be perfectly tight. The platform of the second tier and floors of the third tier have been laid, and the galleries repaired. All the work required to be done is expected to be completed in the course of the year. The south battery requires little more to be done than to lay the traverse circles, the foundations of which are prepared.

Fort Mifflin, Delaware river, Pennsylvania.—The necessity which existed in December, 1835, of putting some position on the Delaware in a state of defence to protect Philadelphia against the approach of an enemy by water, led to the repair of this fort, as being advantageous for the effectual protection of the river, and susceptible of being fitted up in less time than any other point. The masonry was found to be in good condition; the ramparts and parapets constructed of earth required re-forming, and all the wood-work of the platforms, gateways, sally-ports, magazines, casernes, and barracks, entirely decayed and unfit for use even to the roofs and floors of the quarters; and the ditches were filled up. The ramparts and parapets have been formed, and the ditches excavated and widened. The quarters for officers and soldiers have been repaired, the scarp-walls pointed, and 416 running feet raised 2 feet in height to make it uniform with the other parts of the work, and the walls of the magazine raised and covered with earth and all parts thoroughly repaired. The whole work will probably be completed this fall, except perhaps some painting and the erection of gun-sheds, which may be arrested by unfavorable weather.

Fort Delaware, Delaware river.—In the last annual report it was stated that large supplies of material had been previously collected, and arrangements made for construction whenever funds should be available for that purpose. The work remained suspended until July last, when the appropriation was made for its continuance, but at too late a season to effect any thing advantageously. As soon as a force of laborers could be collected, the excavations for the foundations were commenced, and the earth applied in forming the glacis. Some progress has been made in driving piles for the foundation of a magazine, and the scarp of the front on the Delaware channel; and a further supply of material has been procured. The impracticability of procuring laborers and mechanics at so late a period of the year, even at the highest rate of wages, is the cause of so little progress; and this cause existed not only at the site of the work, but at all places whence materials were to be drawn.

Fort Monroe, Hampton Roads, Va.—The appropriation granted at the last session of Congress for completing, in a permanent manner, all the parts of this work, and referred to this department for application, remains untouched in the Treasury. After making a distribution of the officers among all the works, and, in nearly every instance, assigning the superintendence of several to the same individual, the services of none could be procured for the one in question.

Fort Calhoun, Hampton Roads, Va.—Operations at this work were resumed about the middle of July last; and, notwithstanding the exertions that were made, a full force could not be assembled before about the middle of September. They have been employed in removing from the walls the stone necessary for the superstructure and mole, and previously accumulated for the compression of the foundation; preparing machinery and buildings. Care has been taken in removing the stone to preserve the equality of pressure as much as possible. It is not anticipated to have the foundations laid open and preparations made for commencing the masonry of the work before March next.

Fort Caswell, Oak island, N. C.—The appropriation for completing and strengthening this work has been applied as far as circumstances would permit. The dike around the ditch has been repaired, and preparations made to commence immediately the permanent lock to regulate the admission of water into the ditches. Arrangements are also in progress for beginning the necessary masonry at an early period of next year, and which could not be commenced sooner for want of brick.

Fortifications in Charleston harbor, S. C.—Nothing has been yet done towards applying the appropriations for the fortifications in this harbor—no officer being available for that purpose. As was stated in my last report, the operations were abruptly arrested in March, 1835, for want of funds; and at this time I am not aware of the condition or state of the works. The difficulty of obtaining the right of site for the new work designed for the protection of the harbor still exists, and furnishes another impediment to resuming operations.

Fort Pulaski, Cockspur island, Georgia.—There has been no progress in the construction of this work for the last year. Since the appropriation became available, all the means at the disposal of the local engineer have been applied to restoring the canal flats, material, machinery, &c., injured by decay, to their former condition. From the preparations, however, now made, it is expected that the masonry will be resumed in a few days. The casualties attendant on this work have added materially to its cost of construction, as will be seen by reference to the estimate to complete it embraced in the tabular statement.

In the original design for this work by the board of engineers, no revetement was contemplated for the sides of the ditches and feeder. Experience has since shown that the mud which constitutes the island, when exposed to the influx and reflux of the sea, will assume, in combination with the water, a demi-fluid state, thereby filling up the ditches, impairing the strength of the fort and health of the garrison. Further, in cases of severe blows and high tides, the water will flow over the dikes, and in case of no revetement-walls, will sweep the earth of the slopes and dikes into the ditches in a few moments. It is believed by the local engineer that, if the revetement of the scarp of the demi-lune be not constructed, in less than one year after the completion of the fort, one-half of its rampart will have fallen into the ditch. An estimate has been made for revetting with masonry the scarp of the demi-lune, counter-scarp of main work and demi-lune, and the sides of the feeder, to the ditch between the advanced and remote tide-locks, amounting, in the aggregate, to $150,000; which is in part embraced in the estimate for the next year's operations, and will be so applied unless restricted by the act of appropriation.

Fort Marion, St. Augustine, Florida.—This work is presumed to be in the same condition in which it was reported in 1834. No officer being disposable for the application of the appropriation of the last session of Congress, a civil agent has been appointed to take charge of the operations, who has reached his place of destination, and is now making some preparatory arrangements.

Fort Pickens, Pensacola harbor, Florida.—The appropriation of last year for this fort has been sufficient to pay off the arrearages due on account of giving increased dimensions to the scarp-walls of one of the bastions, as stated in my last report. The small balance remaining on hand will be applied to sundry improvements by which the condition of the work will be benefited.

Fort on Foster's bank, Florida.—The operations at this point have steadily advanced during the year 1835, and for upwards of six months of the present year, notwithstanding the want of funds. The amount of work thus executed upon the individual credit of the superintending engineer and the responsibility of the contractors, and the great loss thereby saved to the United States, were explained in my last report. Some delay in getting the remainder of the bricks required will have prevented the completion of the whole of this work before the end of the year. The fort, in all its parts, has been faithfully constructed, and is in excellent condition. Some alterations from the original plan have been adopted, by increasing the height of the scarp-wall and the thickness of the bomb-proof of casemates, and giving additional dimensions to several parts of the masonry. These alterations and improvements have necessarily involved an additional cost to the works, which, added to other items not embraced in the original estimate, will form the difference between that and the actual cost. This excess of cost will, however, have been beneficially incurred, since it provides for increased strength and permanency to the works.

Fort Morgan, Mobile Point, Alabama.—The casemates intended for officers' quarters, mentioned in my last report, have been completed.

Fort Livingston, Grand Terre, Louisiana.—Nothing has been done at this point during the year, for want of an officer to take charge of the work. A keeper and one laborer have been employed to take care of the premises and materials belonging to the United States, and to improve the lands.

Fort Jackson, Louisiana.—This work is not considered in a state of defence. From the nature of the foundation it was deemed prudent, at the time of its construction, not to put on the earthen parapets until time had imparted to the work a greater solidity. It is also without furnaces for heating shot, and casemates for additional magazines, store-rooms, &c., require to be fitted up. An estimate for these purposes is accordingly submitted.

Contingencies of Fortifications.—Ten thousand dollars were appropriated at the last session of Congress under this head. They have been applied to defraying the expenses for a survey on Lake Champlain, repairs at Fort Morgan, Bienvenue, Dupré, and Forts Wood and Pike.

The appropriation of $100,000 for incidental expenses has been applied to the restoration of Fort Mifflin, purchase of additional land at Fort McHenry, preparing gun-traverses and platforms, furnaces for heating shot, and fitting up magazines, &c. at Boston harbor, Newport, New York,

HARBORS AND RIVERS.

Chicago harbor, Illinois.—The season had so far advanced when the appropriation for this work became available, that workmen and laborers seeking employment in the country had made permanent engagements elsewhere; and therefore little progress has been made since my last annual report, other than to procure a dredging-machine and materials. Operations have been delayed since they were resumed this year by boisterous and unfavorable weather, which has prevented any extension of the north pier into the lake. The south pier has been extended 150 feet, and should the weather allow, it is contemplated to carry it 280 feet farther this fall, and to endeavor to raise it its whole height, no part of which is now more than one foot above the surface of the lake. This will make both piers of equal length, extending twelve hundred and sixty feet into the lake, and across the crest of the outer bar, into full eleven feet water. It is believed that by means of the dredging-machine, a channel, sixty feet broad and of sufficient depth, will be opened along one of the piers this fall, which will admit vessels from the lower lakes to enter the river and lie up for the winter. Eight hundred cords of stone have been deposited in the piers this year, and it is contemplated the next season to extend the north pier about one hundred yards farther into the lake, which will probably be sufficient to secure a safe entrance and protect the channel from being filled with the moving sands. The great and increasing trade and prosperity of the town of Chicago and adjacent country, urge the importance of a speedy completion of the improvement of this harbor, and, therefore, the full amount of the estimate asked is recommended to be granted.

Harbors on the south shore of Lake Erie.—The progress of these works has been retarded, 1st, by the lateness of the season at which the appropriation for their continuance became available; 2d, from the necessity of changing the general superintendent of the greater number of them, whose services were elsewhere required; and, 3d, from the unprecedented continuous and violent storms, and the rise of the water on that shore of the lake more than $2\frac{1}{2}$ feet higher on an average than has been known for 12 years. Their condition in detail is set forth in the report of the general superintendent, which, from the great interest felt in their prosperity, is annexed, marked A, and to which I beg leave to refer.

Mouth of Oak-orchard creek, Lake Ontario, N. Y.—Five thousand dollars were appropriated at the last session of Congress for the formation of a harbor at this place. The work has been commenced, and the pier extending from the western shore to contract the mouth of the creek has been completed. The piers to be constructed on each side of the channel, and to extend 1,160 feet into the lake to deep water, will be embraced in next year's operations. A sketch of the plan of improvement pursued is appended, marked B.

Mouth of Genesee river, N. Y.—Operations at this point, since the appropriation for 1836 became available, have been confined to repairing those portions of the piers that have been found to subside in the sandy bed of the lake. The local agent reports that they remain firm, and that the channel is open, and as deep as the navigation of the lake requires. The more special object of the last appropriation, viz., the permanent stone-work, has not been and cannot be carried into effect until the waters of the lake sufficiently subside to allow the masonry to be begun at such a point as to ensure its being always covered, even at their lowest stages, thereby securing the preservation of the timber-work below. The unusual height attained by the waters of the lake in June last, forbids the construction above described, and they have not yet subsided. Arrangements have been made for procuring a sufficient quantity of stone, and of a suitable kind.

Big Sodus bay, Lake Ontario, N. Y.—The operation of dredging out the channel between the piers at this place has been satisfactorily advanced since the work was resumed this season; one-half of it having been opened to 16 feet depth of water, and which at the lowest stage of the lake will afford a draught of 14 feet. The work is represented to give evidences of remaining a permanent improvement.

Oswego, Lake Ontario, N. Y.—This work has been much retarded and embarrassed the past year by the extraordinary high water in the lake, which has been about 33 inches above its ordinary level. The labor and expense of preparing the bed of the pavement of the mole and arranging the stones at the base were consequently much augmented, and the process of quarrying large stone for the base of the mole was entirely abandoned in consequence of the quarries being overflowed by the water from the lake. The operations for the year have been limited to removing the temporary construction around the foundation of the light-house, and rebuilding it in a more permanent manner; to laying about 13,500 square feet of pavement, and receiving 2,843 tons of paving stone. The report of the local agent, giving a concise history of the operations since the year 1833, and his views relating to its construction, is appended, marked C, to which I beg leave to refer for more particular information.

Perhaps it would be interesting to observe at this place the effect produced by the works just described upon their immediate vicinity, and what benefit the country at large will derive from their construction.

The four last-named are on Lake Ontario. The improvement at Oak-orchard creek has but just commenced, and is spoken of as one of the points for the debouché of the ship canal around the Falls of Niagara. One railroad has been extended along the margin of the Genesee towards the piers at its mouth, and a second projected and chartered. A canal has been commenced from Sodus bay, by which a communication through Cayuga lake into Pennsylvania, thence through the Susquehanna river canal to Chesapeake bay, will be opened to the commerce of the Northern lakes to the New York and Southern markets. This line of intercourse, uniting the Northern and Southern States by the strong tie of mutual and commercial interests, and furnishing an easy and expeditious route for military transportation from the Northern to the Southern frontier, must be considered a work of a truly national character.

A branch of the New York and Erie canal already extends to Oswego, through which the produce of the shores of Lake Ontario is conveyed, to be distributed through the whole country. From the time of the first commencement of these works, in 1829, the navigation and tonnage on the lake have more than doubled in extent and quality; and the population surrounding these districts has increased in a ratio of one-third.

Monument on Steele's ledge, Maine.—As stated in the last annual report, this structure was then completed, with but a slight exception. The agent, in January last, reported that his operations had been brought to a close, and recommended that the small balance of funds in his hands should be applied in buoying out the channel leading to the mouth of the Penobscot river, the direct course to Prospect harbor, Bucksport, Frankfort, and Bangor, which at present can only be safely navigated at certain stages of the tide. It was estimated that it would cost about $150 to mark out the channel and render it secure at all tides; but, as the appropriation was specific for a monument on the ledge, the department believed it had no authority to sanction this application. It is now recommended that the balance of this appropriation may be applied to the purpose above mentioned, and it is therefore included in the estimate to be re-appropriated for that object.

Breakwater on Stanford ledge, Portland harbor, Maine.—

Ten thousand dollars were appropriated at the last session of Congress for the commencement of this object. The officer under whose general superintendence the work was placed, reports that no permanent agent had yet been appointed to take charge of the operations, but that the gentleman consenting at his request to assist in the preliminary arrangements, had informed him that a contract had been made for constructing the first section of the breakwater, extending on Stanford ledge 400 yards from the shore.

Piers at Kennebunk, Maine.—The sum of $7,500 for continuing this work was appropriated in July. As much of the most favorable season for operations had then passed, the work, if commenced, could not be completed this year, and it was apprehended that, if left in an unfinished state, exposed to the action of the sea during the winter, its safety would be endangered; the agent was therefore instructed to limit his operations to the collection of materials, and to such arrangements as might be necessary for commencing the work next spring.

Deepening the channel of the Cocheco branch of the Piscataqua river, leading into Dover harbor, New Hampshire.—Arrangements have been made by the general superintendent for commencing the necessary operations for this improvement, for which $5,000 were appropriated in July last. No report of the progress of the work has yet been received.

Merrimack river, Massachusetts.—The agent at this place reports that the breakwater under his charge is complete, with the exception, perhaps, of a few tons of stone, for which the available means are sufficient.

Breakwater at Sandy bay, Massachusetts.—Ten thousand dollars were appropriated by Congress at its last session for this object. The work has been commenced, and, up to the 30th of September, 5,635 tons of stone had been deposited on the site of the breakwater. The balance of the funds applicable for this year will be absorbed by contracts which have been made for the delivery of materials during the fall and winter. A liberal appropriation for the prosecution of this important work next year is earnestly recommended.

Preservation of Rainsford island, Massachusetts.—The preservation of this island was first commenced by the State of Massachusetts, whose Legislature, in 1835, granted $4,500 for the purpose. The appropriation of $15,000 by Congress at its last session for the same object, has been applied in continuation of the work thus commenced, and, up to the 30th September, 485 cubic yards of masonry, 128 running feet of coping, and about 380 cubic yards of embankment, have been executed. The wall proposed for the preservation of the island is contemplated to be about 1,200 feet long, averaging about 7 feet thick at the base, and varying in height from 7 to 12 feet. Eight hundred feet of this distance have been worked on. In front will be placed a quantity of ballast stone for its protection, and the space between the wall and the natural bank will be filled in with earth and small stone.

Duxbury, Massachusetts.—Five thousand dollars were appropriated at the last session of Congress "for preserving the point of land leading to the fort and light-house at the Gurnet." The general superintendence of the necessary operations was committed to an officer of the corps of engineers. Agents have been appointed to conduct the work, and such instructions given them as were deemed sufficient. No report of their progress has been received.

Plymouth beach, Massachusetts.—The amount of last year's appropriation, $500, has been applied to repairing the breakwater and brush fence, injured by the storms of last winter. The grass that has been planted to protect the beach and arrest the drifting sand is represented to be increasing, and the estimate asked for by the local agent for next year, he states can be applied to much advantage in extending the wall on the northeast side of the breakwater, planting grass, and repairing fence.

Provincetown harbor, Massachusetts.—The plantation of grass at this place is represented by the local agent to be in a flourishing condition. About 200 acres have been planted this season, and the same quantity is contemplated in the estimate for next year.

Hyannis breakwater, Massachusetts.—The present length of this breakwater is upwards of 1,100 feet. The foundation of the eastern extremity is extended as far as the plan contemplates, but before it is completed on the top it is desirable that all settlement should cease. This end is much exposed to the action of the sea and ice, and requires to be constructed of large stone. It is also on this end that a beacon light, if built, must be placed. The west end requires to be extended, agreeably to the plan, about 200 feet. The completion of this breakwater is represented to be important to commerce and navigation, as it is the best if not only harbor from Cape Cod to Vineyard sound, and affords commodious and safe anchorage for vessels on that coast. Its completion in a permanent manner it is estimated by the agent will cost about $15,000; $5,000 for the completion of the east end and construction of a beacon light, and $10,000 to finish the west end. The working season at this place is stated to be not more than six months in the year, and that the last was particularly unfavorable to the progress of operations.

Mouth of Bass river, Massachusetts.—Ten thousand dollars were appropriated by Congress at its last session for the improvement of the harbor at the mouth of this river. The general superintendence of the proposed works was committed to an officer of this department, who was directed to visit the scene of operations, and give such instructions as the case required. Three individuals, who, it was supposed, would equally represent the interest of the community affected by the contemplated improvement, were selected to take immediate charge of the works. Before the proper arrangements could be made, so much of the working season had elapsed that it was not considered advisable to execute any portion of the work this year. Very little could have been done, and so little that it would probably be of greater harm than good. It is expected that every preparation will be made by the agents the ensuing fall and winter for commencing operations in the spring.

New Bedford, Massachusetts.—The application of the sum appropriated by Congress ($10,000) for the removal of the wreck in this harbor, has been committed to local agents appointed to superintend the work, but from the late period at which the appropriation became available, and the delays attendant on completing the necessary arrangements, the season had so far advanced that it was represented to the department that to commence operations before next spring would be attended with great additional expense, as the principal part of the work lies under water. It was therefore considered more advantageous to make the requisite preparations for beginning at that time.

Breakwater at Church's cove, Rhode Island.—Ten thousand dollars were appropriated in July last, for constructing a breakwater at this place, according to a project of Lieutenant Colonel Anderson, of the topographical engineers. Instructions as to the manner of executing the work have been given to the agent selected to superintend it. It is considered advisable that, before making any actual commencement, there should be purchased a small portion of the ground at the junction of the breakwater with the shore, so that the United States may possess the fee simple of the land above and below water, on which they build, and, also, the right of way to and from it. Measures have been taken to ascertain the practicability of making such purchase, and an estimate will be presented for the purpose, so soon as the terms can be ascertained.

Thames river, Connecticut.—An agent has been appointed to apply the appropriation of $10,000 for deepening the channel of this river. He has been directed to conform in his operations to the project of Major Bache, of the topographical engineers, upon which the appropriation was based, and to bestow all his attention upon the upper pier there spoken of, until the general superintendent could make arrangements to visit Norwich and give more particular instructions. No report of operations has been received.

Saybrook harbor, Connecticut.—Twenty thousand dollars were appropriated for improving this harbor by removing the bar at the mouth of Connecticut river. It was found by Colonel Totten, to whose general care the work was assigned, that no plan of improvement had been made, and that a minute survey was necessary to form such a project as would give reasonable expectation of proving beneficial, which, if possible at all, would be a problem as delicate and difficult as it was important. A requisition has been made for an officer of the topographical engineers to make the necessary survey.

Bridgeport harbor, Connecticut.—Ten thousand dollars were also appropriated for deepening the channel leading into this harbor, and it is proposed—1st. To dredge a channel of eight feet draught and 100 feet wide through the outer bar; 2d. To increase the width of this channel to 150 feet, should there be funds sufficient; 3d. Should the appropriation still hold out, to increase the width to 200 feet; and, 4th. With any remaining funds to open a channel of eight feet depth and 100 feet width through the inner bar, ultimately increasing the dimensions of the channel, as the success of the first operation and the liberality of Congress shall justify or permit. Local agents have been appointed to execute the work, but no report of operations has been received.

Fairweather island, Connecticut.—Measures have been taken to apply the appropriation of ten thousand dollars for constructing a sea-wall for the preservation of this island, according to the project of Mr. Farnham. Agents have been appointed to carry it into effect, but no report of operations has been received.

Southport harbor, Connecticut.—Fifteen hundred dollars were appropriated for securing the public works at this place. A local agent has been appointed to carry out the project on which the appropriation was based. He reports that the contract entered into for the protection of the dike and channel is in a good state of progress; that its completion will absorb the whole appropriation; and that about fifteen thousand cubic feet of the wall will be left unfinished, which will leave that part of the dike constantly exposed to the action of the sea, and in great danger of being swept into the channel. He estimates that about one thousand dollars will be necessary for the continuation of the wall, and to be required for the protection of the channel and harbor.

Harbor of Westport and beach at Cedar point, Connecticut.—Three thousand dollars were appropriated for improving the harbor of Westport, and one thousand dollars for securing the beach at Cedar point. These have reference to the same harbor, and agents have been appointed to carry into effect the wishes of Congress. The particular object of the first-mentioned appropriation is the cutting a canal through the "great marsh," according to the project of Colonel Anderson, of the topographical engineers. And the further protection to be afforded to Cedar point is contemplated to be obtained by a leaning wall of large stones, four feet thick, and four or five feet above high water, extending from the end of the point to the high part of the gravel beach. No report of operations has been received.

Staten island, New York.—Nineteen thousand five hundred dollars were appropriated at the last session of Congress for building an ice-breaker on this island. The department was in possession of no plan, report, or other information, by which it could ascertain the manner in which it was designed to apply these funds. The general superintendence of the necessary operations was assigned to Major J. L. Smith, of the corps of engineers, who learned, through the collector of New York, that the object of the appropriation was to provide a breakwater at the quarantine-ground, to protect the public wharf and buildings from northeast gales.

Upon examining the plan proposed for this object, another presented itself, better adapted to the purpose, which was consequently adopted. Nothing has yet been done towards the construction of the work; nor has the general superintendent found time to make any preliminary arrangements, except to ascertain the practicability of procuring piles. His report, entering into the details of the subject, is annexed, marked D, to which I beg leave to refer you.

New Brunswick harbor, New Jersey.—The application of the sum (seven thousand dollars) appropriated for improving this harbor, by removing the obstructions in the Raritan river, according to the plan reported by Major Bache, of the topographical engineers, was also assigned to the general superintendence of Major Smith. It was not before late in August that he was put in possession of the chart of the river, and a copy of the report and estimate. When upon the point of proceeding to make a personal examination of the obstructions in question, he learned that the soundings of this river were required in connexion with the survey of the coast, the use of which, in carrying on the requisite operations for improving its navigation, was politely offered by the officer in charge of this duty. He therefore has deferred his examination until said officer shall be engaged in these soundings.

Little Egg harbor, New Jersey.—The appropriation of $5,000 for the protection and improvement of this harbor, referred to the preservation of Tucker's island.

So soon as the plan and report alluded to in the act of appropriation were received, Major Smith, the general superintendent of the work, met by appointment the owner of the island, on the site of the contemplated operations, when such arrangements were entered into as the case required. It was intended to have commenced the works this fall, with a hope of completing a part of the plan proposed, but some delay having occurred in acquiring the necessary information, they will not now be commenced before next year, which, perhaps, is not to be regretted, as they will acquire a greater stability by being built early in the season, and altogether thereby mutually supporting and sustaining each other.

Hudson river, New York.—The plan adopted for the improvement of the navigation of this river has been stated to be that devised by the special board of engineers constituted for the purpose of investigating the subject. The progress made the past season in advancing the system there proposed, the beneficial alterations suggested by experience, and a detailed account of the operations on each section of the whole embarrassed district of navigation extending between the towns of Waterford and New Baltimore, as well as those contemplated next year, are fully set forth in the report of the local engineer, marked E, to which I refer for more particular information.

Removal of the bar in the Delaware, near Fort Mifflin, Pennsylvania.—Fifteen thousand dollars were appropriated, in July last, for removing this bar, with a view to improve the harbor of Philadelphia. The officer to whom the subject was referred has made an examination of this obstruction, and reports that, in his opinion, no permanent good can be effected in any effort to remove the same. His whole communication on the subject is appended, marked F.

Chester harbor, Pennsylvania.—Three thousand dollars were appropriated for the repairs of this harbor. The amount is now pledged for repairing the timber-work of the five piers and wharves with the three connecting bridges forming the harbor. The plan adopted has been first to renew the most defective part of the works, and progress with the other parts until the funds should be exhausted. The southern pier, wharf, and connecting bridge, with the mooring-posts, have been completed, and some progress made in cutting away the defective timbers of the northern piers. It is anticipated that the wood-work of these will be completed by the first of December, and filled, as far as the material from the old work will allow, when the available funds will be absorbed, and a small additional sum required to perfect and complete the work. This harbor was the only one last winter in a condition to give even a partial shelter to vessels. The present repairs will make it more secure for some years.

Wilmington harbor, Delaware.—Fifteen thousand dollars were appropriated for improving this harbor, by removing the bar at the mouth of Christiana river, according to the plan recommended by Major Bache, of the topographical engineers. Three of the members of the City Council of Wilmington have been selected to take charge of the necessary operations. It has been thought advisable to omit so much of the "plan of Major Bache" as forms any part of the projected jettee in the Delaware, at the mouth of the river, as it is not now seen that it will be productive of the desired results. The estimate made by the local agents for the completion of this improvement exceeds the original estimate of Major Bache by the sum of $11,165 42, which is explained, 1st, by the greater cost of blasting and removing the rocks below the old ferry; 2d, the difference between the actual cost of the requisite and necessary machinery and that of the estimate; and, 3d, by the additional amount for services in extending the operation of dredging through the year 1838. But, by omitting the construction of the jettee, as above recommended, the excess of the cost of executing the project, as estimated by the local agents, will be $934 24, leaving $15,747 73 to be appropriated next year.

Harbor of Newcastle, Delaware.—The repairs of the harbors on the Delaware river for protecting its commerce against floating ice, owing to the limited appropriations, and being contrary to the plan recommended from year to year, have progressed in a manner to do but little good until this season. The work executed under the appropriation of 1835 consisted in cutting down to low-water mark, and rebuilding, with large masses of granite, one of the old piers at Newcastle, and the removal to low-water mark of the wharf-work connecting it with the shore. This has served to check any further deposit within the harbor, and to remove a portion of what had previously accumulated.

The appropriation of the last session of Congress for the further improvement of this harbor became available at so late a period that timber in the large quantities required for the construction of the two contemplated piers could not be obtained in any of the markets accessible to this place. A sufficiency for one pier up to low-water mark was obtained with some difficulty and at a high price. No wharf-builder being found willing to contract for doing the work this season, it was undertaken by the day. Such progress has been made in its construction, that no doubt remains of its being so far finished as to be sunk in position before operations are suspended for the winter.

Some progress has also been made in preparing and cutting large masses of stone to form all that part of the pier above low water, and the whole is contracted to be delivered by the end of December. A centre "mooring-pier," the wood-work of which was much decayed, has been removed and partially rebuilt with masonry. Contracts will be made this fall for the supply of timber needed next spring for the second pier; the balance of funds on hand being sufficient to authorize this course, upon the supposition that Congress will now grant the sum necessary to complete the work as designed, and calculated to make a safe, permanent, and secure harbor, as required by the compact between Delaware and the United States. Ten per cent. more than the original estimate for this harbor will be necessary, in consequence of the prolonged period of executing the work, the increased prices of materials, and the high advance of wages of mechanics and laborers since it was prepared.

In addition to the above-mentioned harbors, the commerce of the Delaware will find security at six piers at and near Fort Mifflin, repaired as part of the defences of the river. The harbor first used by vessels ascending the bay, Port Penn, remains in a dilapidated state. The officer charged with the superintendence of the works on the Delaware has found no time to examine its condition, or to prepare a statement of the extent of the repair it may require; nor is any fund available for making any temporary repairs or renewing mooring-posts to give partial security to vessels the approaching winter.

Delaware Breakwater.—The further prosecution of this work was assigned to this department the past season. The operations of the year are detailed in the report of the general superintendent, marked G.

The quantity of work done, and the protection at this time afforded, will there be seen, as well as the alterations proposed, and the benefits anticipated. Concurring fully in these views, I recommend them to your favorable consideration, and have embraced in the annual estimates the amount deemed necessary for 1837.

Harbor of Baltimore, Md.—Twenty thousand dollars were appropriated by Congress at their last session for deepening this harbor; the application of which, upon the recommendation of the mayor, was placed in the hands of the portwardens of the city. The plan proposed by them, and acceded to by the department, was, to hire the dredging apparatus belonging to the city of Baltimore, believing that the wishes of Congress and the interest of the city would be complied with more effectually than by any other method, as the season had far advanced. About one-half the amount appropriated had been expended up to the 30th of September.

Dismal-swamp canal, Va.—Fifteen thousand dollars were granted by Congress, at its last session, for improving the debouches of this canal. The department having no officer to place in charge of the work, its execution was offered to the board of directors of the Canal Company, which, after some reluctance on their part, was accepted, as being the only way by which any portion of the appropriation could be applied this season, or the benefits expected be derived.

Ocracoke inlet, N. C.—It was contemplated to apply the appropriation granted by Congress at its last session, according to the project then recommended, in constructing a jettee to throw the current of Wallace's channel over the shoal separating that channel from Beacon-island slue. Owing to the exposed situation of the proposed jettee, it was desirable to enter upon its construction in that season of the year most favorable for the operation, and which experience has shown to be between April and August; after which time violent gales are frequent on that part of the coast. The appropriation not becoming available till late in July, it was considered most prudent to defer the commencement of the work till next year. The price of labor in that section of the country has advanced 25 per cent., which, of course, will increase the cost of the jettee, and $1,800 are asked for in addition to the funds now available. By a register kept by the collector of Ocracoke, it is ascertained that 1,116 vessels have passed out the inlet within the last year, from which it is estimated that the trade passing through this inlet furnishes constant employment for 93 vessels, or for about 9,300 tons.

Pamlico river, N. C.—An appropriation of $5,000 for improving the navigation of this river below the town of Washington, was made at the last session of Congress. Its object was to cut a channel through a shoal which prevents vessels drawing over seven feet water from coming up to the town. No preliminary surveys or observations having been made, and the other duties of the officer to whom the general direction of the operations was obliged to be committed not allowing him to make the necessary examinations, the dredging-machine employed at Ocracoke inlet was set to work in the present channel-way. The shoal is about 600 yards wide, and 9,636 cubic yards have been excavated and removed. It is expected that a channel 50 yards wide will be opened with the available funds, through which vessels drawing eight feet water may pass. Should a prosecution of this work be determined on, it is recommended that a survey be commenced as soon as possible, and an accurate examination be made of the currents of the river in all its stages.

Beaufort, N. C.—Upon the arrival of the officer at Beaufort, charged with the application of the appropriation of $5,000 for the improvement of this harbor, he had reason to suppose that it was the intention of Congress to appropriate it for the purpose of removing obstructions in Core sound, the only navigable communication leading into the interior of the State, and that a mistake had been made in the caption of the bill. From such data as were in his possession, he was unable to suggest any project for expending $5,000 "for the improvement of the harbor of Beaufort," by which any good or permanent effect might be produced; and the department could not authorize its application to any other.

New river, North Carolina.—An appropriation of $5,000 was also made for removing obstructions at the mouth of this river. The act of appropriation contemplated the application of the dredge-boat belonging to the Cape Fear river to this purpose. Upon examination it was found that the shoalness of the water at the mouth of the river rendered it impracticable to work there either the Cape Fear or Ocracoke boat. The necessity of a survey at this point for the purpose of ascertaining the best mode of improving the navigation of the river, is more apparent than at Pamlico, and is likewise recommended.

Cape Fear river, North Carolina.—The plan which has been pursued for the improvement of this river, both by the State of North Carolina and the United States, is that recommended by Mr. Fulton, civil engineer of North Carolina, with certain modifications. It consists in shutting up all the channels at those points where obstructions are caused by their intersection, except the one selected as the most eligible; and diminishing the width of the river by means of jetties, thereby producing more uniformity in the current, a greater velocity, and a corroding action on the bed of the river. Dredging was also to be used in aid of these works, relying upon the increased velocity of the current to prevent future deposits in the channel. The execution of this plan was commenced by the State of North Carolina in 1823, and acted on until 1829. In 1829, the United States took charge of the operations, which have consisted in the construction of jetties, and in the excavation of the channel up to the present period, with but few interruptions. Five of the jetties recommended have been constructed, and one built by the State repaired. In 1827, nine feet was the greatest draught of water that could be carried to Wilmington. Now, vessels drawing 12½ feet can pass over the shoals, and it is anticipated that, by prosecuting the system, vessels drawing 14 feet will be enabled to reach the wharves of Wilmington; the greatest depth that can be carried over the bar at the mouth of the river. The operations of the past season have been confined to dredging on the middle shoal, securing jetty No. 3, and repairing and securing jetty No. 7. It is contemplated the next year to reconstruct the dike between Campbell's island and the western shore, built by the State of North Carolina, to place in good repair the jetties now constructed, remove the logs and stumps from the channel, and, if necessary, construct the jetties to act on the lower shoal, for which an appropriation is asked of $10,000. The value of these improvements to the State of North Carolina will be seen, when it is recollected that the trade of Wilmington embraces the exports and imports for one-third of the State; that its exports consist in naval stores, sawed lumber, timber, staves, shingles, rice, cotton, tobacco, and flax seed, besides some other articles; that the shipping engaged in its trade amounts to 76,931 tons, besides a large amount of tonnage in coasting vessels carrying domestic produce not included.

The cost of these improvements has exceeded the estimates, which is attributable in fact to the impossibility of predicting with any degree of certainty the effects of hydraulic operations, and the results of injuries and disasters beyond human control.

Savannah river, Georgia.—Operations on this river have been embarrassed by failing to obtain the authority of South Carolina to proceed with the obstruction between Hutchinson and Argyle islands, by the employment in Florida of the steamboat used in towing the loaded flats to a place of deposit, by sickness and desertion among the hands, and the impracticability of procuring another boat to supply the place of the one withdrawn. The report of the local engineer enters into a detail of the subjects here touched on, and will show the efforts that have been made to obtain more favorable results. From these considerations, and a desire to lay before you full information on this subject, the whole report is appended, marked H. At the same time the question is respectfully submitted for your consideration, what steps must now be taken as regards that part of the system of improvement adopted, relating to the proposed obstruction between Hutchinson and Argyle islands.

Brunswick harbor, Georgia.—Ten thousand dollars were appropriated by Congress in July last, for the improvement of this harbor, by removing the Brunswick bar. The officer charged with the superintendence of the work reports that, owing to the late day on which the funds became available, and the pressure of other duties, nothing has yet been done further than to elicit information.

Inland pass between St. Mary's and St. John's, Florida.—During the past year, a dredge-boat, two mud-flats, and one wood-flat, have been completed for the service of this work. From the time the dredge-boat was established at work, which did not take place till late in June, 1,300 cubic yards of mud, &c. have been removed from the channel-way, and is represented to have improved materially the passage. The operation of dredging at this place is necessarily slow, as the boat can only work while afloat and cannot load but two flats at about high water. The officer detailed on this service, and who had commenced a survey for the purpose of ascertaining the best mode of surmounting the difficulties of many short turns in a narrow and shallow channel, had made such little progress when his services were required with his company, that his labor and the expense of preliminary preparations were lost. A complete project of this improvement has not yet been made, for want of an accurate survey.

Appalachicola, Florida.—Ten thousand dollars were appropriated by Congress at its last session for removing a mud-shoal, called Bulkhead, from East pass to this place. It was deemed advisable, upon the recommendation of the mayor of the town, to postpone the commencement of this work until the results of the operations in the strait channel, by Mr. Griswold, should be exhibited. In the meantime the officer charged with the general superintendence of the work will cause an examination to be made of the East pass channel, to ascertain the nature and extent of the impediments it contains.

Mobile harbor, Alabama.—It has been stated in the pre-vicious annual reports that the operations for improving the Choctaw pass in this harbor had been carried on by contract. The dredging-machine used by the contractor was so much injured by storms in November last as to be rendered unworthy of repair; up to that time the contractor appeared to have been diligent in the prosecution of his work, and efforts were made to renew the contract, which he declined. Proposals have since been invited for the excavation of the channel, in order to afford it increased depth and width, without success, though the department is given to understand that a gentleman from New Orleans has offered to undertake the work, and it is hoped that an agreement will be made by which this work will no longer be delayed.

Pascagoula river, Mississippi.—Owing to the necessity of making considerable repairs in the dredging-machine, and also to the difficulty and expense of carrying on the work during the severe winds and storms which prevail in the winter and spring months, operations for the improvement of this river were not commenced till late in April. The work has since been prosecuted with great energy by the present contractor, and with as much success as circumstances would admit. But owing to the ruinous state of the machine, and the unusually low tides which have prevailed during the third quarter, as large an amount of earth has not been excavated as might otherwise have been expected. Should the weather prove at all favorable, the work will be completed as far as proposed during the ensuing winter. The examinations made of the work executed the preceding as well as the current year, go to show that the outer extremity of the pass, which is excavated through soft mud, as feared in my last report, fills up nearly as fast as excavated, and that four feet is the greatest depth of water that can be depended on, and it seems doubtful whether even this depth will continue for any length of time. No further appropriation will be necessary.

Red river, Louisiana.—The progress made in removing the great raft on this river will be seen by reference to the report of Captain Shreve, marked I. In accordance with his recommendation, made in former years, and of the necessity of which he is more and more convinced, $15,000 are embraced in the estimate for next year, for working a dredge-boat in order to keep open the channel-way, and $8,000 for building the necessary boat, in addition to the $15,000 appropriated last year for the purpose, and which, from the increased price of materials and labor of all kinds, is not sufficient. $65,000 are besides asked for by Captain Shreve, for his operations this winter. A less sum he thinks will be unavailing, and the importance of its early appropriation he represents in an urgent manner; to which I beg leave to add my earnest recommendation.

Ohio and Mississippi rivers, below the falls of the Ohio.—The report of the operations for the improvement of these rivers, from the falls of the Ohio to the mouth of the Mississippi, is annexed, marked K, from which will be seen the progress made during the year, and their present condition. To this are added the reports of the officers of this department who inspected these works.

Ohio river above the falls.—The report from the officer charged with the improvement of this portion of the river has not yet been received.

Arkansas river, Arkansas.—During the past working season, nine hundred and twenty-eight snags have been removed from the bed of this river, and fourteen hundred and eighty-one trees cut off its sand bars, and under its banks. Although by these means its navigation has been considerably benefited, yet much remains to be done to render it safe. The accumulation of timber in this river is very rapid, owing to the great number of trees deposited in the channel by the caving in of its banks, particularly below Little Rock, and which must continue until the lands on the banks are cleared, or the timber felled from them. This latter plan is considered very essential to the permanency of any improvement that may be made by the removal of snags now in the channel.

Cumberland river.—The wing-dam and embankments at Line island, extending in length 1,687 yards, with a base from 12 to 18 feet, and 6 feet high, have been completed, and are found to answer all the purposes intended, and to give a safe and uniform channel the whole length of the islands. The improvements at Dover shoals, in Tennessee, have been commenced by extending a wing-dam from the left bank, for the purpose of forcing the current toward the right shore. Owing to the large quantity of material at hand, the work has advanced rapidly, and 450 yards of the embankment, from 3½ to 4 feet high, have been completed. Two hundred and eighty-three snags and one hundred and eighty-seven logs had been removed by the snag-boat from the channel-way between Nashville island and the Big eddy, when operations were suspended by high water. In consequence of a disaster to the boat in March last, her aid has been lost to the operations of this season. Arrangements have been made to rebuild her this winter. On the 8th of August the river rose at Clarkville 25 feet in 13 hours; all the small streams from Harpeth to Line island overflowed their banks, forcing into the river whole trees, logs, and rocks, and depositing at some places bars of gravel and sand across the river, making its navigation intricate and dangerous. It is estimated by the local agent that to repair the damages of the late freshet will cost from three to four thousand dollars.

For further particulars relating to the improvement of this river, I refer to the report of the officer of engineers who has made an inspection of the works, marked L.

Pier near the city of St. Louis, Missouri.—Fifteen thousand dollars were appropriated by Congress, at its last session, for building a pier to give direction to the current of the Mississippi, near this place. The department having no officer available, the execution of the work was offered to the corporate authorities of St. Louis, who declined its acceptance, by a resolution of the Board of Aldermen. Captain Shreve was afterwards directed to take the first opportunity his duties would allow, to draw up a project of the proposed pier, and commit its construction to some suitable person. He has informed the department that the season is too far advanced to attempt any thing before next summer, and that the months of June and July next will be as early as the work can be commenced to any advantage. He, at the same time, has suggested the propriety of making a further appropriation, as the sum now available is too small to accomplish any work sufficient to remove the bar from the harbor of St. Louis, or to prevent its encroachment on the landing, and that not less than $50,000, in his opinion, can effect the object in view.

Mississippi river, above the mouth of the Ohio, and the Missouri river.—Forty thousand dollars were appropriated at the last session of Congress for improving the Mississippi river, above the mouth of the Ohio river, and the Missouri river. The report of Captain Shreve, to whom the duty was assigned, is annexed, marked M.

Light-houses and beacon lights.—The condition of the light-houses on the south shore of Lake Erie will be seen from the report of the officer to whom their construction is committed, marked A.

The agent of the department for those of Genesee and Big Sodus reports that he has not found it necessary to extend his operations beyond the preparation of copper fixtures, frames, lanterns, and lamps, which have not been placed in the beacons, as he has wished to wait for a firm subsidence of the works into the bed of the lake, the only security of their permanency. He also reports that, during a late storm, the beacon at Genesee has subsided and fallen; that from the lateness of the season he shall not rebuild it before spring, and for which he has sufficient funds on hand.

The operations for the light-house at Oswego are nearly brought to a close. The tower is completed, the iron, glass, and copper for the lantern and windows procured, and the lantern itself nearly completed. The lamps have been ordered by the superintendent of light-houses, and are expected in a few days. The funds now available are expected will finish the work.

Nothing has been done towards the construction of the light-house on Goat island the past season. So soon as the appropriation, granted in fulfillment of the estimate, became available, proposals were invited for the construction of the whole work, or the supplying materials. Only one proposal being received upon this invitation, and that for a part of the work, offers were made to persons experienced in such operations, but none were found willing to undertake it for a sum justified by the appropriation. It was then wished to commence the work immediately, by daily labor, which was found impracticable, as materials could not be collected before operations would have to be suspended by the weather. Proposals are advertised for anew, for beginning the work in the spring, which, if unsuccessful, will be commenced by daily labor.

ROADS.

Roads from Detroit to Fort Gratiot, and to the mouth of Grand river, in Michigan.—No appropriations were made for these roads at the last session of Congress, nor has any report from the agent of the department been received, stating their present condition. The first has been completed, as stated in my last report, and the arrearages due, as then explained, have not been liquidated for want of funds.

Roads from Detroit to Chicago, Saginaw road, Territorial road from Sheldon's to the mouth of St. Joseph, Territorial road from Niles to the mouth of the river St. Joseph, Territorial road from Clinton to the rapids of Grand river, road from Port Lawrence to Adrian, road from Vistula (now Toledo) westwardly to the Indiana State line.—For the condition of these roads I must refer you to my last annual report. No appropriations have since been made for their continuance, nor has the department received any report of their present condition. The presence of the officers charged with their superintendence was necessary with their companies, and I have not learned what progress has been made in the application of the balances of former appropriations.

Road from La Plaisance bay to the road leading from Detroit to Chicago.—The progress on this road is not such as was anticipated or could be wished. The whole is under contract for a certain portion of labor, which should have been completed some time since; yet, from the commencement of the season, scarcely a week has elapsed of weather favorable to operations. Constant rains have kept the earth in a state unfit for working, and the enormous price of provisions and labor during the whole season has interfered with the contractors. Such parts as do not seem likely to be finished without this course will be resold.

This importance of completing this road according to the plan commenced by the department in 1833, and which had to be abandoned for a more economical system, is urged in strong terms by the superintendent. He has submitted an estimate for this purpose, amounting to $23,000.

Road from Line creek to the Chattahoochee river, Alabama.—In my last annual report it was stated that all the funds for this road had been expended, and that, from a misapprehension of the agent, there was an arrearage due of $1,544 50, for which no appropriation was made, and which is again inserted in the estimates for next year.

Road from Memphis to the St. Francis river.—The efforts that have been made to advance the construction of this road, and the many causes that have occurred to retard it, together with the progress in the work, are fully set forth in the report of the superintendent, and is hereto appended, marked N, for your information.

Cumberland road in Indiana and Illinois.—No report has been received from the officer charged with this work; it will be laid before you upon its arrival.

Cumberland road in Ohio.—For the condition of that portion of this road yet in the hands of the General Government, as well as for the progress made in its construction, I beg leave to refer to the report of the superintendent, herewith submitted, marked O.

Cumberland road east of the Ohio.—The report of the superintendent of that portion of this road lying in the States of Pennsylvania and Maryland, giving a detailed account of the progress made in its repair, is appended, marked P. It will be perceived that the completion of the bridge over Dunlap's creek, which was anticipated at the date of my last report, has been delayed by the unprecedented wet weather, high water in the river, and scarcity of mechanics. The difficulties interposed by the authorities of Bridgeport to its location caused so much delay in commencing the masonry for the abutments, that the contractors, who had engaged to finish the work before the great rise in the price of labor, provisions, and mechanics' wages took place, not being able to commence their operations early last season, declined to comply this year with the terms of the contract made the last, and thus caused an increase in the cost of its construction. The great rise in the price of iron, of which the bridge is to be constructed, from $35 to $55 per ton, and the withdrawal of all the officers of the army, have made it necessary to employ civil agents, which was not considered in the original estimate, and also materially added to its cost, and now renders necessary for its completion, and to perfect the whole work, $7,183 63, or a fraction less than one per cent. on the original estimate. All the repairs are finished except the execution of the contract for completing the bridge over Will's creek, and that for finishing the masonry, casting the iron-work, and putting it in place for Dunlap's creek bridge.

That portion of the road lying in the State of Virginia having been turned over to the State the last year, I have nothing to communicate concerning it.

Military Academy, West Point.—The state of this institution, as well as its capacity for great usefulness, are exhibited in the annexed report of the last Board of Visitors, marked Q. All the wants of the Academy, respecting the course of tuition, the necessity of larger, more secure, and comfortable buildings, are there detailed; and I beg leave particularly to call your attention to the present inadequate provision for imparting instruction in the studies of chemistry, mineralogy, and geology, the two last of which are now entirely omitted; as well as to the insufficiency of the rooms provided for the professors of natural philosophy and chemistry. The remarks of the Board in relation to the course of religious instruction deserve your serious consideration, and the importance that is attached to a separation of the duties of chaplain from the professorship of ethics. The introduction of cavalry tactics into the school is, under the present organization of the army, so essential, that I have embraced in the estimates for next year a sum for the purchase of horses necessary for its instruction, and for that of light infantry, and which is required by the demands of actual service and the policy of Government more than to complete the military education of the cadets.

In the general estimate of funds required for the current expenses of the Academy, has been included the cost of erecting a building for recitation and military exercises, new barracks for the military detachment stationed at the post, a barn, and public stables. The building first named has been commenced under former appropriations, and will unite under one roof a large hall for military exercises, sixteen recitation-rooms, and quarters for all the assistant professors connected with the institution. The condition of those now used for these purposes has been so fully set forth by the Board of Visitors, that no further recommendation can be wanting to enlist your favorable consideration.

Site for fortifications on Lake Champlain.—The resolution of the Senate of the 18th of April last, referred to this department, has not yet been complied with. A requisition for the survey first necessary was made on the 12th of July, and which, it is believed, has not been completed, from the officer detailed for the purpose being assigned to other duties.

Site for a fort on the Gulf coast of the Mississippi.—A requisition was made, on the 15th of July last, for a brigade of topographical engineers to make the survey in question, in order to comply with the resolution of the Senate of the 20th of April, which was referred to this department. The report of the survey has not yet been received.

Mouth of the Mississippi river.—Seventy-five thousand dollars for increasing the depth of water at the mouth of this river was appropriated by Congress at its last session, which, by the act of appropriation, required a previous survey before it could be applied. A request was made on the 12th of July that a brigade of topographical engineers should report to the engineer officer on the Gulf of Mexico for the purpose. But, having recently learned that no topographical officers could enter on the duty this fall, the whole subject has been committed to that officer.

Office of the Chief Engineer.—The business of the office has been steadily increasing for many years, and is constantly augmented by the reference of new objects provided for at each succeeding session of Congress. An idea of this increase may be gathered from the fact that, in 1823, the whole amount of funds referred for application was $520,150, and which has regularly augmented up to the present time to $3,643,271 76. The duties of the clerks have consequently so increased that a proper record of transactions cannot be kept up, and the salary allowed, while much below that in other departments whose business whether in magnitude or responsibility is believed to be no greater, is not sufficient to remunerate them for their services, or to command such as either the interest or despatch of the public business requires.

It will be seen by the foregoing report of operations, that, in many instances, no provision could be made for applying certain appropriations to the objects intended, while in others the arrangements, though the best within the control of the department, were not such as could have been wished.

The desire to fulfil the wishes of Congress led me to impose upon the officers of the department more duty than they can properly execute, and more, I am aware, than the interests of the separate works would authorize. However frequently and earnestly I have represented the impolicy of this course, I cannot refrain from bringing before you the propriety of adopting some measures, either to reduce the duties now devolved upon the department, or to enlarge its powers of action commensurate with the wants of the service. The reasons for such a step, drawn and substantiated by the annual history of operations, have been so often given that they need not now be repeated; and I will only add that, under the present organization of the corps of engineers, the wishes of Congress, so far as they depend upon this branch of the service, cannot be complied with, the public interest cannot be attended to, nor the defence of the country keep pace with the number of appropriations. Under these circumstances, I must again recommend that the number of clerks in the office be increased to seven, with salaries equal to those in the civil departments, and that the corps of engineers be doubled in its numbers.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

C. GRATIOT,
Chief Engineer.

UNITED STATES MILITARY ACADEMY.

Report of the Board of Visitors invited by the Secretary of War to attend to the general examination of the Cadets of the United States Military Academy.

Hon. LEWIS CASS, Secretary of War:

SIR: The undersigned have, in compliance with your request, attended the annual examination of the cadets at this post, and herewith report the result of their investigation.

Having been instructed by their letter of appointment to "make a full and free investigation in regard to the course of instruction, both military and scientific, to the internal police, discipline, and fiscal concerns of the institution," the Board of Visitors entered upon, and have conducted their examinations with the most rigid scrutiny. Every facility for this purpose was afforded by the officers of the institution.

In order most effectually to discharge their duty, the Board committed the different branches of their investigations to committees of their members, whose separate duty it became to examine into, 1st, the fiscal affairs; 2d, the internal police; 3d, the course of instruction; 4th, religious instruction; and, 5th, the military education and discipline of the Academy.

These several committees have submitted to the Board the result of their respective investigations; and their reports, after having been sanctioned by the entire Board, are herewith transmitted to the Secretary of War, for his more particular information upon those several objects.

1st. The fiscal affairs.—The quartermaster's and paymaster's departments were carefully examined, and satisfactory evidence furnished that the sums appropriated had been properly disbursed, with strict regard to the objects intended. The particular appropriations necessary for the year are set forth in the estimate marked A, annexed to the report of the committee, and are recommended by this Board.

The Board believed it to be their duty to examine also into the fiscal affairs of the cadets, and they are happy to express their full approval of the discipline and regulations upon this subject. Each cadet receives, in pay and rations, $28 per month, and no more. With this sum he is obliged to pay his board, and to provide all the furniture to his room, all his books, his clothing, and every necessary: the Government providing nothing for him but instruction, arms, and a room to lodge in. By a very salutary regulation, two dollars a month are reserved out of each cadet's pay, until he leaves the institution. Thus, if he is dismissed, he has the means of returning to his family; if he graduates, the means of providing himself a proper uniform. The wisdom of this provision is apparent from the fact (which this Board has satisfactorily ascertained) that the greater part of the cadets are of indigent parentage.* To preserve an entire equality among them in this respect, the regulation which forbids "any cadet to apply for or receive money or any other supply from his parents, or from any person whomsoever, without permission from the Secretary of War," is strictly enforced. Rigid economy therefore is required from the cadets, to enable them with their pay to meet the necessary demands upon their funds. They are obliged to keep accurate accounts of their expenditures, and if any of their pay remains unexpended for necessities, they are not permitted to receive it, unless for special purposes.

* Thus, in one class, (the only one we inquired of, and that selected accidentally,) we found that out of forty-eight cadets twenty-six were of parentage who were unable to give them a liberal education; and instances are within the knowledge of some of the members of this Board, where individuals from the humblest walks of life have attained the highest honors of the institution.

They are thus with great care taught lessons of order and economy, which become of the utmost value to them in after life, and which have already so distinguished the graduates of the Academy, that the experiment of making them the disbursing agents of the Government on its public works has been eminently successful. And it is, doubtless, from this cause that they present the excellent example of having disbursed millions of the public funds without a dollar's default.

This is considered by the board of visitors as the legitimate result of the course of education at the Academy. And it must be apparent to every one that the strict morality, high sense of honor, and the lessons of order and economy which they are taught, render them invaluable agents of the Government, and will compensate the nation for the very moderate expenditure which is incurred in their education.

2d. The internal police.—This comprehended, among other things, an inquiry into the provisions for the comfort and the regulations for the conduct of the cadets while in barracks pursuing their studies.

This meets the entire approval of the board.

The fare of all the cadets is precisely alike. They eat at a common table. The furniture of their rooms and their conveniences are the same. In the barracks they sleep on the floor, and on the ground when in camp. They go through guard duty in succession; and, in fine, such are the regulations and discipline, that the combination of military duties with their scientific studies is well calculated, not only to make them industrious and laborious, but to inure them to the hardships of a soldier's life.

This branch of the inquiry involved an examination into the situation of the public buildings and their fitness for the purposes intended. The accommodation for the cadets, in respect to room, is by no means adequate to their comfort. In rooms of about twelve feet square, three and four, and sometimes a greater number of cadets, are compelled to reside. These rooms are badly constructed. In winter time some of them are very cold, not having sufficient protection from the wind, and in summer some are uncomfortably warm, from an absence of ventilation. The buildings which the cadets occupy are, in fact, in no respect different from the ordinary barracks of the army, except that they are more uncomfortable and built of more unsubstantial materials. The judicious expenditure of a small sum upon this subject would, in the opinion of the board, be very desirable.

The want of accommodations for the professors and their assistants is still more manifest. The crowded state of their laboratory and philosophical rooms adds much to the labor of the instructors, and consumes much of their time. Besides this, is the hazard to which much valuable property is necessarily exposed. The philosophical apparatus and the library, which are very valuable, are now in the same building with the chemical laboratory, and, consequently, very much exposed to danger from fires. Nothing but extraordinary care has preserved them until this time, and it certainly would not excite the wonder of the board, if they should learn at an early day that they were all consumed. The expenditure of $6,000 would, in the opinion of the board, erect a suitable fire-proof building, and thus guard against the unfortunate destruction of property which could not be replaced for less than $100,000.

3d. The course of instruction.—By the regulations of the War Department for the government of the Academy, two studies are enumerated, (among those which are to be taught to the cadets,) which are entirely omitted, viz: mineralogy and geology; although among the required and necessary studies, no adequate provision has been made by law for the endowment of a professorship. All the power which the War Department has over the matter, is to detail a lieutenant of the army for duty; but as this officer cannot receive any additional compensation for this duty, he has no inducement to qualify himself for teaching. This is the cause why that branch of education has been abandoned, and it cannot probably be resumed without a special provision by law. The importance of these studies, in a military point of view, is too evident to require from the board any other expression than that of their hope that a reform in this respect will be speedily accomplished.

This, however, is not the only provision which the board deem necessary in order to place the different branches of instruction on a proper footing. The very thorough course of instruction pursued at the Academy necessarily requires a large number of instructors, seventeen of whom receive no other compensation for their services than the pay of a lieutenant in the line. That pay they would receive if with their regiments; and then they would not be subject to the arduous task now imposed on them. Consequently, a situation at this Academy is rather avoided by the officers of the army than sought after, and when once assumed is abandoned as soon as circumstances will permit; and the board has ascertained that, during the three years ending on the 1st inst. twenty-six officers have abandoned their situations at the Point, and that one professor and four assistants will leave before the end of the approaching vacation; making a change of thirty-one instructors in little more than three years. This constant change is a serious evil, and the interests of the institution certainly require a remedy.

It cannot excite the surprise of the Department that, under existing circumstances, these changes should frequently occur. Whatever may have been the education of an officer, it is no slight task to qualify himself to instruct, and properly to instruct; and it cannot be expected that any one would voluntarily assume these extra labors, when no compensation whatever is allowed for them.

Another difficulty is, that an officer, when he becomes duly qualified as an instructor, finds in civil life far greater inducements; and that class of individuals most useful to Government, from their scientific attainments, have frequent offers of three or four times their present compensation to assume the duties of some civil station. Nothing but the strong sense of obligation to the nation for their education which pervades the graduates of this institution, has prevented a more ready acceptance of these offers; and this board does not hesitate to declare its firm conviction, that if Government would allow to these individuals only one-half the remuneration which they can readily obtain in civil life for the same services, the sense of obligation to which we have alluded would retain them in the service of the nation.

The present situation of professorship of chemistry is a fair illustration of the evils of the present system. This professorship is not endowed, and this study can be taught only by detailing an officer of the army for this purpose. The present teacher receives as his entire compensation $767 per annum—not as much as he would receive if on staff duty at some other post; and although by long study and practice he may well qualify himself to teach, he is liable at any moment to be ordered to other posts; and although some of the assistant professors in other branches receive extra compensation, yet he is not allowed any, although at the head of a department and performing duties as laborious and responsible as almost any other professor.

The board of visitors feel these evils so strongly that they beg leave to suggest a representation of them to Congress, in the confident belief that there will be no hesitation among the representatives of the nation in providing the necessary remedies.

Notwithstanding all these difficulties, the course of instruction is very perfect. The cadets are taught the rationale of their studies, to think for themselves, and to apply their scientific attainments to actual practice. The periodical examinations of the cadets not only test their proficiency in their studies, but guard against the bestowal of the care of Government upon improper objects. Any one who is found unwilling or unable to undergo the hardships of his academic life, to submit to the rigid discipline of the institution, or to manifest a suitable proficiency in his studies, is dismissed. This sifting operation, if we may so call it, is productive of admirable results. Those only who are found worthy are permitted to enter the service of the nation: the unworthy are discharged.* The cadets are, in fact, part of our army. They enlist for five years, and, like other branches of the service, are promoted only when their conduct justifies it.

It became a question with this board whether this term of enlistment was long enough, and whether the privilege of resigning at the end of one year after the close of their education had not been so far abused as to deprive the Government of such benefits from the service of the graduates as would afford a just compensation for their education.

But an examination produced this result, that of the total number, 841, who had graduated, only 65 had resigned at the end of their term of enlistment.†

4th. Religious instruction.—In this branch, the education is at present necessarily deficient. The same individual is now obliged to officiate as chaplain of the post, and as instructor in rhetoric, moral philosophy, and political science. He has only one assistant; and it is physically impossible for those two individuals adequately to discharge all these duties; some of them must be, and necessarily are, neglected. The religious instruction of the cadets appears to the board to be a matter of too much importance to be neglected. The best remedy for this evil which suggests itself, would be the separation of the duties of the chaplain and professor. Next to this would be the appointment of a clerical gentleman, as an assistant in the duties both of chaplain and professor; and if neither of these is practicable, then, in the opinion of the board, an officer of the army ought to be detailed as second assistant to the professor. This improvement must commend itself to the favorable attention of the Department, by every consideration affecting the permanent welfare of the cadets.

5th. Military education and discipline.—Upon this subject, the board cannot do better than to refer to the full report made by the committee on that branch of our investigation, and to express their full concurrence in its views.

The board, however, feel themselves called upon to add their conviction of the importance of adhering strictly to the sound principles laid down by the President of the United States, in his letter of the 8th of December, 1835, in relation to Cadet Hammond. The restoration of cadets to the Academy, after their dismissal for incompetency or misconduct, is not only subversive of the necessary discipline of the post, but must result in the application of the bounty of the Government to unworthy objects. This board believed it to be within the proper range of their inquiries to ascertain how far the regulations of, and mode of education at, West Point conformed to the objects for which the Academy was instituted. They supposed the institution was "designed not only as a school in which the youth of the United States are to be instructed in the art of war, but they are, in all cases of exigence, to serve as an actual defence to the community." This object seems to be kept constantly in view.

The school is strictly military in its character, instructing the young men in the art of war and fitting them to defend our country.

It is believed to be true, as a general rule, that some previous education is necessary to qualify a man to exercise the art of war. (To this, as to every other general rule, there are doubtless brilliant exceptions.) If, in those rude days when every battle was but a series of single combats, and when brute force and physical courage were the only qualifications of a soldier, long and arduous training was an indispensable prerequisite, how much more is it necessary now, when war has become a science, and when the mental more than the physical qualities of man determine the issue of the contest. When this science, unlike all others, shall so change its nature as to be imbibed by intuition, then, and not till then, can a country, extensive as ours is, and almost surrounded by savage and intractable enemies, and in its rapid prosperity coming in collision with the interests of powerful nations, dispense with at least such preparations for war as naturally will flow from the education of a portion of our youth for this special purpose.

This board is free to express its opinion that this Academy is admirably calculated and conducted for the attainment of this end. All its studies and practices are essentially military, involving at once a knowledge of the science, and an habitation to the hardships of the war, so that, in case of actual conflict, we have the nucleus of an army, and a satisfactory guarantee against the misfortunes which visited our arms at the commencement of the last war with Great Britain; and in peace we have a well-trained band of officers devoted to the service of the country, capable of defending our frontiers and extending our fortifications, of carrying on our great system of internal improvement, of guarding us against the impositions of foreign empires; but, above all, of developing and calling into action the undiscovered resources of our new States.

These are advantages which we believe do necessarily flow from this institution. They can be attained only by arduous and indefatigable labor on the part of cadets and teachers. This labor cannot be produced without adequate inducements. To this end, Government must provide for the education. Unless it does, the poorer classes will be deprived of the advantages of such instructions, and the richer will discover no motive for undergoing the hardships necessary to its attainment.

These advantages are happily combined in this institution, and, with the fostering care of the Government, may easily be made to conduce to the permanent welfare of the whole nation.

In conclusion, the board of visitors earnestly recommend this institution to the care and attention of the Government. Their examination affords them ample reason to know that the intention of the nation in regard to it is faithfully executed. "The instructors teach in defiance of obstacles," and the graduates, after a most searching and rigid scrutiny, have evinced a knowledge of their profession which † This examination further showed that, of 220 cadets who had, from the first organization of the Academy till 1835, either resigned, declined a commission in the army, or been dropped, 20 left the army one year after their graduation, 45 the second year, 28 the third year, 28 the fourth year, 13 the fifth year, 11 the sixth year, 8 the seventh year, 13 the eighth year, 7 the ninth year, 9 the eleventh year, 4 the twelfth year, 8 the thirteenth year, 4 the fourteenth year, 6 the fifteenth year, 5 the sixteenth year, 5 the seventeenth year, 1 in the eighteenth year, 1 in the nineteenth year, 1 in the twenty-first year, and 1 in the twenty-third year. And of the residue of the number of graduates, 403 still remained in the service of the country, 15 had been killed in battle, and 106 had died in the service.

Fiscal Affairs.

The committee appointed by the board of visitors to inquire into the fiscal concerns of the Military Academy, report:

That they were referred to the quartermaster's department, as the place where the superintendent transacted the moneyed affairs of the institution; that they there examined the books and accounts exhibiting the appropriations made at different times, and the manner in which they had been disbursed; that they viewed the chapel and other works not yet completed; the design, size, and arrangement, were well adapted to the situation and objects intended.

Your committee also proceeded to the paymaster's department; they there discovered that moneys originating from the rents of lots, and from wood, hoop-poles, &c., taken from the land connected with the establishment, making about $700 for the year 1835, was carried to the post fund. The important branch of the paymaster's duties consist in his being treasurer for paying the cadets. Each cadet receives $16 and rations worth $12, making $28 per month; and purchases at the store such articles as the superintendent thinks proper, and at prices fixed by a board of officers. The storekeeper is obliged to furnish each cadet with an account-book, and enter in that book, at the time of delivering, the articles furnished. The cadet keeps this book; settles with the treasurer. This regulation seems to be rigidly enforced. Whilst it protects the cadet from undue advantage, it teaches him system and attention to his own concerns.

There has been appropriated $20,000 for the erection of a building for military exercises in winter. Of this sum a part remains unexpended, and the superintendent estimates that $25,000 more will be necessary for this object for the present year. It is evident that a building of this kind is very necessary for the comfort and health of the cadets, as they must at times neglect their necessary exercises, or take them exposed to the inclemencies of the seasons.

In addition to that, the superintendent has forwarded to the committee an estimate of funds required for the service of the United States Military Academy for the year 1836, (marked A,) and herewith submitted, embracing many objects which are deemed by him, and considered by us, very important. We believe that a small institution like this is necessary in our extended and growing country. When the military system is generally neglected, in case of emergency and necessity (which we cannot expect, whatever we may desire, to be always exempt from) there may be those of our countrymen at hand, and settled through our population, able to impart the required instruction. We take pleasure in stating that our investigations have conducted us to the conclusion that those intrusted with the charge of the instruction here have been faithful and economical, and that nothing is wanted to make the Military Academy of great national advantage but a patronage, the cost of which would be small when compared with other matters perhaps not more indispensable to the welfare and honor of the country.

Internal Police.

Mr. President: The committee to whom was referred the subject of police, in pursuance of the duty assigned them, have visited the hospital, barracks, and other buildings designed for the use and accommodation of the cadets at West Point, and beg leave to state the following facts:

The hospital contains eight rooms for the accommodation of the sick, the whole of which, they are happy to state, have never been tenanted: a strong evidence of the healthful situation of the establishment, particularly when accompanied by the report of the surgeon, who states that his sick report does not exceed an average of five; and a majority of these ephemeral cases of slight headache, or something of that character. On the subject of the barracks, your committee would beg leave to state the following facts: The rooms of the south building are entirely too small, and the openings have been made without regard to the prevailing winds of winter, and hence the rooms are cold and comfortless during the inclement season. Your committee would also suggest the propriety of making the rooms spoken of single. The rooms in the north building are larger, better adapted for the purpose they were designed. Your committee, however, disapprove of the course pursued in the practice of putting four, and even five, young gentlemen into one room; a practice at once unfavorable to morals and industry, and which nothing but necessity can excuse. The commons or boarding we found highly to be commended.

The room appropriated for the professor of natural philosophy, we found wholly unfit for the purpose. This room is small, and unprovided with seats for the class, or any competent provision for securing the instruments, which are fine. Upon examining this room, our admiration of the extent and accuracy of knowledge exhibited by the class during examination, was much heightened, together with astonishment at the patience and labor the professor must have displayed in communicating such varied knowledge, so confined in point of space as hardly to be able to use any of his instruments with facility.

The professor of chemistry labors under all the inconveniences above described, and nothing but a determination to instruct in defiance of obstacles could have enabled either of these gentlemen to have brought forward pupils so well prepared as the unanimous testimony of the board of visitors justify your committee in reporting them to have been.

One fact your committee lament to have become acquainted with. The professor of chemistry, whose labors have been so profitable to his young pupils, has had no provision made for salary, and has done all his duties without compensation. This surely should not be. Your committee beg, in closing this report, to state that the rooms referred to are under one roof, as is also the library. Thus, public property to a very large amount is in the most unsafe condition imaginable, exposed constantly to destruction by fire; and as the present building is unfit for the use to which it is appropriated, they beg to suggest the propriety of erecting a building fire-proof, and more suitably arranged; the cost of such a building would not exceed $6,000.

LEWIS MARSHALL, Chairman.

Course of Instruction.

Although somewhat foreign to, and only indirectly connected with, the part assigned them, the committee on the course of instruction, from a sense of that duty which they owe to the cadets and professors, to themselves and to their country, feel bound to express, not only their satisfaction with the evidence which has in the course of the examination been afforded of the talents, the accuracy, and the progress of those examined, and of the ability and faithfulness of their instructors, but to add that their anticipations have been more than realized. They feel themselves justified in declaring it as their belief that the progress and accuracy of the cadets examined (numbers being equal) cannot be surpassed by the students of any of the literary institutions of our country. This declaration rests upon and proceeds from a knowledge of the subject-matter of the examination, as well as from a comparison of this with similar examinations to which, either for reasons resulting from the nature of their office, or from other relations in society, they have been called to attend. When this committee look into and examine the course of instruction originally designed to be pursued and perfected, they are forcibly struck with the wisdom displayed in the selection and arrangement of the studies therein embraced. Their adaptation, as far as they go, to the exigencies and situation of the Government, must be apparent to all who will take the time and subject themselves to the trouble of even a superficial examination. The importance and even the necessity of an institution to teach those branches of science immediately connected with the military defence of the country was perceived and acknowledged at an early period. To these, other branches were added, and in a few years the course of instruction, to its present extent, was adopted.

The committee regret that more liberal provisions had not been enacted, by which the present plan could have been carried into full and successful operation; but this, like all other institutions, the nature and effects of which can at first be but imperfectly understood, appears to have been placed in a condition to await the success of experiment. The situation of the financial concerns of the Government at the time, might perhaps serve in some degree as an apology for the contracted and uncertain provision made. Were, however, the studies originally selected and designed to be taught in this institution pursued and attended to, prudence might have forbid the utterance of any complaint at this time; but inasmuch as some of the studies are entirely omitted, and inasmuch as those omitted are of vital importance in relation both to the literary character of the institution itself and to the beneficial influence anticipated from its establishment and operation, the committee must express their deep regret that such a state of things exists, and at the same time express a hope that it will be changed by the Government, making such appropriations as will warrant the employment of professors qualified to teach and instruct the members of the institution in the different branches of mineralogy and geology. These are the studies omitted, and the committee are sorry to add, omitted for want of funds to support the necessary number of professors. Surely in these days, when improvements of almost every kind are so rapidly advancing onward to perfection, causing the desert to blossom as the rose, and the wilderness to wave with the golden harvest, this committee need not consume their time in illustrating and proving the importance of these branches. Suffice it to say that the farmer, the mechanic, the professional man, yea, every department of society, must feel and acknowledge their importance and utility; and while they are a national advantage, they are also a nation's glory, the splendor of which can never shine with a lustre so pure or so extensive as a Government like ours. Were the committee further to indulge in argument to illustrate and prove their importance and utility, they would especially turn their attention to the vast regions of newly-acquired territory, and to those yet more extensive regions from which the savage must, before long, recede, the profitable exploration of which necessarily demands the aid of those sciences. Besides, it ought to be borne in mind that this institution was designed not merely to make soldiers for the defence of the country, but with this character to unite that of the scholar, the gentleman, and virtuous citizen; and where is the individual who will not acknowledge that, while the present prescribed mode of instruction reflects the highest honor on the wisdom and patriotism of those who laid the plan, it has placed the country in an attitude, in relation to the condition of its armies, which commands not only the respect and approbation of our own citizens, but the admiration of other nations! The committee do not say too much, when they assert that this institution has produced the most salutary effects upon the military department, in point of intelligence, morality, gentlemanly and orderly conduct, as well as upon the skill and discipline, connected with the art of war, which ought with all, and is with every patriot and lover of his country, a subject-matter of national pride and a source of the purest gratification; for in this way it has been the lot of our Government to prove to the world that it is practicable, with perfect safety to all our political institutions, to establish and carry into successful operation plans of education and improvement by which the physical and intellectual and moral strength of our Government is at the same time increased. From these facts, the committee, before they close, must express their regret at the apparent deficiency that exists in this institution on subjects properly included under the head of rhetoric, which is professed to be taught. The committee refer to the subjects of English grammar, and more especially accuracy in pronouncing and distinctness in enunciation. These defects pervade in a greater or less degree every class and every section of the different classes. Under the head of rhetoric, as given in detail by the professors, these distinct parts are specified; yet when the committee examine the authors or text-books used for the purpose of teaching and explaining all the parts of what is generally known and included under the head of English grammar, they find that Dr. Blair's Lectures stand alone, and alone are used as a text-book. The committee feel very confident that from the mode of teaching rhetoric as systematized by Dr. Blair, and adopted by all who follow his footsteps, but little information can be given or received, without more than common labor, as to those subjects in relation to which they complain of apparent deficiency. In examining into the cause of this state of things, the committee discovered that only a principal and one assistant, owing to the state of the funds, were employed in teaching rhetoric, moral philosophy, and political science, while at the same time the duties of chaplain devolved upon and were discharged by the principal. This explains satisfactorily to the committee the existing cause of the deficiencies complained of, and entirely exempts the professors in this department from the charge of delinquency. These, however, are deficiencies which must be removed. Their existence, more than any others, must tend to affect the literary character of the institution as well as that of the cadet. The reason is obvious. The English language is, and probably will continue to be, the language employed in all the various spheres and departments of life; and, at the same time, the knowledge of its grammatical construction is more widely diffused; consequently an error in giving to a syllable its proper accent or to a vowel its proper sound, strikes the ear, awakens the attention, and even incurs the censure of the tyro himself, whose organs of senses as a guide generally supersede the reasoning faculty, but in these cases are a sure and safe criterion. The committee, therefore, recommend that a distinct professorship of elocution be added to the institution; and that, if practicable, this addition be made at an early period. Should the addition of such a professor be impracticable, the committee would suggest the propriety of separating the duties of chaplain from that of professor of moral philosophy, and that the time thereby acquired be employed in instructing the cadets on the subject of elocution. As handmaids and special helps to the progress and accuracy of the members of the institution in obtaining an understanding of their own language, the committee would not only recommend but urge upon the professors the exercises of writing composition at least once in two weeks, and public speaking as often, leaving the delivery of the speeches, as to their publicity, to the discretion of the various instructors, whether they shall be before a whole class, or one section of said class, or before all the classes collected. This will be best and most profitably arranged by adopting the progress and perfection of the student as the guide.

The committee have made these suggestions in relation to the English language in the mode set forth, because they believe that the one or other of these modes would, with greater facility than any other, be adopted, and more speedily carried into operation. The plan of a preparatory school has been suggested. Such an institution the committee feel convinced would aid much in removing existing difficulties, so far as the time and labor of instructors, consisting only of the present number, are objects of consideration, and in point of economy itself would ultimately best comport with the limited state of the funds set apart for the benefit of the institution. Besides, by this plan, one of the purposes, and by no means the least in importance, to wit: to bring to light and into successful and useful exercise the talents of young men which otherwise poverty would conceal or obstruct, must be answered. And here the committee take the liberty, and embrace this opportunity, to denounce the popular prejudice that this institution is for the benefit of the rich, and in its operations confers its favors exclusively on this class. The philanthropy and patriotism and wisdom of the individuals who devised the plan of instruction, and have aided in raising the institution to its present state of perfection, and existing facts themselves, forbid, and with all intelligent and impartial men will effectually prevent, an opinion so inconsistent with the nature of our institutions from entering the mind. But to return to our subject: granting for a moment, what may be the case, that any or all of the plans suggested by the committee would necessarily increase the expenditures, and consequently require from the Government larger appropriations, at no time will this objection be made by the man who understands the nature and properly appreciates the principles of his Government; for he knows and believes that "intelligence is the life of civil liberty," and he, too, knows and believes that literature and the light of science are necessary to give a proper direction to the physical strength which a nation possesses, and are equally necessary and useful in appointing and fixing the bounds or limits within which the same strength ought to be restrained. More especially ought such an objection at this time, whether we consider the situation of many parts of our country, or the state of the treasury, to have no weight. The truth is, that the objection is only used as a cloak for a principle which, in its operation, must subvert that order and dissolve those relations in society which have long existed, and which, although in some instances they are the result of circumstances in which the individuals have had no agency, yet will generally be found, upon an accurate investigation, to be the result of individual merit and enterprise. In the days of Cromwell it was appropriately called the levelling system. In a Government like ours, the great object ought to be to increase its physical and intellectual strength; by the selection of objects whose talents, improved by education, will increase the physical strength of the nation, and shed more extensively the light of science, without regard to the condition of said objects, whether noble or ignoble, high or low, rich or poor. That such is the theory and practice of this institution, its present condition and the circumstances of its members most conclusively prove. If these things then be so, objections on the score of increased expenditures are not even the small dust of the balance. In conclusion, this committee do therefore not only recommend but urge the importance and utility of placing the opportunities of literary attainments and the salaries of the teachers and professors selected to assist and direct the youth to this object, upon an equal footing, as to the branches of education omitted and herein recommended, with the first literary institutions of our country. Independent of the consideration that such a plan might be expected to allay the opposition, and diminish the ground occupied by the enemies of the institution, the committee verily believe that such a plan is the best calculated to promote the prosperity and advance the true interest of the country, while it will necessarily shed an additional lustre on our national character.

All which is respectfully submitted.

JOHN MUSHAT, Chairman.

June 17, 1836.

Religious Instruction.

The committee appointed to inquire into the course of religious instruction at the United States Military Academy, have attended to the duty assigned them, and ask leave to report:

That they are impressed with the paramount importance of morality and religion to the young men of this institution. They should go forth to the active duties to which their country may call them, with minds not only stored with useful knowledge, but deeply imbued with Christian principles, to be their shield from the fiery darts of temptation, their friendly aid through all the warfare of life, and their final passport at the gates of heaven.

The utility of such instruction is recognised on the part of the Government by the appointment of a chaplain—an appointment which the friends of these intelligent and interesting youth (now removed from the immediate beneficial influences of parental restraint and counsel, and from the Christian privileges of their childhood) must, with your committee, regard as a salutary and desirable provision.

It must, however, be apparent to every reflecting mind, that the benevolent design of the Government, and the wishes of the friends of the Academy, cannot be fully realized without the frequent inculcation of Divine truth.

But the committee find that there are no daily prayers at the Academy, and that the whole course of religious instruction is confined in one service on the Sabbath. Besides the pulpit exercises, there are other duties which the chaplain might profitably perform, if time and his other duties would permit. But the chaplain is also professor of ethics, and, in this department, is required to teach English grammar, rhetoric, moral philosophy, and the elements of political science, including the law of nations, and the constitutional law of the United States, and his time must necessarily be much engrossed with these various subjects: the committee would therefore unanimously recommend that a respectful suggestion be made to the Secretary of War to separate the chaplaincy from the professorship, or, if this cannot conveniently be done, to appoint an additional assistant in the department of ethics, under the general superintendence of the chaplain, that the time of the latter may not be occupied daily with the sections, but more exclusively devoted to the religious welfare of the cadets.

The committee would not omit, in conclusion, the fact that the conveniences of public worship are increased by the completion of a neat chapel, which has been opened during the session of the board of visitors.

Respectfully submitted.

G. F. DAVIS, Chairman.

U. S. MILITARY ACADEMY, June 14, 1836.

Military Education and Discipline.

The committee on military affairs, after giving the various subjects under consideration all the attention which the short time given them, arising from the new organization of the committee on the 15th, would permit, have deemed it their duty to confine themselves to the subjects most closely allied to the military departments in the Academy, and have therefore selected from the various military branches which are or should be taught, the following material on which to found their report, viz: civil and military engineering, cavalry, artillery, and infantry tactics, together with some suggestions as to improvements in the ordnance and fixtures. The vast importance of the first-named science, whether as applicable to the "art of war" for permanent defence on our extended frontier and seaboard, or in extending the incalculable benefits of civil engineering to every section of our infant yet boundless country, renders this science, in the estimation of your committee, one of paramount consideration. It will add permanency and architectural beauty to our public works and buildings. It will facilitate the construction of railroads and canals, the formation and improvement of harbors and roadsteads, and removal of obstacles in our otherwise navigable rivers, and in every point in which those branches of science are here taught and disseminated through each State and to every section of our extended and rapidly improving country can be viewed, must, in the opinion of your committee, satisfy even the most sceptical that the benefits of this institution, in these points of view alone, are incalculably great. Much credit is due Professor Mahan for the standing those branches maintain, and for accomplishing so much with but one assistant professor, and a great deficiency of models.

Your committee would strenuously recommend that a permanent additional professor be added to this department; and for the purpose of completing a set of models, which are so indispensable in studying this science, (as they speak direct to the eye), recommend the annual appropriation of $500 for five years.

One of the "three arms of service," your committee deeply regret to perceive, is not taught in the Academy. In any light in which this subject can be reflected, cavalry must be deemed of the highest importance. Our present Indian war tells this in language that cannot be misunderstood. Celerity of movement against such enemies on our almost boundless prairies is so obviously important, that your committee cannot restrain an expression of astonishment that instruction in this important branch of the "art of war" should have been so long withheld from this institution. Can the graduate stand before the world, and have the proud consciousness that he is, in fact, a "soldier," while he is a stranger to an important arm of the service to which he is attached, and which is an indispensable to a staff or dragoon officer, to which place in the service he may be at any moment called? And should the introduction of cavalry tactics in this institution be the incipient step to an entire precedence of the graduate over civilians, (except in very extraordinary cases,) for appointments in the new cavalry regiments, your committee will have accomplished an object which is founded in common justice to the "thorough-bred soldier," and which will immediately tend to render the service more permanent and respectable.

Your committee, therefore, strongly recommend that forty horses be purchased, and kept at this post, for practising cavalry evolutions, as well as for manœuvring the field battery, which is now performed by the cadets, and which is an extremely arduous duty.

The department of artillery received from your committee the special consideration which its importance demands. The graduating class evinced great proficiency, not only in the examination-hall, but also in the laboratory, as well as the manœuvres of the battery in the field, mortar-practice, and target-firing. Great credit is due to Lieutenant Anderson, the instructor in this department, for conducting the graduates so creditably through this complicated science, and in the absolute want of several fixtures essentially requisite to the successful prosecution of it. To put this department on a proper footing, your committee unite in recommending the appointment of a permanent assistant instructor. The aid now given Lieutenant Anderson is that of a temporary detail from the army. Such aid is deemed by your committee wholly inadequate in this important branch of instruction.

The following munitions and fixtures are deemed absolutely necessary in this department, and are strongly urged by your committee for immediate adoption, viz:

1. A light field battery of four or six pound brass guns, and two howitzers.
2. A light battery of twelve-pound iron guns and a twenty-four pound howitzer.
3. Four siege mortars, mounted on iron beds.
4. One new eprouvette.
5. Two barbette twenty-four pound guns.
6. A quantity of good projectiles, solid and hollow.

24th Cong. 2d Sess.]

Documents accompanying the President's Message.

7. A ballistic pendulum.
8. Models of congreve rockets, tools, &c.
9. The erection of a target at the foot of the "Crow's nest," or elsewhere, for target-firing.
10. A casemate defence.
11. Barbette and mortar batteries and platform.

The whole will cost an inconsiderable sum in comparison with the advantages to be derived.

Your committee do not feel themselves competent to make a correct estimate of the cost, and leave, with great confidence, this matter in the hands of the superintendent.

In infantry tactics, the most desirable result was developed, both in the examination-hall and in the field. Each cadet of the first class was thoroughly examined in evolutions of the line and battalion in the hall; and with a view to ascertain correctly whether a corresponding field practice had been given to the students, a battalion drill was ordered, the direction of which was promptly tendered to your committee, who proceeded to call from the lines to take command of the battalion as instructors. A number of the cadet officers, of various rank, (without previous notice) received directions from your committee as to the evolutions to be performed. The result gave the most unqualified satisfaction. Your committee would here take occasion to recommend to the instructor of infantry tactics to throw each cadet of the first class occasionally in command, with a view to qualify him for that station which each graduate must assume on entering the army. This department is successfully conducted by Major Fowle, who requires an additional assistant instructor of tactics, for the following important reason: The necessary division of the battalion into four companies renders four instructors (one to each company) necessary. There being but three, your committee strongly recommend such an appointment with as little delay as possible, as his services will be immediately required, and are very important during the encampment.

In conclusion, your committee would do injustice to themselves, the superintendent, professors, and instructors generally, did they not express their unqualified satisfaction at the manner in which each department which came under their supervision is managed. From the superintendent down, all vie with each other to surmount obstacles, and to maintain that high standing for the institution which it truly merits. Some of the obstacles would be removed if the recommendations and improvements suggested by your committee are carried into effect; and in submitting this report, they are bound to say they have been cautious to recommend nothing not absolutely necessary to a perfectly successful prosecution of the various branches of science submitted to their consideration.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Letter of the President of the United States in relation to Cadet Hammond's restoration to the Military Academy.

WASHINGTON, December 8, 1835.

Cadet Hammond will be restored to the Military Academy after the 1st day of January next, if he shall then be found competent to enter the class he left.

In directing this restoration, however, I am influenced more by a regard to the remission of punishments which has recently taken place at the Military Academy, and which may have induced Cadet Hammond to think lightly of the offence he committed, than to any extenuating circumstances in his case. He has been guilty of a serious military offence. A proper subordination is essential in all the departments of the army. As it is the duty, so should it be the pride, of the young gentlemen at the Military Academy, to obey the laws, regulations, and orders for the government of that institution.

The very improper proceedings which took place, and which led to the conviction of Cadet Hammond, are highly censurable. If the cadets experience injuries from any person at the Military Academy, whether in authority or not, the regulations point out the mode in which redress shall be obtained. This must be pursued, and it will always be found effectual. But, if they undertake to decide in their own cases, and tumultuously to seek their own remedy, it is obvious that the discipline of the Academy, and the institution itself, would be destroyed. This will never be suffered. In this case, the proceedings were marked with another extraordinary feature. A claim seems to have been interposed, and in fact practically asserted, to carry from the commons certain victuals, which, if not consumed at the table, belonged to the contractor, and the resolutions passed in support of this claim appear to be as grave as if some unalienated principle of human nature were to be wrested from these young gentlemen. All this is in very bad taste, and, what is still worse, it is wrong in itself. I need not point out the error of the pretensions set up by these young gentlemen. I am sure they will perceive it at once in their moments of reflection.

I had hoped that a lenient system of administration would be found sufficient for the government of the Military Academy. But I have been disappointed, and it is now time to be more rigorous in enforcing its discipline. If the young gentlemen who are sent and educated there by their country will not demean themselves as they are required to do by the regulations, they must suffer the prescribed punishments. Hereafter, therefore, the sentences of courts martial will, when legal and regular, be confirmed; and the punishment will be remitted only in cases recommended by them, or where the circumstances may appear so very favorable as to justify such a measure.

But the members of the institution must make no calculations on a favorable result. Let them look to their obligations and fulfil them faithfully. Unless they do, they must expect to be visited by adequate punishments.

That these views may be known, the Secretary of War will communicate this order to the superintendent of the Military Academy, who will cause the same to be promulgated there.

ANDREW JACKSON.

REPORT FROM THE TOPOGRAPHICAL BUREAU.

TOPOGRAPHICAL BUREAU,

Washington, November 15, 1836.

The Hon. B. F. BUTLER, Secretary of War.

SIR: In obedience to your orders of the 9th of September last, I have the honor of submitting to you the following statements and report:

1. Statement A, exhibiting the amount required for the current expenses of the topographical engineer service for surveys for the year 1837.

This statement embraces estimates for two objects—one for military surveys on the coast and frontier, $15,000; the other for surveys under the act passed 30th of April, 1824, $30,000.

2. Statement B, exhibiting the amount required for the Topographical bureau for the same period.

This statement embraces the pay for clerks, the pay for a messenger, and the sum required for the contingent expenses of the office, amounting to $4,335.

With this statement are two submitted items—one in reference to the compensation to be paid to the first clerk. At present his compensation is fixed at $1,000, but it is entirely disproportioned to the intelligence required, the labor which has to be performed, or to the amount paid to other clerks similarly situated in other offices. From these considerations, an increase in his salary of $400 per year is respectfully recommended. The other is in reference to the messenger. His compensation, at present, is $500 per year. The general compensation to messengers in the various offices, is $700. Now, in this office there is but one messenger, who, in addition to his general out-door duties, has to attend to three rooms. Viewing his situation, then, in reference to his labors, the estimate of similar services in the public offices generally, and the great increase in the prices of all the necessities of life, his present compensation is entirely inadequate; and it is respectfully recommended that the same should be raised to $700.

3. Statement C is an exhibit of the amount transmitted to the disbursing officers of this bureau from the 1st day of October, 1835, to the 30th day of September, 1836, and of the amount for which accounts have been received for the same period.

4. Statement D is an exhibit of the expenditure of the contingent fund.

5. I am also directed by your letter to exhibit statements of the manner in which the appropriations of the last session of Congress for objects under the direction of this bureau have been applied, the present condition of these objects, and also to exhibit a general view of the operations of the bureau since the last annual report.

6. That part of this direction which relates to the manner in which appropriations have been applied, will be found exhibited in the statement C; and that which relates to the present condition of those objects, and to a general view of the operations of this bureau, will be found in the subsequent remarks.

7. The duties of the bureau consist in all surveys required to be made for the Government, or by its orders; and also in the superintending of such constructions as the War Department shall assign to it.

8. Surveys.—These have been somewhat limited during the last year, in consequence of the want of an enlargement of the corps, the lateness of the period at which the appropriation bills were passed, and the great want of officers with the troops in the field on the frontiers. Early in the season, the necessities of the army were such, that it was found proper to withdraw from topographical duty the greater part of the officers of the army who were then assigned to that duty; and lately, from the same cause, all those who had been previously left, have been withdrawn and ordered to join their respective companies.

In addition to this, eight of the officers of the corps of topographical engineers (the whole corps consists of but ten) have been ordered to join the troops in the South and Northwestern frontier. From which it will be readily perceived that the means of this bureau, for the execution of its duties, have been greatly limited, and, of consequence, its operations.

9. These operations have been as follows:

10. A partial survey of a line for a railroad on the Eastern Shore of Maryland, on an application and at the expense of that State.—The officer in charge of this duty being ordered to the frontier, it is doubtful if he can be ready with his report, plan, and estimate, before he will have to leave. Every exertion will, however, be made to accomplish the work in time to prevent the disappointment which would otherwise result.

11. The survey, plan, and estimate of a route for a railroad from Belfast, in the State of Maine, to unite with a railroad from the Canada line to Quebec.

12. The survey of the Androscoggin river from the falls at Brunswick to the Kennebec.

13. The survey of the ledge of rocks at Owl's-head harbor.

14. The survey of the passage into Cobscook bay.

Nos. 11, 12, 13, and 14, are under the superintendence of the same officer. The first two are made on the application and at the expense of the authorities of the State of Maine; the last two in pursuance of laws of the last session of Congress. The whole are incomplete. The service required of the officer superintending these surveys, as well as of his assistants, with the troops on the frontier, rendered it necessary that they should be ordered there.

15. The survey of Crow shoal, Delaware bay, with a view to the construction of a breakwater and artificial harbor, in pursuance of a law of the last session of Congress.—This survey is incomplete. The officer in charge of the same, with his assistants, being required with the troops on the frontier.

16. The survey, plans, and estimates, and the construction of various routes for railroads in the States of New York, Connecticut, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and North Carolina.—These duties are on the application and at the expense of the authorities and parties interested, and are under the superintendence of one officer; but his services being required with the troops on the frontier, he has been ordered to join them.

17. The survey, plan, and estimate of a route for a railroad from Pensacola, Florida, to Columbus, Georgia, on the application and at the expense of the authorities of Florida and of parties interested.

18. The survey of the coast of the State of Mississippi, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate.

These two surveys were under the same officer, but his services being required with the troops in the field in Florida, he has been ordered to join them.

19. The survey of the coast.—The officer of the corps heretofore on that duty is still retained upon it.

20. The survey, plan, and estimate of the route for a railroad from Charleston, South Carolina, to Cincinnati, Ohio.—This survey has been partially made, and is on the application and at the expense of the authorities and parties interested, but, as the services of the officer superintending the same, and his military assistants, were required with the troops on the frontier, he and his assistants have been ordered to join them.

21. The survey of a part of Lake Champlain, with a view to its military defences, in consequence of a resolution of the Senate.—This survey is partially made, but as the officer and his assistants were required with the troops on the frontier, they have been ordered to join them.

22. The survey of the mouth of the Mississippi, with a view to an improvement of the entrance of that river, by direction of a law of the last session of Congress.—No order has yet been taken on this subject. As the season approached in which field operations in that quarter became practicable, the wants of the troops in the field left this bureau without an officer to assign to that duty.

By reference to the reports on plans for improving the entrance of this river, it will be seen that it is a subject replete with difficulties, and which could be entrusted only to an experienced and highly-informed engineer.

23. The survey of the bar and harbor of Georgetown, S. C., by virtue of the law of the last session of Congress.—No order has yet been taken on this survey; the reason, there is no officer whatever to assign to it. This perhaps may not be considered so much a matter of regret, as the amount appropriated for the survey is entirely inadequate to its execution, or even to a judicious commencement.

The amount appropriated in the law is one thousand dollars. This bureau is not aware by whom or on what authority the estimate for this amount was made; but being well satisfied of its inadequacy to the object contemplated, and with a view of determining this point, the question of an estimate was referred, in September last, to an officer of great experience in hydrographic surveys, as well as in the particular locality of this survey, having some years since been employed on, and partially completed, a survey of Georgetown harbor.

His estimate for the survey of the bar, and for as much as is yet requisite to complete the survey of the harbor, amounts to the sum of $4,384.

24. The survey of the mouth of the river Connecticut with a view to its improvement.—The officer of this corps who is on a survey of the coast, has also had this survey assigned to him; and the plan, report, and estimate, are expected to be completed in time to be laid before Congress at an early period.

25. The survey, plan, estimate, and location of the route of a canal from Georgetown, D. C., to Annapolis, in Maryland, on the application and at the expense of the authorities of that State.—This will be completed during the present season.

26. The survey of the head-waters of Chesapeake bay, directed by a law of the last session of Congress.—This survey will be completed in time to be laid before Congress at an early period during the ensuing session.

27. The survey, plan, and estimate of the route for a railroad in the State of Missouri, on the application and at the expense of the parties interested in the same.—This survey will be completed this season.

28. The survey of the St. Francis, Black, and White rivers, in Missouri and Arkansas, by virtue of a law of the last session of Congress, and with a view to the removal of the rafts on said rivers.—This duty is now in execution, but it is doubted if the appropriation will prove adequate to the survey of the three rivers.

29. The survey of the harbor of Richmond, Virginia, with a view to its improvement.—The plan, report, and estimate of this survey will be done in time to be laid before Congress at an early period.

30. The geological investigations authorized in the Territories, public lands, and in the Indian country, are being made with the vigor and intelligence which have always characterized the labors of Mr. Featherstonhaugh; and interesting reports are anticipated from him during the course of the ensuing winter, in reference to the country now occupied by the Cherokees.

The report of the investigations of the past year has been received since the last annual report, and duly submitted to Congress. It has been printed by order of the Senate, and will show the advantages and extent of such examinations.

Its value is much enhanced by interesting maps of a part of the country which had been hitherto but little explored.

31. Constructions.—The various works of construction assigned to this bureau being placed, (with two exceptions,) in consequence of the want of officers, under civil agents, they will not, on that account, be exposed to the interruptions consequent upon the necessity of sending the officers to the troops in the field.

These works are—

32. The opening of a road from the State line of Alabama, through Marianna, to Appalachicola.—This road was authorized by a law of Congress of 30th of June, 1834; but as the survey and plan had first to be made and approved, some time had to be necessarily occupied in these preliminary operations. It is, however, in a state of active progress. The officer in charge of this work has been lately ordered to join the troops in Florida, but as he will be at times in the vicinity of the work, he can still bestow his attention upon it; it will not therefore be suspended. The amount required to complete this road is estimated at $20,313.

33. All the constructions under this bureau, except No. 31, are the result of laws of the last session. But the lateness of the period when the appropriation bills were passed, and the time lost before civil agents having some knowledge of these matters could be obtained, have of necessity limited the operations to the mere beginning of the works and to the procuring of materials.

34. The building of a breakwater or pier at the harbor of Burlington, Vermont.—Arrangements for the collecting of materials have been made; and it has been already ascertained that the increase in the prices of materials and labor, over those which were relied upon when the estimate was made upon which the appropriation was founded, will occasion a proportional and considerable increase in the cost of the work. The original estimate was made upon the prices of 1833, and amounts to $28,727.

The estimate of the present year has not yet been received from the agent; but, on consulting with the officer who had been placed in the position of inspector of the works on that lake, reasoning from analogy in reference to the increase in the prices of labor and materials and from the necessity of making a stronger work than appears to have been contemplated in the first instance, it is doubted if the improvement can be accomplished at a less cost than fifty thousand dollars. The amount appropriated was $10,000; leaving yet to be provided the sum of $40,000.

35. The deepening of the channel between the North and South Hero islands, Lake Champlain, State of Vermont.—Several large isolated rocks have been removed from this channel, but the general operations requiring the use of a dredging-machine, of which there is none on the lake, it became necessary to have one constructed. It is now being made, and will be ready for use early the next spring.

The appropriation for this work was founded upon an estimate of prices collected in 1834. It is not improbable that it will also be affected by the late and general increase in the prices of labor and materials. The estimate was for $25,669; the amount appropriated was $15,000, leaving a balance required for the next season of $10,669, which is probably as much as can be judiciously expended during the next season.

36. The building of a breakwater or pier at the harbor of Plattsburg, Lake Champlain, State of New York.—Materials for this work are now being collected. The estimate upon which the appropriation is founded was made in 1833, and amounted to $24,003. That upon present prices of labor and materials has not yet been received; but, from reasons similar to those stated in No. 34, it is doubted if the ultimate cost of the work for this harbor can be placed at a less sum than $45,000. The appropriation was for $10,000, leaving a deficiency to be provided amounting to $35,000.

37. The improvement of the harbor of White Hall, Lake Champlain, State of New York.—There was no plan for this improvement, and no previous survey having been made, it was difficult to ascertain the precise object of the law. Eight thousand dollars was appropriated.

Having had a survey made, and it being ascertained that a dredging-machine would be necessary whatever plan for the improvement might ultimately be adopted, the construction of one has been directed, and will be ready for use by the spring. This machine will also be used at the channel between the two Heroes; that is, but one is to be constructed for both places. Its operation at White Hall will be to deepen and widen the present channel of the harbor. But one of the greatest difficulties experienced at this harbor is a want of space. It is not sufficiently large for its commerce, and the improvement most desired is an enlargement of the present harbor. The best plan which has been presented for this object is to cut an additional passage through the flat lands, on the side opposite the present site of the town. Should this be adopted, it will require an additional appropriation of $22,000.

38. The improvement of the harbor of Black river, Jefferson county, State of New York.—As there was neither regular survey of this harbor, or plan for its improvement, the first action under the appropriation has been to have a survey made and a plan and estimate for the improvement; but being without any officer for the duty, and it being very difficult to obtain a civil agent suitably qualified, it was not till 8th September that orders for the duty could be given.

The survey has been made and the estimate for the improvement amounts to $26,998 71; the appropriation was for $5,000, leaving a deficiency to be supplied amounting to $21,998 77.

39. The improvement of the harbor at the mouth of Salmon river, Lake Ontario, State of New York.—The operations for this work have as yet been limited to the collecting of materials, and to the constructing of the requisite machinery.

Five thousand dollars was appropriated for this improvement. I am not aware by whom the estimate was made, and although the plan appears to have been obtained from the War Department, yet no survey, plan, estimate, or report, was ever made under its direction. But being well satisfied that the appropriation was entirely inadequate to the object, and that the plan which appears to have been under the consideration of the committee was not the most judicious or the most economical, an officer of much intelligence and much experience in these kinds of improvements was directed to repair to the locality, and after a careful personal examination, to revise both the plan and estimate. His examination has resulted in a modification of the plan, and in an estimate amounting to $72,081. The improvement is highly important to the navigation of that lake.

40. The improvement of the harbor at the mouth of Cataraugus creek, Lake Erie, State of New York.—The work has been commenced and materials for its continuation during the next season are being collected.

The amount estimated for the whole work is $102,000; the appropriation was for $15,000, leaving a balance to be provided for of $87,000.

41. The improvement of the harbor of Portland, Lake Erie, State of New York.—The work has been commenced, and materials are being collected for its continuation.

The estimate for completing this work amounts to $60,000; the appropriation was for $10,000, leaving a balance to be provided of $50,000.

Should it be found necessary hereafter to add an eastern breakwater for the more complete security of the harbor, it will require an additional appropriation of $23,500.

42. The constructing of two piers and the improving of the harbor of Vermilion, Huron county, Lake Erie, State of Ohio.—A suitable agent for this work could not be obtained before the 4th day of August; he was immediately ordered there, has commenced the work, and is collecting materials for its continuation.

The original estimate was made in 1832, and is affected by the late general increase in the prices of materials and labor. The plan is also somewhat modified, the piers being made larger than at first contemplated, experience having proved that the smaller pier, being insufficient to withstand the shock from the surf of the lake, was soon destroyed.

The estimate for the work amounts to $61,563; the appropriation was for $10,000, leaving a deficiency to be provided of $51,563.

43. The constructing of a pier or breakwater at the mouth of the St. Joseph's, Michigan.—Later surveys, and a more elaborate investigation have occasioned a modification in the plan at first proposed, but not involving any increase of cost. The estimate made upon prices of September, 1836, amounts to $67,559; the appropriation was for $20,000, leaving a deficiency to be provided of $47,559. The least amount estimated for the next year is $44,617.

44. The constructing a breakwater and harbor at Michigan city, State of Illinois.—In this, as well as in No. 42, the requisite machinery is being made, and arrangements have been entered into for the delivery of materials preparatory to the active operation anticipated for the next season.

The original estimate for this work has likewise felt the effect of the increased value of materials and labor. It was made in February, 1835, and amounted to $84,240; the revised estimate upon prices of September, 1836, amounts to $95,609; the appropriation for the last year was for $20,000; and the least amount which will be required for the next year is estimated at $58,217.

Statement E is a connected exhibit of the estimates for the various harbor improvements under the direction of this bureau, and herein referred to.

45. In conclusion, allow me again to call your attention to the organization and increase of the corps of topographical engineers.

The subject has so frequently been brought to the notice of the Department and of Congress, and explanations of its advantage and necessity are stated in so much detail in communications from this bureau, as well as in a report from the Military Committee of the House of Representatives, that they leave nothing further to be said, or only in addition to refer to the facts detailed in this report, which prove the utter inability of the bureau to execute the duties assigned to it under the various laws of Congress without further aid. It may also be well to add, that the aid heretofore received from the army is now no longer to be obtained.

The extreme inconvenience to which the army has been exposed from the system of military details for duties out of the line, not only during the Indian disturbances on our frontier, but for years before—a system, the parent of extravagance, confusion, and discontent, and which, even in its partial action, has (as events have proved) to be abandoned on every slight emergency—has induced the President to check it by a positive limitation of the number which can in any event be detailed for detached duty.

Under the foregoing circumstances it will be seen that there is no remedy but in a better organization of the corps.

In relation to that organization, I will merely submit a copy of the bill which met with the approbation of Congress in its last session, having passed the Senate twice, and having been three times reported to the House, and passed through a second reading there—once as a bill from its own Military Committee, and twice in bills from the Senate.

Respectfully submitted.

J. J. ABERT,
Lieut. Col. Top. Eng.

A bill for the better organization of the corps of Topographical Engineers.

Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the corps of topographical engineers shall be organized and increased by regular promotions in the same, so that the said corps shall consist of one colonel, one lieutenant colonel, four majors, ten captains, ten first lieutenants, and ten second lieutenants.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That vacancies created by said organization, over and above those which can be filled by the present corps, shall be taken from the army, and from such as it may be deemed advisable of the civil engineers employed under the act of the 30th April, 1824; and that the pay and emoluments to the officers of the said corps shall be the same as are allowed to officers of similar rank in the cavalry of the United States.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the authority to employ civil engineers in the act of the 30th April, 1824, and the authority by law for the present corps of topographical engineers be, and the same are hereby, repealed, after the passage of this act, and that all letters and packages on public business to and from the chief of the corps now authorized, be free from postage.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the officers of said corps shall be subject to the rules and articles of war, and to such regulations in relation to their duties, as the President may think proper to adopt.

REPORT FROM THE ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT.

ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, November 12, 1836.

SIR: In obedience to your order of the 9th of September last, I have the honor to transmit a report of the general result of the proceedings and operations of this department between the 1st October, 1835, and the 30th September, 1836.

The papers marked A and B present a general view of these concerns during the last-mentioned period, as well in regard to the amounts of expenditures under the several heads of appropriations, as in reference to their objects and to the various ordnance stations where they have been made.

The first of these (A) shows the whole amount of funds remitted from the Treasury to disbursing officers and contractors in this department during the year 1835, to have been

That the portion of that sum which was expended and accounted for during the same period amounted to	$934,588 73
And that, at the close of the year, there remained unexpended, and in the hands of disbursing officers, the sum of	840,550 69
	94,038 04

Statement B exhibits the total amount of funds remaining in the hands of disbursing officers at the close of the year 1835, and which have been remitted to them and to contractors during the first, second, and third quarters of the year 1836. This amount will be seen to have been—

And the portion of this sum expended, and for which accounts have been rendered, during the same period, will be seen in the same statement to have amounted to	$1,053,324 67
The unexpended balance exhibited in the same statement as being in the hands of the disbursing officers at the close of the third quarter of 1835 having been	857,570 45
	195,754 22

Statement C presents a view of the general result of the operations at the several arsenals and armories of the United States in the manufacture, repair, and purchase of the principal articles of ordnance, ordnance stores, and building materials. It exhibits the result of these operations to the extent to which they have been completed during the year between the 1st October, 1835, and 30th September, 1836, indicating, among other articles of ordnance and ordnance stores which have been fabricated or procured, the following, viz: Of artillery, 33 42-pounder, 57 32-pounder, 50 24-pounder, and 77 6-pounder iron cannon; 110 32-pounder casemate carriages, 86 32-pounder casemate chassis, 21 24-pounder casemate carriages, 55 24-pounder casemate chassis, 37 32-pounder barbette carriages, 123 24-pounder barbette carriages, 92 field-carriages, 63 caissons, and three travelling forges.

Of small-arms manufactured and procured, viz: 22,650 muskets complete, 3,039 Hall's rifles, made at the national armories; and at the private factories, 8,600 muskets complete, 701 Hall's rifles, 301 carbines, 801 artillery swords, and 3,260 cavalry sabres.

Of accoutrements for small-arms, 20,163 sets for infantry, 7,100 sets rifle accoutrements, 1,607 sets for cavalry, and 2,699 sabre belts.

Statement D shows the extent of the operations during the year between the 1st of October, 1835, and the 30th of September, 1836, which have occurred in procuring ordnance and ordnance stores under the act of 1808, for arming and equipping the militia of the States and Territories. This statement presents also a view of the expenditures under the act which have resulted during the same period in procuring the stores, amounting, for all objects, to $221,813 38. It exhibits, among other articles of ordnance stores procured, 2 12-pounder brass howitzers, with their carriages and equipments complete; 77 6-pounder iron cannon; 51 6-pounder field and 31 24-pounder howitzer carriages and equipments complete; 67 caissons, 8,300 muskets, 701 Hall's rifles, 301 carbines, 801 artillery swords, 3,260 cavalry sabres, and 4,250 sets of infantry, rifle, and cavalry accoutrements.

Statement E exhibits the amount of ordnance and ordnance stores which have been apportioned for the year 1835 to the several States, and Territories, under the act of 1808, for arming and equipping the militia; this apportionment being founded on the recent returns of the strength of the militia, as made by the Adjutant Generals of the militia of the several States to the Adjutant General of the army.

Statement F shows the several articles of ordnance and ordnance stores which have been distributed to the militia of the States and Territories during the year between the 1st of October, 1835, and the 30th of September, 1836.

Statement G presents a view of the munitions of war issued by this department during the year between the 1st of October, 1835, and the 30th of September, 1836, to the army. In this it will appear that 158 32-pounder, 153 24-pounder, and 35 6-pounder iron cannon; 2 4-pounder brass cannon; 2 24-pounder brass howitzers; 86 32-pounder and 10 24-pounder casemate carriages; 26 32-pounder, and 102 24-pounder barbette carriages; 1 12-pounder and 35 6-pounder carriages; 10 24-pounder howitzer carriages; 8 caissons; 21,279 muskets; 3,281 rifles; 380 pistols; 303 cavalry sabres; 19,908 sets infantry and 1,303 sets of rifle accoutrements, are among the principal articles issued.

Statement H exhibits the amount of lead made at the United States lead mines from the year 1821, when their superintendence was transferred from the Treasury to the War Department, to 30th of September, 1835, and the amount accruing to the United States for rents for that period, viz:

Total amount of lead made from 1821 to 30th September, 1835	75,571,609 lbs.
Total amount of rent lead accruing for the above period	5,909,216 do.

Amount of rent lead due the United States and yet to be collected, as far as returns have been made to the superintendent - 493,313 do.

No returns of lead have been made to the superintendent during the year ending 30th September, 1836.

In the annual communication from this to the War Department, dated 20th November, 1835, the difficulty which existed respecting the collection of rents was particularly stated.

A considerable number of the persons engaged in smelting under licenses obtained for that purpose from the Government, had refused to make returns of the lead made by them, or to pay their stipulated rents. The delinquency has since become general. The smelters contend that the act of March 3, 1807, "contains no authority for collecting rent lead, under a license for smelting lead ore; and that any law authorizing the leasing of public lands, within the limits of a State, is unconstitutional."

Suits have been ordered against several of the delinquents, to test the validity of the foregoing objections; the result of which is not yet known at this department.

The licenses for smelting will all shortly expire, and no more will be issued, unless the most confident assurance be given that no further objections will be made to a compliance with the conditions of the license bonds.

From the great extent of the mineral lands, and the conflicting interests which have arisen between the purchasers and occupants, as well as the probability that the United States may derive no benefit, for a long time, by a continuance of the present system, the expediency of selling the mineral lands in that region is forcibly presented.

Such a measure has been repeatedly urged by this department, and is again recommended as the most effectual mode of reconciling all difficulties and securing the interests of the United States in that quarter.

Diligent and strenuous efforts have been made to accomplish the various objects set forth in the laws of appropriation, passed during the last session of Congress, for the service of this department; but, for want of officers to aid in conducting its operations, the works at Liberty, Missouri; Memphis, Tennessee; Little Rock, Arkansas; Baton Rouge, Louisiana; Fayetteville, North Carolina; Charleston, South Carolina; the magazine at the arsenal in Washington city; and the erection of the shot-furnaces along the seacoast, have all been unavoidably delayed, and some of them suspended. A like inconvenience has been felt at the principal arsenals of Watervliet, Pittsburg, Washington city, and Watertown, where extensive operations are progressing, and unavoidably impeded by the want of the necessary and usual assistance of officers. The departments for the inspection of cannon and small-arms and accoutrements are subject to the same inconvenience; the former being entirely suspended, and the latter progressing with difficulty, for the want of additional force.

There is another and very serious inconvenience, which extends to every post of the department where there is but one officer; and more especially to those commanded by the chiefs of inspections. These officers, with other commanders of posts who are unaided by assistant officers, are frequently and unavoidably absent on business connected with the posts, or the inspection of cannon or small-arms; and during these absences are obliged to leave their posts sometimes for many days without an officer, and in charge of irresponsible persons, wholly unacquainted with the various points (many of them matters of military science) connected with the business of the posts, and which require daily and hourly decision. Such inexperienced persons, from want of the proper authority under the laws and regulations, are, in many cases, wholly incapable of acting; and where their delegated authority from the officer is sufficient, they must either decide as the cases arise, and most probably erroneously, or postpone action to the arrival of an officer; and in this manner the public business is either encumbered with inconvenient and expensive delays, or perhaps with the still greater expense of a wrong decision, which cannot be remedied.

It cannot be disguised that, unless the service of this department be relieved by the proper authority from these disadvantages, its immense materiel of war and extensive buildings and machinery in all parts of the country, are liable to sustain the most serious losses, from fire, defective preservation, and other causes, while its system of service may be deranged by irregularity in the current business of the arsenals, and by complexity and confusion in its business transactions with the chief of the department.

I had the honor to submit for your decision on the 28th ultimo, a communication from the lieutenant colonel of ordnance, inspector of armories and arsenals, urging the difficulty of his proceeding with the inspections in his department, with the present inadequate allowance of transportation, and requesting to be relieved from the more distant inspections, in consequence of the heavy expenses in which they involve him. It is proper here to remark, that the same complaints have been repeatedly made by the other officers employed in the inspections of this department.

I have the honor to be, sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,

G. BOMFORD,
Col. of Ordnance.

Hon. B. F. BUTLER,
Secretary of War ad interim.

REPORT FROM THE OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS.

WAR DEPARTMENT,

Office of Indian Affairs, December 1, 1836.

SIR: I have the honor to lay before you, in compliance with the direction of the Department of the 9th of September, the following report:

1. "Of the amount of funds remitted, and of those for which accounts have been rendered for settlement by the disbursing officers, during the three first quarters of the present year."

This information is embodied in the accompanying statement marked A. It is necessarily incomplete. In addition to the causes that usually prevent the transmission of accounts within the period required by law, the state of the military branch of the service has been such during the past year, as to call disbursing officers from the stations at which the expenditures were to be made, and in other instances, to render frequent changes of them necessary.

2. "Of the number of Indians removed since the date of the last report of the Commissary General of Subsistence, the number who have entered into treaty stipulations to remove, and the general circumstances connected with the emigration and settlement of the Indians."

This branch of the Indian business having been transferred from the Commissary General of Subsistence to this office by your direction, the information respecting it properly makes a part of this communication. Respectfully referring you to the appended tabular statement, marked B, I proceed to submit a general view of the operations of the past year. This will be disconnected, as far as practicable, from the military movements, the report of which will more appropriately be made from another bureau.

The message of the President of the 9th of February, 1836, transmitting a report from this department, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 3d of February, respecting the causes of the hostilities in Florida, and the measures taken to suppress them, communicated a succinct narrative of the events in that quarter up to that date. From that time the removal of the Seminole Indians was committed to the military authorities, as a military measure, and its completion depends upon the success of the military movements. The friendly Indians who, as stated in that report, had fled to Tampa bay for protection, amounted to about 450 in number. While preparations were making for their removal, they gave the most convincing proofs of their fidelity and attachment to the United States. It is represented by Lieutenant Harris, in a communication dated February 15, 1836, that, upon their learning that the foe was in force in the neighborhood, committing depredations, "of their own accord they sallied out from their camp, with a few citizen settlers, and maintained an obstinate combat with the enemy for several hours; retreating only before vastly superior numbers, and gaining the fort not until night was setting in." On another occasion, when General Gaines was ready to take the field, "they urged that they might be permitted to go out also, and were permitted to do so, after having been repeatedly told that this proof of their friendship was not required of them." These warriors, to the number of 68, were absent on this expedition until the beginning of April. On the 10th of that month the whole party was mustered, preparatory to their going on board the transports, and their number was ascertained to be 407, which was reduced by deaths to 382. These arrived at Little Rock on the 5th of May, and settled upon the reservation provided for them in the treaty of the 28th of March, 1833.

The removal of those now in Florida, has been intrusted to General Jesup, under instructions similar to those given for the removal of the hostile Creeks.

By the terms of the treaty with the Seminoles of May 9,

Documents accompanying the President's Message.

1832, the annuity granted in 1823 will be increased to $7,000, which is to be added to the annuities of the Creeks, amounting to $36,900, and the aggregate sum is to be so divided that they will receive their equitable proportion as members of the Creek confederation. Under the authority given to the President in the 4th section of the act of July 2, 1836, "making further appropriations to carry into effect certain Indian treaties," the whole of the annuity for this year has been paid to these emigrants. And to remove all doubt, I would suggest that this authority be extended, by legislative enactment, to the payment of the sum of $15,400, which, it is stipulated in the 2d article of the treaty of 1832, "shall be divided among the chiefs and warriors of the several towns, on account of their abandoned improvements, in a ratio proportioned to their population; the respective proportions of each to be paid upon their arrival in the country they consent to remove to." In addition to the considerations, that they have been unwavering in their faith, and have periled their lives for the defence of our country, a strong reason is presented for the course suggested, in the fact that they have sustained the loss of their ponies, cattle, hogs, and provisions, amounting, according to the estimate of the disbursing agent to $3,000. They would then be relieved from their present state of want, and being furnished with suitable means, might increase their knowledge of agriculture, for which some of them have shown an inclination, and gradually acquire the power of maintaining themselves.

The removal of the Creek Indians, like that of the Seminoles, was made a military operation, on the commission by them of hostile acts. The causes of these, and the measures adopted to repress and prevent them, as far as they were then ascertained, were communicated to Congress in the answer from this department to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 3d of June, 1836. The operations of the army since that time have effected the subjugation of the Creeks. Under a contract, a copy of which is submitted, marked C, all of them have been removed, with the exception of the families of a band of 700 warriors, who have been mustered into service, to act in concert with the troops of the United States in Florida against the Seminoles. The first party that was removed, consisting of 2,300, encamped on the Verdigris on the 7th of September. Their approach was viewed by the resident Creeks with jealousy and distrust, and the commanding officer at Fort Gibson, thinking it probable that serious difficulties might take place in consequence, if not prevented by the presence of a suitable military force, made a requisition upon the Governor of Arkansas for ten companies of volunteers. This unfriendly feeling was ascribed by the acting superintendent of the Western territory to an apprehension, on the part of the chiefs of the Western Creeks, that they might be superseded, or their authority be abridged. They alleged, that having, after encountering privations and dangers, established themselves in comfort, and framed a system of government and laws for themselves, their situation ought not to be rendered worse by the coming in among them of those who, by their hostile acts, had reduced themselves to beggary and want. At a council held at Fort Gibson, at which the commanding officer and the acting superintendent were present, these views were freely expressed; and in behalf of the Western Creeks, it was added, by direction of Roley McIntosh, "that they were willing to meet the new emigrants as friends, provided they would submit to the laws now in force." To this proposition Ne a-Mathla, the principal chief of the other party, replied, "that the laws they (the Western Creeks) had passed, were made for their good, and as they had prospered under them, they (the emigrants) were willing to unite under them, and try to live together peaceably." It is the impression of the acting superintendent, that if a similar policy be pursued by the chief McIntosh towards other emigrating parties as they arrive, no hostilities or difficulties are to be apprehended. Whether this impression be correct will be soon known, as advices have been received of the arrival at Fort Gibson of another band, amounting to 165 in number; of a third, amounting to 1,800, at Little Rock, and of the remaining parties at Memphis. It is certainly to be desired that peace among these people should be preserved. A different state of things would subvert the present prosperity of the McIntosh party, effectually preclude the improvement of the other, and put in peril the lives of all. With their large annuity, amounting to $36,900, with liberal provision for education and agricultural assistance, the opportunity and the means for advancement are theirs, and nothing but unfriendly relations among themselves can prevent their onward progress.

The number of Cherokees residing in the States of Georgia, North Carolina, Alabama, and Tennessee, according to the census taken in 1835, was 16,542. For the removal of these, as stipulated in the treaty of December 29, 1835, a superintendent of emigration and assistant conductors and agents have been appointed; but active operations have been delayed for the execution of other provisions of that treaty, the measures taken in regard to which are stated in another part of this report.

The sum of $40,000 was appropriated at the last session of Congress "to defray the expense of removing the Winnebago Indians, who reside south of the Wisconsin, to the 'Neutral ground,' or such other place as may be assigned by treaty." The "Neutral ground" is a tract of country on the west side of the Mississippi, a part of which was granted to the Winnebagoes by the second article of the treaty with them of September 15, 1832. The Sioux Indians, residing upon the borders of this tract, asserted that, by the terms of the treaty of July 15, 1830, with themselves and other Indians, as explained to them by one of the commissioners, it was to be held in trust for each of the tribes parties to that treaty, and could not, therefore, be granted to another. But the right to make such disposition of it was clearly given in the first article of the treaty, which authorized the President to locate upon it any other tribe, "for hunting and other purposes." If any declaration of a contrary import was made to the Indians, it was never communicated by the commissioners to this department. The opposition of the Sioux, which they signified by prohibiting the entry of the Winnebagoes upon it, although unfounded, excited the apprehensions of the latter, and they have hitherto been reluctant to remove to this tract, notwithstanding its great fertility and value. It was for these reasons, it is presumed, that the clause in the appropriation act was so framed as to authorize an expenditure for their removal to this land, or to the country south of the Missouri. The duty of negotiating with them to effect the latter object, and of directing the arrangements for their emigration, should it not be accomplished, has been committed to the Governor of the Wisconsin Territory, from whom no report has been received. It is understood, however, that his efforts have been unsuccessful.

General Jesup was instructed, on the 20th of July, 1836, to select an officer to conduct the removal of the Choctaws remaining in Mississippi, for which an appropriation was made at the last session of $30,000, which, with a balance of a former appropriation of $26,800, made a fund applicable to this object of $56,800. When it is accomplished, the whole number of the Choctaws west of the Mississippi will be 13,300.

This large augmentation of their numbers, and the consequent changes in their condition and circumstances, appear to me to give new importance to the establishment of a government for the Indian tribes west of the Mississippi river. I beg leave, therefore, to invite your attention to a narration of former proceedings in relation to this object.

The act of Congress of May 28th, 1830, provided for an exchange of lands with the Indians residing in any of the States or Territories east of the Mississippi, and for their removal beyond that river. It authorized the President "solemnly to assure the tribe or nation with which the exchange is made, that the United States will forever secure and guaranty to them, their heirs or successors, the country so exchanged with them." It further authorized him "to cause such tribe or nation to be protected at their new residence, against all interruption or disturbance from any other tribe or nation of Indians, or from any other person or persons whatever." It also empowered him to exercise over them "the same superintendence and care" that he had extended to them before their removal.

Anterior to the passage of this act, which devolved upon the Executive these high duties to the Indian tribes, the necessity of some form of government had been distinctly recognised. Stipulations were made in treaties with the Cherokees and Choctaws, for their removal and settlement west of the Mississippi, in 1817 and 1820. In 1824, Mr. Monroe, in his message at the opening of the session, pointed to the vast extent of country "between the limits of our present States and Territories, and the Rocky mountains and Mexico," as a region to which the Indians "might be invited, with inducements which might be successful. It is thought," he observed, "if that territory should be divided into districts, by previous agreement with the tribes now residing there, and civil governments be established in each, with schools for every branch of instruction in literature and in the arts of civilized life, that all the tribes now within our limits might gradually be drawn there." On the 16th of December, 1824, the Committee on Indian Affairs was instructed, by a resolution of the House of Representatives, "to inquire into the expediency of organizing all the territory of the United States lying west of the State of Missouri and Territories of Arkansas and Michigan, into a separate Territory, to be occupied exclusively by the Indians; and of authorizing the President of the United States to adopt such measures as he may think best, to colonize all the Indians of the present States and Territories permanently within the same." On the 27th of January, 1825, Mr. Monroe again presented this subject to the House of Representatives, in a special message. "The great object to be accomplished," he said, "is the removal of these tribes to the territory designated, on conditions which shall be satisfactory to themselves and honorable to the United States. This can be done only by conveying to each tribe a good title to an adequate portion of land, to which it may consent to remove, and by providing for it there a system of internal government, which shall protect their property from invasion, and by the regular progress of improvement and civilization, prevent that degeneracy which has generally marked the transition from the one to the other state." "The digest of such a government, with the consent of the Indians, which should be endowed with sufficient powers to meet all the objects contemplated: to connect the several tribes together in a bond of amity, and preserve order in each; to prevent intrusions on their property; to teach them, by regular instruction, the arts of civilized life, and make them a civilized people, is an object of very high importance. It is the powerful consideration which we have to offer to these tribes, as an inducement to relinquish the lands on which they now reside, and to remove to those which are designated." "To the United States, the proposed arrangement offers many important advantages, in addition to those which have been already enumerated. By the establishment of such a government over these tribes, with their consent, we become in reality their benefactors. The relation of conflicting interests, which has heretofore existed between them and our frontier settlements, will cease. There will be no more wars between them and the United States. Adopting such a government, their movement will be in harmony with us, and its good effects be felt through the whole extent of our territory to the Pacific. It may fairly be presumed that, through the agency of such a government, the condition of all the tribes inhabiting that vast region may be essentially improved; that permanent peace may be preserved with them, and our commerce be much extended."

Accompany this message was a report of Mr. Calhoun, then Secretary of War, in which he stated the obligation of the United States to protect the Indians who should emigrate; to continue to them the means of education and improvement, and to give them "the strongest and most solemn assurance" that the country assigned them should be theirs, "as a permanent home for themselves and their posterity." "To such assurance," he proceeded to observe, "if there should be added a system by which the Government, without destroying their independence, would gradually unite the several tribes under a simple but enlightened system of government and laws, formed on the principles of our own, and for which, as their own people would partake in it, they would, under the influence of the contemplated improvement, at no distant day, become prepared, the arrangements which have been proposed would prove to the Indians and their posterity a permanent blessing."

On the 1st of February, 1825, "a bill for the preservation and civilization of the Indian tribes within the United States," was reported to the Senate by the Committee on Indian Affairs, which finally passed that body, but did not receive the concurrence of the House of Representatives. On the 27th of December, 1825, a resolution was agreed to in the House of Representatives, instructing the Committee on Indian Affairs to inquire into the expediency of establishing some mode for the removal of the Indians; for allotting to each tribe a sufficiency of land, "with the sovereignty or right of soil, in the same manner that the right of domain is secured to the respective States of the Union;" and for establishing there a territorial government over them of the same kind, and regulated by the same rules that the Territories of the United States are now governed."

In January, 1826, the bill, which passed the Senate at the preceding session, was amended by the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House of Representatives, and transmitted to the Secretary of War, with a request that he would "afford the committee all such information as is consistent, and in the manner you think proper." In compliance with this request, Governor Barbour transmitted to the committee, on the 3d of February, a bill, accompanied by an elaborate report, explanatory of its principles.

"The third object of the bill," it is stated, "is the establishment of a territorial government by the United States, for their protection and their civilization. The bill proposes a governor, three judges, and a secretary, to be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, and such modifications, in detail, as the President shall ordain, subject to the approbation of Congress." "I have already intimated, in a former part of this report, the consequences of sending the Indians to the country destined for their final abode, without some controlling authority. Without this, they will be disposed to endless mischiefs. It is not necessary to prescribe particularly in the bill their government. Its organization may safely be deposited in the hands of the President, subject to the control of Congress. I will, nevertheless, suggest, that as soon as the civilization of the Indians would admit of it, I would give them a legislative body, composed of Indians, to be selected in the early stages by the President, and eventually to be elected by themselves, as well for the purpose of enacting such laws as would be agreeable to themselves, as for the purpose of exciting their ambition."

All these official papers agree in their main features. They look to the removal, permanent settlement and protection of the Indians, and the establishment of a Territorial Government, as measures of vital importance to them, and demanding by a just regard to the obligations of the United States. The treaty with the Cherokees of May 6, 1828, may be considered as the first formal recognition of, and action upon these principles, as it secured to them a permanent home, under the most solemn guaranty of the United States that it should remain theirs forever, and stipulated that the United States would give them a set of plain laws, and cause their lands to be laid off, whenever they wished to own them individually.

In the message at the opening of the 1st session of the 21st Congress, President Jackson suggested "the propriety of setting apart an ample district west of the Mississippi, and without the limits of any State or Territory now formed, to be guaranteed to the Indian tribes, as long as they shall occupy it; each tribe having a distinct control over the portion designated for its use." "There," he observed, "they may be secured in the enjoyment of governments of their own choice, subject to no other control from the United States than such as may be necessary to preserve peace on the frontier and between the several tribes." In the report of the Department of War, which accompanied this message, Mr. Eaton remarked: "No better plan can be thought of, than that the United States shall put in operation such a system of Indian protection and government, west of the Mississippi, as that a confidence may be reposed that they are indeed our fostered children, and the Government not only so disposed to consider, but practically to evince their good feelings towards them. At present an objection arises with the weaker tribes. They are indisposed to emigrate, from an apprehension that powerful and stronger neighbors may oppress them, and that no surer protection can be obtained from the United States in the West, than is possessed already where they reside. To remove such apprehension will be of importance.

"I beg leave to suggest for your consideration, if an Indian territory, without the range of Western States and Territories, might not be advantageously created; and to give efficiency and to inspire confidence, military posts, under some able and discreet officer of the army, to be designated at some central and convenient point. Intrusions from the whites might thus be restrained, and the Indians maintained in quiet with each other. Laws for their general government and to preserve peace amongst the tribes, to be the act of the United States, with a right to the Indians in council to make their own municipal regulations."

The act of Congress of May 28, 1830, was the authoritative sanction of both branches of the National Legislature to the suggestion of the President. Numerous treaties for the cession and exchange of lands have since been made with Indian tribes; and the entire number of many of them, and portions of others, have been removed. From a want of exact knowledge of the topography of the country, errors were made in defining the boundaries of the lands intended to be assigned to them, and questions arose which remained long unsettled, and proved to be of difficult adjustment. The relations between the indigenous and emigrated tribes were of novel character, and the establishment of them upon an amicable basis was evidently of great importance to them and to our own citizens. These considerations were presented to Congress in a report from this department to the President, dated February 16, 1832, which was transmitted to that body on the same day. Approving the measure recommended at the close of that report, Congress passed the act of July 14, 1832, providing "for the appointment of three commissioners to treat with the Indians, and for other purposes." In addition to the subjects above referred to, with which these commissioners were charged, was the formation of some plan "for the encouragement, security, and government of the Indian tribes west of the State of Missouri and the Territory of Arkansas." They were accordingly instructed to report in detail all the information they could procure concerning their present and probable future condition, with their own views upon the whole subject. "Its importance," they were told, "is apparent, as on its decision may rest the future fate of all these tribes. And in the great change we are now urging them to make, it is desirable that all their political relations, as well among themselves as with us, should be established upon a permanent basis, beyond the necessity of any future alteration." The result of the investigations of these gentlemen was embodied in a communication addressed to this department, dated Fort Gibson, February 10, 1834, which was appended to the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House of Representatives of the 20th of May, 1834, in which it was mentioned in terms of commendation. The two leading measures recommended by the commissioners, were the establishment of two lines of military posts, and the organization of an Indian territory: the first line of posts to be on the border of the Indian country, the State of Missouri, and the Territory of Arkansas; the other in the interior, on the western line of the agricultural district, extending from Red river to the Upper Missouri. Assuming that the proposed territory would include all the tribes west of the Mississippi, the commissioners suggested, as the basis of its organization, the appointment of "a governor, a secretary, a marshal, a prosecuting attorney, and a judiciary, with the adequate clerks, and an annual council of the Indians, the number of the delegation from each tribe to be designated by the President." They appear to have considered that the proper enforcement of the laws of the United States, as far as they are applicable to the Indian country, was a sufficient motive for this organization. It should be observed that they did not propose to confer upon the annual council any legislative power, the objects to be attained by it being the establishment of friendly relations, and the advancement of civilization. It was, however, considered by them "not improbable that the tribes may ere long adopt some general articles of confederation for their own republic, not inconsistent with the wishes of Government." The report of the Committee on Indian Affairs, already referred to, after reciting the provisions in the laws and treaties bearing upon this subject, deduced from them "the rights, the duties, and the powers of the parties. The rights of the Indians are, to be secured in the possession of their lands, and in the exercise of self-government. The obligations of the United States are correlative: to secure them in the title and possession of their lands, in the exercise of self-government, and to defend them from domestic strife and foreign enemies; and powers adequate to the fulfilment of these obligations are necessarily reserved." "Under the power to dispose of the territory of the United States, the Western territory is now to be dedicated to the use of the Indians, and right of self-government secured to the tribes."

The bill (attached to this report) designated the south banks of the Missouri and the Platte rivers as the northern boundary of the proposed territory, which, it was estimated, would contain an area of 132,295,680 acres. It pledged the faith of the country to the Indians for its perpetual possession; it gave to each of the tribes the right to maintain a government for the regulation of its own internal concerns; it provided for the appointment by the President, with the concurrence of the Senate, of a governor and secretary; it directed that a council should be assembled by the governor, or of the chiefs of the various tribes, to which should be submitted a proposition, to assent "to such of the provisions of this act as require the co-operation of the authorities of the respective tribes;" and that the contemplated confederation should not take effect until the Choctaw, Creek, and Cherokee tribes gave their assent thereto.

According to its provisions, a general council of the tribes joining the confederacy, elected by the tribes, or selected by the chiefs, as the governor might determine, was to be held annually, whose duty it should be to make all necessary regulations respecting the intercourse among the various tribes; to preserve peace; to put a stop to hostilities; to settle any questions of dispute respecting boundaries; to arrest and punish all Indians who may commit offences within the district of one tribe, and who may flee to another, and generally, to take such measures as may be necessary to give effect to the provisions of this act." But no laws or regulations made by the council were to have any force unless approved by the governor. It was made "competent for the general council to furnish such force as from time to time may be necessary towards the support of such government; and the troops of the United States may, under the direction of the President, be employed on the same duty," and to give effect to the regulations of the council. The House of Representatives proceeded to the consideration of this bill on the 25th of June, 1834. It met with opposition, and was eventually postponed to the next session of Congress, at which the consideration of it was resumed, but no definite action was had upon it.

In February, 1836, a new bill was introduced, "to provide for the security and protection of the emigrant and other Indians west of the State of Missouri and of the Territory of Arkansas." This bill reserved the lands described in the preceding one, for the use of the various tribes who have or may have a right to the same. It was to be called "the Indian Territory," and to be secured to the tribes forever. A superintendent of Indian affairs and a secretary were to be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate. Each tribe might establish such government and laws for the regulation of its internal concerns, as it thought proper. Any three or more tribes might form a confederation with each other, for the purpose of regulating the intercourse and preserving peace among such tribes, and of defending themselves from the aggressions of other tribes.

It provided further, that the Choctaw, Creek, and Cherokee tribes should be invited by the superintendent to unite in a general council to form such confederation; and that any other of the tribes might become parties to it. After its formation a general council should be held annually, the members to be chosen in the manner that might be pointed out in the articles of confederation. The powers of this council were to be the same with those indicated in the former bill, with the important exceptions that it was not authorized itself to raise a force to support the government, nor could the troops of the United States be employed to give effect to its regulations and laws. Only in the event of "an aggression having been or being about to be committed by a foreign tribe, or by one of the tribes in said territory on a tribe therein," might the superintendent call upon the other tribes of the troops of the United States for military aid. This bill likewise failed to become a law.

By the bill of 1834 it was "made competent for the council of confederated tribes to elect, in such manner as the general council may prescribe, a delegate to Congress, who shall have the same power, privileges, and compensation as are possessed by the delegates of the respective Territories." In the bill of 1836, the phraseology in reference to this subject was changed, so as to provide for the residence of a delegate "at the seat of Government during the session of Congress, who shall entitled to the same compensation as that of a delegate from a Territory." The terms of the first bill conform most nearly to the views of the Indians themselves, so far as they have at any time been made known. The Choctaws, in the 22d article of the treaty of September 27, 1830, and the Cherokees, in the 7th article of the treaty of December 29, 1835, expressed a solicitude that they might have the privilege of a delegate on the floor of the House of Representatives. These treaties having been ratified without any exception being taken to these articles, may it not be assumed that Congress intended, whenever it was determined that this measure was proper, to accede to the requests of these tribes, to the extent and in the manner they themselves desired.

It is worthy of remark, that the proposition to admit a delegate from the Indians to a seat in the national council was first made to them by the United States during the war of the Revolution. In the 6th article of the treaty with the Delawares of September 17, 1778, "it is further agreed on between the contracting parties, (should it for the future be found conducive for the mutual interest of both parties,) to invite any other tribes, who have been friends to the interest of the United States, to join the present confederation, and to form a State, whereof the Delaware nation shall be the head, and have a representation in Congress." It is apparent from the preceding part of the section, that the object was to obviate the false suggestions of the enemies of the United States, who had "endeavored, by every artifice in their power, to possess the Indians in general with an opinion that it was the design of the States to extirpate the Indians, and take possession of their country." In addition to the conciliatory influence of the measure, it has, at the present day, additional importance from the increased extent of our Indian relations, and the increased capacity of the Indians themselves to afford information that will be useful in the preparation of the laws affecting them.

On the 4th of March, 1836, a bill was introduced into the Senate by a Senator from Indiana, purporting to be supplementary to the act of May 28, 1830, providing for an exchange of lands. This bill designated the Puncah and Missouri rivers as the northern and eastern boundary lines; the other lines, described in the bills before the House of Representatives, were not changed. By this extension of the northern boundary, the Pawnees and Omahas were included in the country to be set apart for the Indians. It provided for the conveyance to the respective tribes of the lands held by them, by patent; and for the appointment of a superintendent, "to execute such duties as shall be enjoined by the President." It required him to convene a sufficient number of the chiefs of the various tribes, and endeavor to procure their assent to articles of agreement and friendship. These articles were to contain a stipulation for the assembling, annually or oftener, of a council of delegates, each member of which should have equal privileges; the number of members and the manner of their election to be determined by the President. This council, it was provided, should be competent "to enact such laws and make such regulations as shall be designed for general utility, without infringing the rights of the tribes severally to manage their own internal concerns;" but that no laws and regulations should take effect until approved by the President. If the superintendent should disagree with the council in regard to any particular law or regulation, a full report should be made to the President for his decision. Upon this bill it is not known that any proceedings were had.

Having completed a review of the action of the executive and legislative branches of the Government upon this subject, noticing only the prominent provisions in the bills that have been before Congress, I beg leave to observe that the aspects under which it now presents itself, differ materially from those in which it was submitted to Congress in 1825 and 1826. The plan of removing the Indian tribes from the States and Territories was then, comparatively, in its infancy. Districts of country, west of the Mississippi, had been assigned by treaties to the Choctaws and Cherokees, but only a small number of either tribe had emigrated; and the views of the Executive seem to have been directed to the subject of a government for those who had gone or might go, more as an inducement to them to remove, than as a measure immediately demanded for their protection, peace, and prosperity, by any existing relations. But the act of May 28, 1830, gave to this matter a new character. It distinctly authorized treaties for the exchange and cession of lands, the conveyance in fee of equivalent tracts to the Indians, and the extension to them, at all times, of adequate protection. Since its passage, the current of emigration has been constantly flowing, with different degrees of rapidity at different times. More liberal arrangements have been made, in treaties, for the supply of the wants of the Indians, and the promotion of their comfort. The stipulations made with the Choctaws in 1830, provided reservations of lands, large annuities, means for education, churches, agricultural and mechanical establishments, and ample donations of blankets, rifles, and agricultural implements. The stipulations in subsequent treaties with other tribes have conformed to these, the amounts and quantities being, of course, proportioned to the number of the Indians with whom they were made. As a natural result, the emigrated tribes, having these advantages and facilities, have acquired property, and with property a feeling of independence and self-respect, and a desire to advance in civilization. This has been especially the case with the Choctaws, Creeks, and Cherokees, the three largest tribes within the limits of the proposed territory, as these were described in the two bills reported to the House of Representatives. The acting superintendent of Indian affairs, in compliance with a circular from this office, has made a very valuable and sensible report, abounding in facts illustrative of the prosperous condition of these people. I have collated some of them, as the happy condition of things which they exhibit forms one of the arguments upon which the expediency of establishing a government competent to afford security and protection may be rested.

"It is a source of serious gratitude," he observes, (speaking of the Choctaws,) "to witness their gradual improvement." They are governed by a written constitution, and have an annual general council, to which twenty-seven members are elected, who are paid out of the annuity, and who pass such laws as they think proper. The three chiefs of the nation meet with the council, any two of whom can exercise the veto power; but if a bill be again passed by two-thirds of the council, it becomes a law. Their laws are reduced to writing, and copies of them and of the constitution are left with the agent. A new council-house and houses for the chiefs are in process of construction. The middle country, between the Arkansas and the Red rivers, Blue Boggy and the Canadian, is particularly fitted for raising stock. The Red-river part is destined soon to be a fine cotton-growing country; the native traders have erected cotton-gins, and they purchase all the cotton that is raised by the common Indians and half-breeds. It is estimated that about five hundred bales will go down Red river, from the Choctaws, this year. There is one good grist and saw-mill near Red river, and another is building on the Poteau, from which large quantities of lumber will go down the Arkansas. To a great extent the trade with these Indians is carried on by the natives. "I can state, from my own knowledge, that two native Choctaws on Red river have this year brought into the country $20,000 worth of goods; and there are others engaged in smaller trade of from $2,000 to $10,000. They make their purchases in New Orleans, and, I understand, are in good credit." The assistants in the three public smith-shops are natives, who, in a year or two, will be able to take charge of them. Besides these shops, they have five others of their own, that are used in the farming season. "The chase, for a living, is now nearly abandoned; many take a fall hunt, but it is more an excursion of pleasure than a pursuit of gain."

Of the Cherokees, he says: "They are gradually progressing in civilization and the cultivation of the soil, and amongst them are many intelligent men. They raise corn, beef, pork, sheep, &c., to a considerable extent, and in travelling through their country you are quite comfortably entertained. Many of them are engaged in trade with their own people; they are, however, not located advantageously for the cultivation of cotton. They have some mills erected amongst them; and with a wide extent of country, a portion of it finely watered, they bid fair, with frugality and temperance, to become a leading tribe." A similar account of these Indians was given by the commissioners in 1834, and they stated, besides, that a government had been organized by them, laws ordained, and enforced by a body of sheriffs termed light-horse.

"The Creeks," continues the acting superintendent, "have a rich country, and those of them that emigrated with McIntosh have been engaged busily in making corn; they usually have a large surplus, as high some years as thirty thousand bushels, besides stock of every description. As there is now a large emigration coming to the country, they will find a sale for all they may have to sell. They have not yet engaged in trade."

In another communication, he mentions that there are seventeen churches within the limits of these three tribes—ten in the Choctaw, four in the Cherokee, and three in the Creek country.

The other tribes in this superintendency are the Seminoles, Osages, Quapaws, Senecas, and Shawnees. Of these, he thus speaks: "It is but lately the Seminoles have come on; they have been much afflicted by disease, and have lost a great many of their small party; they have one of the finest sections of the Indian country, and with their advantages could soon prosper."

"The Osages are engaged in the chase, and they generally hunt for subsistence, and lay up buffalo meat for a support; they raise no corn except what their women cultivate, and have no stock of any consequence; they may, therefore, be fairly considered as living upon their annuity and the chase."

"The Quapaws, Senecas, and the united bands of Senecas and Shawnees, are situated adjoining the bands of Osages and Cherokees; their lands have been surveyed, and separately marked out—one hundred and fifty sections for the Quapaws, sixty thousand acres for the Senecas and Shawnees, and sixty-seven thousand acres for the Senecas of Sandusky. These lands are good and well watered. The Senecas are cultivating the soil, and signs of improvement are manifested; their mill is in full operation, and great benefit is derived from it. The Quapaws were not properly located, and will probably have to remove some two or three miles."

There are eight other tribes, which are located within the limits of the proposed territory, but which are not under the charge of the acting superintendent, whose jurisdiction, as prescribed by the President in 1834, does not extend beyond the northern boundary of the Osage reservation. The eight tribes referred to are attached to the northern agency of the Western territory, under the care of Major Cummins, whose report, though less minute than Captain Armstrong's, is hardly less favorable, when the difference in the means of the several tribes is considered. They are the Shawnees, Delawares, Kickapoos, Kansas, Weas, Piankeshaws, Peorias, Kaskaskias, and Ottawas, having an aggregate population of 4,467. The Shawnees and Delawares are an agricultural people; they have a fertile country, schools, churches, and smiths' shops. The Kickapoos, in 1835, began to turn their attention to agriculture, "the men as well as the women laboring astonishingly." The Kansas live by the chase, and are the only one of these bands of whom it can be said "they are poor." The remaining small bands above named cultivate the soil, which is generally of good quality, with sufficient water-power for their purposes, and they all have the means of education and the aid of mechanics.

The great increase in the number of Indians west of the Mississippi is another element connected with the question of government, entitled to serious consideration. The Indian population in the territory on the 1st of October last, was estimated at 37,748. To this number is to be added the Creeks, amounting to 16,500, who have removed this year, and about 4,000 who are yet to go, and the Cherokees, amounting to 16,000, who are under treaty stipulations to emigrate. There will be a further addition to be made of 5,400, should the Chickasaws procure a residence in that region. And if the Ottawas, Chippewas, and Pottawatamies of Illinois, shall assent to take land south of the Missouri for that assigned to them north by the treaty of Chicago of 1833, and the Pottawatamies of Indiana shall settle there with them, there will be another increase of numbers, amounting to 9,400. The entire Indian population in the territory will then be 90,148; and upon the borders of it there will be the Sioux and Iowas, with the Camanches, Kiowas, and other wild tribes, whose numbers are estimated at 143,750.

The annexed table, marked D, shows the number of every tribe, east and west of the Mississippi, concerning whom we have any information.

The obligations which the United States have assumed in their negotiations with some of these Indians, and in their legislation in regard to them, have no inconsiderable bearing upon this matter of protection and government. With the largest of the emigrated tribes, the Choctaws, Creeks, and Cherokees, the United States have made treaties containing stipulations which bind them to secure to these Indians "the jurisdiction and government of all the persons and property that may be within their limits west." This language is quoted from the fourth article of the treaty with the Choctaws of September 27, 1830. The fourteenth article of the treaty with the Creeks of March 24, 1832, and the fifth article of the treaty with the Cherokees of December 29, 1835, secure to those tribes similar powers. By the twenty-fifth section of the intercourse act of 1834, it is prescribed, "that so much of the laws of the United States as provides for the punishment of crimes committed within any place within the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, shall be in force in the Indian country: Provided, The same shall not extend to crimes committed by one Indian against the person and property of another Indian." Thus the right to form and administer all laws is solemnly guaranteed to these Indians. And it is stated by General Stokes, the agent for the Cherokees, that they "are in the habit of making written wills, deeds of gift, bills of sale, written judgments of their courts, written judgments of arbitration, and written settlements of the estates of deceased persons." The relations of debtor and creditor between the native and the native trader, and between the latter and our own citizens, now becoming important in extent and amount, are also to be regulated and guarded by them.

I would respectfully ask whether, in their present state of civilization, advanced as it is represented and admitted to be, it is not expedient for them, and especially for our own citizens, that a supervisory power over this extensive legislation should be lodged in some person or persons, acting under the authority of the United States. Our own citizens will hereafter be more intimately connected with the Indians in commerce, and their rights will of course be materially affected by this legislation. But under the treaties and the law which have been referred to, no supervision can be exercised over the laws of a separate tribe. This view of the subject seems to me to present a strong argument in favor of the confederation and government contemplated in the bills that have been submitted to Congress. All laws and regulations of an international character, operating on the rights of property as well as of person, of our own citizens, adopted by a single tribe, might then be properly subjected to the action of the general council and the governor. A yet stronger argument may be found in the importance of establishing, upon just principles, the relations between the several tribes within the new territory, with particular reference to the security of the rights and property of the weaker tribes. Whether in or out of the confederation, these might be injuriously affected by the legislation of the general council, unless it were restricted by an independent branch of the government.

With this exposition of the views entertained of this subject, I would request your favorable attention to it, and that, if you think proper, it may be recommended to that of Congress.

The preservation of peace among these tribes, and between them and those who live upon their borders, is another subject of great moment, and which may properly be considered in this connexion. It is true, that a treaty was made between the Camanche and Witchetaw nations and their associated bands, the principal of the wild tribes, and the Cherokees, Creeks, Choctaws, Osages, and Quapaws, in August, 1835, and the amicable relations, then formed, have not since been materially disturbed. But there are other lawless bands, and there is great force in the cautionary remarks in the report of the commissioners which has been frequently referred to.

"The commissioners would be wanting in justice to the Government, to allow it to anticipate security to our own tribes from any pacific arrangement that can be made with the Indians of Mexico. Presents may soothe for a moment the savage disposition; but while the principal residence of the wild tribes is within a foreign state, and subject of course to foreign influence, we cannot limit our guaranty of soil and personal protection, (upon which the emigrant has chosen his new home,) by depending on stipulations with the Indians beyond our control. Nor will our occasional show of force remove the fear of invasion. Savages may be temporarily driven from the buffalo trail, but like water displaced by a fording army, they will seek immediate return when the force is removed. A few outposts to enclose the agricultural districts can alone ensure personal safety, and give that security to property, without which man, either white or red, cannot be stimulated to its possession."

The establishment of some military posts was authorized by the act of Congress of July 2, 1836, entitled "An act to provide for the better protection of the Western frontier." Instructions were given soon after its passage, to procure the assent of the tribes through whose territory the military road, authorized by the same act, and upon the line of which these posts are to be constructed, must pass, to the measure. This has been accomplished with the Shawnees, Delawares, Weas, Piankeshaws, Kaskaskias, and Peorias, and instructions given to effect it with the other tribes. The proposition of the commissioners is, that other posts be erected in the interior, and it is explained in another part of their report, which has been alluded to in this communication. The importance of these works to the tranquillity of our Indian relations, and even to the right fulfilment of the obligations of the country to the Indians, cannot easily be overestimated, and I therefore commend the measure to your favorable notice. The number of Indians of indigenous tribes, who will be within striking distance of the frontier, amounts, as stated in the table before referred to, to 143,000. The names of many of them will suggest at once the reasons for the fears that may be entertained, and for the precautions that should be employed. When the road is completed, and the posts upon the line of it, and in the interior, are garrisoned by a competent force of infantry and mounted men, the causes for apprehending any interruption of the general peace will be greatly diminished.

3. "Of the operations of the commissioners appointed to hold Indian treaties under acts of the last session of Congress."

Of these I am able to present only a brief statement; but few communications have been received from the gentlemen to whom they have been intrusted.

The sum of $22,000 was appropriated, (by the act of Congress of June 14, 1836, providing "for the payment of Indian annuities and other purposes,") "to defray the expenses of holding treaties with Indians in the vicin- ty of Green Bay; Indians within the State of New York; the Winnebagoes north and south of the Wisconsin, and with the Sacs and Foxes north of the Missouri." These negotiations, with the exception of that with the tribes in New York, were confided to Governor Dodge, but no official report of his proceedings has been received. I have learned from other sources, that he has made an arrangement with the Sacs and Foxes for a cession of the reservation on the Iowa river, assigned to them by the treaty of September 21, 1832.

The duty of negotiating with the Indians in New York was committed to Mr. Schermerhorn. He has concluded a treaty with the Stockbridge and Munsee tribes, for the relinquishment of their lands on the Winnebago lake; and another with the New York Indians, for the lands granted them in the treaty with the Menomonesies of February 8, 1831. To the last those who emigrated from New York to Green Bay have assented, and he has appointed a time to hold a council with those residing in that State, at which it will be submitted to them with a view to procure their concurrence.

An appropriation was made in the act above referred to of $2,000, "for the purpose of extinguishing the Indian title between the State of Missouri and the Missouri river." The general direction of this matter was given to General Clark. The tract of country referred to, was ceded by the tribes who were parties to the treaty of Prairie du Chien of the 15th of July, 1830, and it was stipulated in the first article, that it should be assigned to the tribes then living upon it, or to such others as the President might locate thereon "for hunting, and other purposes." It is a long, narrow belt of land, separated from the Indian country west of it by the Missouri river. Its annexation to the State of Missouri was suggested by the Committee of the House of Representatives on Indian Affairs, in their report dated May 20, 1834, as a measure of obvious convenience and necessity, and it was deemed, by the citizens of that State important to its interests. Early in the last session of Congress a representation was made to the Department, of the willingness of some of the tribes to relinquish their rights to it; and a negotiation with them to effect that object was strongly urged. To this the President was unwilling to assent, as it would have been in disregard of the guaranty given to the Indians in the treaty of Prairie du Chien, and might be considered by them as the first step in a series of efforts to obtain possession of their new country. Appreciating, however, the force of the considerations that prompted the application, he consented that the subject of a cession should be submitted to the Indians, with an explanation of the reasons that rendered it a question of interest to the State of Missouri; but no change was to be urged upon, or required of them; if they preferred to retain the land, their possession of it would not be disturbed. In accordance with these views, a negotiation was opened by General Clark with the Iowas and the Sacs of Missouri, who, sensible, as they stated, that "from the local position of the lands in question, they can never be made available for Indian purposes," relinquished their rights therein. Advices have also been received, that the respective agents for the Sacs and Foxes, the Yankton and Santie Sioux, Omahas, Ottoes, and Missourias, have obtained the assent of those Indians to this measure. The agent for the Sioux of the Mississippi has not yet reported.

The treaty made with the Chippewas of Saginaw during the last winter not having received the sanction of the Senate, the acting superintendent of Indian affairs in Michigan, who reported that there was a prospect of a favorable result, has been authorized to effect a new arrangement with them, upon principles that will obviate the objections to the former one.

A treaty has been concluded with four bands of the Pottawatamies residing in the State of Indiana, extinguishing their title to twenty-two sections of land, reserved for them in the treaties of October, 1832, but it has not yet been received. The agent has reported that similar purchases from other bands will probably be effected.

Measures have been taken, with a view to opening a negotiation with the Miamies for the relinquishment of their lands in Indiana, in accordance with a resolution of the Senate at its last session.

Another resolution of the Senate requested the President to propose to the Indians, parties to the treaty of Chicago of 1833, an exchange of the lands north of the Missouri river, assigned to them by that treaty, for lands south of it. As no appropriation was made for this object, and a part of the Indians had emigrated, a part were removing and a part were in Illinois, the instructions to the sub-agent merely directed him to seek interviews with them, and to ascertain their dispositions in respect to it, and to report them in season for the action of Congress, should it become necessary.

The resolution of the House of Representatives of July 1st, 1836, requesting the President of the United States "to cause such measures to be taken for investigating alleged frauds in the purchase of the reservations of the Creek Indians, and the causes of their present hostilities," received his immediate attention. The honorable Thomas H. Crawford, of Pennsylvania, and Alfred Balch, Esq., of Tennessee, were selected for the performance of this duty, and they were authorized to call for the professional services of the United States district attorneys in Georgia and Alabama, whenever they required them. They were furnished with copies of the papers on file or on record in this office connected with the subject, and with ample instructions and discretionary power. They met at Columbus in September, and have since been engaged in the active prosecution of their labors. From advices received from them, dated October 14th, it is presumed that their report on the causes of the hostilities will be transmitted at an early day in the approaching session. It will be immediately laid before you, upon its reception. The other subjects committed to them will necessarily occupy more time. The high characters of these gentlemen will ensure to their reports the confidence of the country.

The reservations provided for the Creek Indians in the treaty with them of March 24, 1832, have all been located. Contracts for the sale of a number of them, equal in quantity to 1,231 sections, have been approved by the President. The approval of these conveyances was suspended by his direction in April, 1835, when allegations of fraud were made, and it will not be resumed until the present investigation of these charges and the causes of the hostilities, is terminated. The number of contracts certified and transmitted to this office, upon which he has not acted, is 2,627. Subsequent to the above date, the certifying agents were authorized to proceed in the discharge of their duties. General Jesup was also empowered to appoint agents for this purpose, and to permit an arrangement to be made with the chiefs, for the disposal of the lands that had not been sold, or the sale of which had been contested, provided, that in the latter case, no title previously acquired by purchase, and which should not be impeached, should be injuriously affected. Under this authority, an agreement has been entered into for the sale of a large number of sections, the previous contracts for which had been disputed. Upon this agreement the President has not yet acted, further information being deemed necessary preparatory to his decision. The commissioners, now in the Creek country, have likewise been authorized to employ certifying agents. The object of all these measures has been to obviate, by every practicable means, the objections of the Creeks to remove, founded upon their wish to dispose first of their lands. The hostilities that commenced in May last, resulted in the removal of nearly the whole nation before this object could be accomplished, and it is now more difficult to effect it in any satisfactory manner. But the efforts of the commissioners and of the Executive will be directed to it, with an earnest solicitude to adopt that course which will most certainly secure to the Indians who have remained peaceable, the full value of their lands, and the advantages of every beneficial stipulation of the treaty. Twelve of the sections reserved for the orphans have been sold, and the remainder of them will be disposed of under the direction of the commissioners, and the proceeds of the whole invested in public stocks.

A special commissioner has been appointed to certify contracts for the sale of reservations under the treaty with the Choctaw Indians of September 27th, 1830, and to receive the proof of residence for five years, which, by the terms of the 14th article of the treaty, is necessary to entitle the reserves to patents. This subject has become of a difficult and complex character, in consequence of circumstances to which I will briefly advert.

Immediately after the ratification of the treaty, the Choctaws who were desirous to emigrate, were anxious to dispose of their lands. As the reserves provided for them had not been located, they sold their rights. A few of the conveyances made by them were certified by the Indian agent; but when he declined continuing the practice, in consequence of the want of authority from the proper department, they were certified by citizens. The Indians removed, and their reservations were subsequently located upon the applications of the purchasers. The existence of these instruments was not known here until the last session of Congress. No certain evidence could then be discovered that conveyances had ever been directed, or the mode of executing them prescribed by the Executive. Some of them were at that time presented, and the department was called upon to adopt some measures by which the title of the purchaser could be perfected. It was obvious that the subject could be acted upon properly only in the Indian country. There only could the identity of the vendor, his right to the land sold, the adequacy of the consideration, its payment in good faith, and the fairness of the transaction, be ascertained. The commissioner who has been appointed (A. V. Brown, Esq., of Tennessee) has been fully instructed upon all points connected with his duties, and requested to execute them with all the despatch consistent with correctness, as their early completion was important to the holders of these Indian conveyances, who, meantime, would not be able to obtain patents, and might be disturbed in their possession by legal process.

The location of reservations under this treaty has not been completed, principally in consequence of the difficulty the agents experienced in procuring plats of the surveys, the dilatory manner in which the Indians or their assignees applied to have them made, and the obstacles in the way of identifying the tracts to which the Indian had entitled himself under the nineteenth article, by cultivating them. Instructions have been given for the vigorous prosecution of this business, which it is hoped will ensure its early fulfilment.

The execution of those provisions of the treaties of October 20, 1832, and May 24, 1834, with the Chickasaws, which are to be carried into effect prior to their removal, is nearly completed. Two efforts have been made, unsuccessfully, by these Indians, to procure a part of the Choctaw country west of the Mississippi for their permanent residence; a third has recently been sanctioned by the President, from which a more favorable result is anticipated. The lands ceded by them have been surveyed, and the reservations provided for the different classes of Indians have been located. At the date of the latest advices the sales of the lands amounted to $1,080,118 61, and of the reservations, to $2,919,508 50. Of the first amount, $315,000 have been invested in Alabama State bonds, and $215,000 in Tennessee State bonds, the interest upon which, at five per cent, is payable in New York and Philadelphia semi-annually. Of the second amount, arrangements have been made for the investment of $385,000 at the same rate. It may be safely estimated that the whole proceeds of the lands will give the Chickasaws a national fund, not much less than three millions of dollars, the income from which will enable them to place themselves in a state of enviable prosperity. And in addition, there will be a large amount of individual wealth, derived from the sale of the reservations.

Immediately after the adjournment of the last session of Congress, measures were taken to carry into effect the treaty with the Cherokees residing east of the Mississippi, of December 29, 1835. Major Benjamin F. Currey, superintendent of emigration, was authorized to select as many persons to appraise the improvements of the Indians as might be necessary, and to direct their operations. He has divided the ceded country into seven districts, and has appointed the requisite number of agents and interpreters. Many of the gentlemen selected by him as agents, have been heretofore placed in stations of responsibility by the suffrages of their fellow-citizens; they are now actively engaged in bringing to a close the business confided to them. Governor Lumpkin, of Georgia, and General Carroll, of Tennessee, were, with the sanction of the Senate, commissioned to examine the various classes of claims for which provision was made in the treaty. General Carroll having declined this appointment, in consequence of the duty devolved upon him under the treaty with the Chickasaws of 1834, and of ill health, John Kennedy, Esq., of Tennessee, has been commissioned in his place. In the absence of General Carroll, Governor Lumpkin proceeded to make all practicable arrangements for commencing and completing the duties intrusted to them; and he has reported that he had made such progress that the execution of them can be promptly completed after the arrival of his associate. Indications of a disposition, on the part of a portion of the Cherokees, to prevail upon a majority of the nation to consider the treaty as not binding upon them, induced the President, at an early day, to direct that a requisition should be made upon the State of Tennessee, under the volunteer act of the last session, for a military force, to be employed in the Cherokee country, and Bt. Brig. Gen. Wool was assigned to the command. A general supervisory authority over the execution of all the provisions of the treaty, and all agents employed therein, as ample as was consistent with the constitutional duty of the President, was confided to the commissioners. General Wool was instructed to procure, and cause to be issued, the provisions and clothing stipulated in the eighteenth article to be delivered to the Indians, as an advance of the annuity of the nation for two years. In the execution of their several duties, the commissioners and the commanding general were directed to invite the co-operation of the twelve persons designated in the twelfth article of the treaty to act as the agents of the Cherokees, in relation to every measure connected with its fulfilment. Of these, a part only have accepted this trust; the others, who are represented to be personally attached to Mr. John Ross, and subject to his influence, have declined. The conduct of Mr. Ross, in other respects, has been equally calculated, if not designed, to prevent the execution of the treaty. A council has been called by him, at which (it has been made known to this department) resolutions were offered and adopted, declaring the treaty to be a fraud upon the Government, the people of the United States, and the Cherokees themselves; an instrument, concluded by persons not possessed of competent authority, and null and void from its inception. To give effect to these resolutions, a deputation was appointed, with Mr. Ross at its head, to visit this city during the approaching session of Congress, with a view to obtain some modification of the existing treaty, or a new one. The same deputation was empowered to proceed to the country west of the Mississippi, to invite a co-operation of the western Cherokees in accomplishing these objects. Recognising the treaty as binding upon both parties, and its execution, after its ratification by the Senate, as imperative upon himself, the President directed that his determination to carry into effect all its provisions promptly, and to the fullest extent, should be made known to the Cherokees in the strongest and most explicit terms. He also directed them to be informed that no communication would be held, either orally or in writing, with any deputation that might come to this place with a view to delay or prevent its fulfilment; that if such deputation should go to the West, to obtain the assistance of the western Cherokees, they would be arrested and tried under that article of the act regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, which imposes a penalty upon "any person who shall deliver any speech, message, or letter to any Indian nation, tribe, chief, or individual, with an intent to produce a contravention or infraction of any treaty or law of the United States, or to disturb the peace and tranquillity of the United States." Regarding the discussion of the validity of the treaty as precluded by the signatures of the representatives of the Cherokees, the ratification of the Senate, and his own proclamation, he further directed that no council of the Indians should be permitted to assemble, or continue in session for the purpose of such discussion. Earnestly solicitous that all the beneficial provisions of the treaty should be enjoyed by the Cherokees, without any interruption of harmony and peace, he directed the most vigorous movements on the part of the several agents; and that, in no event, should force be employed, unless the measures of the Cherokees should indicate a disposition to prevent its execution, even at the hazard of actual hostilities.

The assent, in writing, of the Ottawas and Chippewas to the modifications in the treaty with them of March 28th, 1836, required by the terms of the ratification of the Senate, has been received and transmitted to the Department of State. Accompanying this paper was a memorial of the chiefs, explanatory of their views respecting the amendment in the 8th article, and expressing their desire that an arrangement might be made for their permanent settlement on the head-waters of the Mississippi. To accomplish this object, they request that a negotiation may be opened with the Chippewas west of Lake Superior and north of Rum river.

Before information of the assent having been given was received, measures were taken to procure the goods and provisions stipulated to be furnished these Indians in the 4th article of the treaty. Proposals to deliver them upon contracts at Michilimackinac were invited, in the event of the amendment in the ratification being agreed to. One hundred and thirty-nine thousand dollars were invested in goods in New York, which were distributed to the Indians under the supervision of the agent, the quartermaster at Detroit, and the commissioner appointed to investigate claims. The most satisfactory assurances have been received that in quantity, quality, and adaptation to the wants and tastes of the Indians, they were such as the Government ought to have purchased, and that the Indians were well pleased with them. Provisions, to the amount of eight thousand dollars, were procured in Detroit, and issued under the direction of the same gentlemen.

The examination of the claims of the half-breeds was committed to John W. Edmonds, Esq., of New York; that of the debts of the Indians to the agent, in conformity with the treaty, and Mr. Edmonds and Major Whiting were requested to co-operate with him. This duty was completed on the 29th September, but the official reports have not been received. Most of the payments, in lieu of reservations, provided for in the 9th article, have been made here, upon the drafts of the individuals designated. Arrangements will be made for giving effect to the beneficial stipulations in the treaty relating to education, missions, agricultural assistance, and mechanical establishments, as soon as the requisite information can be procured.

The execution of those provisions of the treaty with the Swan-creek and Black-river bands of Chippewas, of the 9th of May, 1836, which relate to the survey and sale of the lands ceded, and the investment of the proceeds, has been referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, by direction of the President.

A similar course has been adopted in regard to the survey and sale of the land ceded by the treaty with the Wyandots of April 23, 1836. The survey has been completed, and a proclamation will soon be issued for the sale.

4th. "Of the number of schools established in the Indian country."

This information, which is embraced in the statement marked E, together with that in statements F and G, respecting kindred subjects, is necessarily very imperfect. This arises, in part, from the remissness of the societies and persons in charge of these institutions, in transmitting the statements annually required of them; a remissness which measures will be taken to check, and as far as practicable, to prevent. The communications that have been received upon this subject show the existence of a strong desire among the tribes generally for the education of their children. The Chippewas and Ottawas in the Northwest desired that a very liberal provision should be made for this object, in the last treaty concluded with them. The united nation of Chippewas, Ottawas, and Pottawatamies, who are emigrating from Illinois, have preferred an earnest request, that the interest of seventy thousand dollars, appropriated for education under the treaty with them of September 26, 1833, may be applied to the support of schools in the country to which they are removing. Even more ample means were set apart for this purpose in the treaty with the Cherokees of December 29, 1835. The schools among the Choctaws are favorite institutions with them; and, under the teaching of competent men, and the supervision of a vigilant agent, have produced and are producing essential benefits. The Shawnees and Delawares have been improved by the labors of the instructors who for many years have lived with them. The western Creeks have recently manifested a disinclination to the residence of missionaries among them; and the acting superintendent having confirmed the facts alleged as the cause of this feeling, they have been desired to leave the nation. Minor institutions exist among the Ottobes, Omahas, and Sioux, which are yet in their infancy, but are favorably regarded by those tribes. The civilization fund is distributed principally with a view to the improvement of those Indians residing upon the remote frontier, and those for whom no provision has been made by treaty. The sums allowed have been expended under the direction of the various societies by whom teachers have been employed.

In all these establishments, instruction in mechanical arts and in agriculture is combined with intellectual cultivation. There is an increasing disposition among the Indians to have them located in their own country, where they become objects of common feeling and interest, and the ties of family and kindred are not separated or weakened.

My recent connexion with this office has not permitted me to make myself acquainted with the operation of all the provisions of the laws relating to Indian affairs; but some changes that are desirable, and some evils for which a remedy is required, are of so obvious a character that I beg leave to present them.

The 2d section of the act of 30th June, 1834, for the organization of the department of Indian affairs, provides that there shall be a superintendency for all the Indian country not within the bounds of any State or Territory west of the river Mississippi, and that the superintendent shall reside at St. Louis. I would respectfully suggest for your consideration the expediency of removing the site of this superintendency to Fort Leavenworth, or some other point on the Missouri river. One principal reason for its continuance at St. Louis has been the necessity of having a competent officer at the point to which most of the tribes emigrating to the west side of the Mississippi would proceed and at which means for their transportation and subsistence could be conveniently procured. This reason now hardly exists, a majority of those tribes having removed, and the system of removal being so organized, that each party of those who are yet to emigrate will be attended by persons able to make every necessary arrangement for it. The employment of the quartermaster at St. Louis, as the disbursing officer in that section of the Indian department, has relieved the superintendency of one considerable branch of its business; and the creation of the Territory of Wisconsin has greatly reduced its limits. This arrangement would enable the superintendent to inform himself of the conduct of the agents, the condition of the agencies and of the Indians, and when necessary, to visit them in person. The department would then have the benefit of his opinions, founded upon his own observation and knowledge, upon all measures recommended by the agents or sub-agents, and upon all requests preferred by the Indians.

The 4th section of the same act designated the tribes for which full agents should be appointed. The western Creeks, western Cherokees, and Osages were not included, and sub-agents were appointed for them, under the authority given to the President in the 5th section; and subsequently the Senecas and the Shawnees were placed under General Stokes, the sub-agent for the Cherokees. He has transmitted a strong statement, which is concurred in by General Arbuckle, of the inconveniences of this arrangement and of the onerous nature of his duties. Upon further examination it may be found expedient to establish a new sub-agency, to include the Senecas, the united bands of Senecas and Shawnees, and the Quapaws, who are at present attached to the sub-agency for the Osages. These bands have an aggregate population of about 1,000 persons; they occupy adjoining reservations upon the Arkansas river, and are about ninety miles from the site of the sub-agency. They have millers and smiths and stock, which require the personal care and inspection of some officer of the Government. This measure seems to be called for also by the approaching emigration of the Cherokees residing east of the Mississippi. There are 5,800 Cherokees now west of that river, and preparations have been made, as stated in a preceding part of this report, for the removal of those east of it. The duties connected with the settlement of these emigrants, the execution of the provisions of the late and former treaties, involving the examination of a vast amount of claims for spoiliations, removal, &c., will be sufficiently arduous for one person. The difficult character of these duties, and the responsibilities they impose, seem, in my judgment, to render it proper to appoint a full agent for this tribe. I respectfully submit this proposition for your consideration.

I would make a similar recommendation in regard to the Creeks. The considerations in this case are even stronger than in the preceding. The Creeks, like the Cherokees, have claims to a large amount to be adjusted, and large establishments to be inspected and maintained in operation. But the conclusive reason for the measure is the vast accession to their numbers occasioned by the removal of the friendly Seminoles and of the eastern Creeks. It will be a laborious work to carry into effect the treaties with those tribes. It will be a task of greater delicacy and difficulty to allay the irritated feelings of those so recently engaged in active hostilities, and to establish and preserve amicable relations between them and the Creeks who emigrated in former years.

The duties of the sub-agent for the Osages, even if the Quapaws shall be withdrawn from his charge, will be sufficiently arduous to warrant the substitution of a full agency. This tribe, unlike the others in the Western superintendency, live by the chase; they commit depredations to supply the wants attendant upon this uncertain mode of existence, and hostilities between themselves and other Indians are the consequence. These collisions require constant vigilance on the part of the agent, and impose upon him no ordinary responsibility. I therefore ask your favorable consideration of this suggestion.

The agent for the Choctaws is the acting superintendent for all the Indians residing south of the northern line of the Osage reservation. He has been assigned to this duty under the authority given to the President in the thirtieth section of the act of June 30, 1834, for regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes. The business thus devolved upon him is extensive and complicated. The full extracts made from his reports for this year in this communication, prove that it is ably and faithfully executed. It will be greatly augmented by the settlement within his limits of the Creeks who have emigrated, and of the Cherokees, who are under treaty stipulations to emigrate. If no territorial government be created, this increase of duties will render proper, in my judgment, an increase of compensation, and I respectfully request your approval of this measure.

The proviso to the act "making additional appropriations for the Delaware breakwater." &c., approved March 3, 1835, operates harshly upon the military officers employed in the Indian department, and will continue so to operate, so long as it shall be determined to adhere to the present system of disbursement. Under the regulations prescribed by the President in the summer of 1832, for the removal of Indians, and those for the payment of annuities, of July, 1834, all disbursements have been made by military men. The amount of these may be gathered from the amount of the appropriations, which, for the last five years, has averaged more than three millions of dollars. Those for the present year amounted to $8,431,000.

There are three principal points to which remittances are made: Detroit, St. Louis, and Little Rock.

To the first are sent the funds for the agencies in Michigan, Illinois, and part of those in the Territory of Wisconsin. From that place they are forwarded by the quartermaster stationed there to the several points of disbursement. The duties required of this officer, since the close of the last session of Congress, have been peculiarly laborious. In addition to the charge of the usual annual appropriations, he has purchased and issued the provisions, and assisted in the distribution of the goods stipulated to be furnished to the Ottawa and Chippewa Indians, under the treaty with them of March 28, 1836; been associated with the Indian agent and the special commissioner in the adjustment of claims and debts, and made most of the payments called for by the treaty, the remittances on account of which amounted to $482,000.

The remittances at St. Louis include the funds for the agencies in that superintendency, and those in that of Wisconsin, located east of the Missouri and upon the line of the Mississippi rivers. These funds are forwarded to the quartermaster at that place, and transmitted by him to the assistant quartermasters at the several military posts. To these he gives instructions, and from them he receives their accounts, which he examines before transmitting them to this office. The amount sent to him in 1835 and 1836 was $322,000.

The remittances to Little Rock include the funds for the agencies in the Western territory. These are procured by the principal disbursing agent upon Treasury warrants, payable at New Orleans. A large amount of specie is annually required to pay the annuities of the Indians. Two journeys in each year are always necessary, and in some instances a greater number. These must sometimes be made through a country unexplored and but thinly settled, and the money constantly guarded. When it reaches Little Rock, there is no bank in which it can be deposited, and the officer must secure it in the best way he can, until the period of disbursing it. This disbursement is made to the Indians by military officers, acting under his direction, for whose doings he is responsible, and whose accounts are rendered through, and examined by him. Besides the ordinary Indian expenditures, he is charged with a large part of those for the removal and subsistence of emigrating Indians, and for the purchase of various articles stipulated to be furnished them. The amount sent to this point, in the last and present years, for these objects, was more than $600,000. A reference to document 512, of the first session of the twenty-third Congress, printed by order of the Senate, which embraces the correspondence with him between the 30th November, 1831, and the 27th December, 1833, will give some idea of the laborious and responsible character of his duties, and of the ability with which they have been performed.

The attention of the department was called to this subject by the Commissary General of Subsistence, in his report dated November 12, 1835, with more especial reference to the compensation of officers engaged in the removal of Indians. It is therein stated, that prior to the passage of the proviso, there had been allowed to a principal disbursing agent the pay and emoluments of a quartermaster, and to disbursing agents those of an assistant quartermaster. Captain Brown, the disbursing officer at Little Rock, was the only principal disbursing agent to whom this compensation had been paid. These allowances had all been cut off by the proviso, and the officers selected to accompany large parties of Indians through a difficult country, and to provide for their wants, had not since received any remuneration for these arduous services, beyond their ordinary emoluments. The case is the same with the assistant quartermasters at military posts who are required to pay annuities, &c. to the Indians; to do which, they are often obliged to take with them into the Indian country large amounts in specie, for the safety of which they are accountable.

There is a strong analogy between the duties required of military officers in this branch of the service (particularly of the one at Little Rock) and those of some of the persons employed in the sale of the public domain, which, it seems to me, should ensure to this subject a favorable action. The receivers of public moneys are allowed by the law of May 20, 1828, a salary of $500, and one per cent. on the amount received—the whole not to exceed $3,000 per annum. The act of May 22, 1836, provided "that a reasonable compensation might be made for transporting and depositing the money received by them, to be regulated according to the actual labor, expense, and risk of such transportation and deposit." Under this law, one-tenth of one per cent. is paid them for every ten miles' travel. In a large majority of instances, the positions of the receivers are attended with fewer risks and liabilities than that of the disbursing agent at Little Rock; and their duties (being homogeneous in their character) are less difficult to be performed. Yet, under the most favorable circumstances, the pay and emoluments of this agent cannot exceed $1,600. After a careful examination of the matter, in all its aspects, I beg leave to recommend that a commission be allowed to all military officers making disbursements in the Indian department, and that the requisite change of the law be requested.

The committee of the House of Representatives, in the report of May, 1834, say they "have reason to believe abuses have existed, in relation to the supply of goods for presents at the making of treaties, or to fulfil treaty stipulations." In accordance with the spirit of the 13th section of the act of 1834, which was framed to prevent these abuses, the general appropriations for presents and provisions are invested, whenever it is practicable, in the mode therein prescribed, and the articles themselves, instead of money, are transported to the several agencies, to be distributed to the Indians.

The 4th section of the act of June 30, 1834, "to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes," provides that any person who shall introduce goods into the Indian country, without a license, "shall forfeit all merchandise offered for sale to the Indians, or found in his possession." A seizure was made under this law in 1835, and prosecution commenced in the United States district court in the State of Missouri. The department was advised by the district attorney in December last, that "on argument, the court decided that the 4th section gave no authority to the agent to seize the goods taken within his boundary in violation of law; that the words 'shall forfeit,' did not, by implication, empower him 'to take possession thereof;' and ordered the goods to be returned to the owner. Whether this decision be according to the spirit of the 23d and 28th sections of the same act, and the general authority given in the 7th and 17th sections of the act organizing the Indian department, or not, it is respectfully suggested that, to avoid litigation, it may be expedient to procure the passage of an amendatory clause. If the decision of the court be correct, the provisions of the law are nugatory.

It has been found that the legal proceedings under the 20th section of the intercourse act, providing penalties for the introduction and sale of ardent spirits and wine in the Indian country, are dilatory and expensive. The desirableness of a process susceptible of more prompt and less costly application and enforcement, is presented for your consideration. The establishment of a tribunal in the Indian country, a measure recommended by the late acting superintendent in 1835, might obviate the necessity, with the attendant inconvenience and expense of having recourse to the court at Little Rock, and the delay occasioned by the intervals of its sessions. The latter clause of this section makes it lawful "for any person in the service of the United States, or for any Indian, to take and destroy any ardent spirit or wine found in the Indian country." This provision appears to have been considered by the committee of the House of Representatives, in their report of May, 1834, to be sufficient. In practice, however, it has been, in a great degree, useless. Reluctance to incur the odium or revenge of individuals has probably deterred white persons from exerting this power. And the authority, in the hands of the Indian, is dangerous to him and to others. To him, if exercised, because it would jeopardise his life; and to others, because it exposes all their property to any attacks his ignorance or passion may prompt. Besides, legal process, if it could be effectual, would be more in consonance with the general spirit of our legislation.

An application was made to this department during the last session of Congress, to direct the agents of the Government to apprehend and deliver to the owner certain slaves which had fled from him and taken refuge in the Indian country. The authority of the department to give such direction, it was determined upon full consideration, could not be maintained under the existing intercourse law. The case seems to me to call for some legislative provision.

The 7th section of that law imposes a penalty upon any person who shall, within the Indian country, purchase or receive of any Indian "a gun, trap, or other article commonly used in hunting, any instrument of husbandry, or cooking utensils." I would suggest the expediency of extending this provision, so as to prohibit the purchase of other species of property. Among those Indians who own slaves, there is a jealous feeling upon this subject.

The attention of the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the House of Representatives was requested, on the 4th of June, 1836, to the stipulation in the 14th article of the treaty with the Cherokees of December 29th, 1835, for the payment of pensions to "such warriors of the Cherokee nation as were engaged in the late war with Great Britain and the Southern tribes of Indians, and who were wounded in such service;" but no law was passed. It is desirable that the subject should be acted upon at an early day.

The 2d section of the act of May 1st, 1820, entitled "An act in relation to the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments," provides that any money appropriated for this department, which "shall remain unexpended for more than two years after the expiration of the calendar year in which the act of appropriation shall have been passed," "shall be carried to the surplus fund." This provision operates with great inconvenience, in the execution of the branch of public business committed to this office. From the character of the objects for which appropriations are obtained, the necessary preliminary investigations, the habits of the Indians, and the remoteness of the points at which the expenditures are to be made, it is frequently embarrassing to comply with this requisition of the law. For these reasons an extension of the term at the end of which balances shall be carried to the surplus fund, is desirable.

During the last session of Congress this department was called upon to state the quantity of land acquired by treaties with Indian tribes, and the amount stipulated to be paid for it, since the 4th of March, 1829. With the data in its possession, neither branch of this inquiry could be answered correctly. The information which has been subsequently procured, is imbedded in tabular statement H, appended to this report. From the nature of the case perfect accuracy cannot be ensured, in estimating the amount of the consideration for which the lands were ceded. It is made up of permanent annuities, lands, reservations for individuals, expenses of removal and subsistence, merchandise, mechanical and agricultural establishments and implements. The permanent annuities have been commuted at five per cent.; lands and reservations, valued at one dollar and a quarter per acre; expenses of removal and subsistence, and merchandise, put down at the amounts appropriated for them, and the mechanical and agricultural establishments, at the rates fixed in the act of June 30th, 1834, organizing the Indian department; where the provision for these last is permanent, they have been commuted in the same way with the annuities.

The general result is, that within the last eight years, 93,401,637 acres of land have been ceded by the Indians, for which the United States have stipulated to give them 26,982,068 dollars and 32,381,000 acres of land, valued at 40,476,250 dollars, making the whole consideration 67,458,318 dollars.

The obvious reflection suggested by these facts, is the increased liberality and kindness of the United States in its intercourse with the aboriginal people. In 1789, General Knox, in a communication addressed to the President of the United States, remarked, that as the settlements shall approach near to the Indian boundaries established by treaties, "they will be willing to sell further tracts for small considerations." An examination of the earlier treaties will show how little proportion the sums paid bore to the quantity and value of the land acquired. Ten, twenty, or thirty cents per acre were seldom exceeded. The average sum, paid in the period embraced in the annexed statement, is seventy-two cents per acre. In the late treaties with the Chickasaws and some other tribes, the provisions have been even munificent, the United States having given to them the whole nett proceeds of their lands.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. A. HARRIS,

Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Hon. B. F. BUTLER, Secretary of War ad interim.

Vol. XIII.—I

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
December 3, 1836.

To the President of the United States:

SIR: In presenting for your consideration at this time, the condition of our navy for the past year, I am enabled to assure you that, since my report of the 5th of December last, there has been an increased activity in the construction and equipment of vessels at our navy yards, and in the movements of our ships and squadrons at sea and on foreign stations.

The Columbia, a frigate of the first class, has been finished, launched, and nearly completed for sea.

The brigs Dolphin and Porpoise have been built, launched, and fitted for sea.

The frigate Macedonian, of the second class, has been finished, launched, and equipped for sea, and she is now receiving her crew as the ship of the commanding officer of the South-sea exploring expedition.

The two barks Pioneer and Consort, and schooner Pilot, have been built, launched, and so far equipped as to be ready for receiving their crews.

The store-ship Relief has been finished, launched, and equipped, and is now receiving her stores.

The repairs of the ship of the line North Carolina have been completed, and she is equipped and fitted for sea, and is now under sailing orders for the Pacific station.

The repairs of the razee Independence have been completed, and she is now nearly equipped for sea.

The ship of the line Delaware has been placed in dry-dock, and her repairs commenced.

The ship of the line Columbus has also been put into dry-dock, and her repairs commenced.

The repairs of the ship of the line Ohio have been commenced and considerably advanced.

The repairing of the sloops of war Falmouth and Fairfield has been completed.

The sloop of war Natchez and schooner Grampus have been repaired and equipped for sea.

The labor upon the ship of the line Pennsylvania has been resumed with a view to her completion, and she will probably be ready for launching in the early part of next summer.

The steam vessel building at New York is so far completed as to be ready for the reception of her engines and machinery; in procuring which there has been some unavoidable delay. It was desirable to secure the services of the most able engineer in the United States to superintend the construction of the engines and machinery of this as well as other steam vessels proposed to be built for the service of the United States. Efforts have been made to secure the services of such an engineer, but without success. The first attempt to procure the requisite engines and machinery by contract, by advertising for proposals, proved abortive, as the lowest offers for boilers and for the engines, were made by different persons, and the person offering for the engines declined the contract because he could not also have the contract for the boilers. Arrangements, however, have been since made for procuring the engines and boilers wanted; and the vessel will probably be ready for service in the course of next summer.

For a detailed statement of the condition of our vessels on the stocks, as well as those afloat at our navy yards, and the means of completion as well as repair, I beg leave to refer to the reports of the Commissioners of the Navy Board, herewith submitted, marked H and I; and for the amount of timber, iron, and other materials procured for the gradual improvement of the navy, I refer to their report marked L.

Much has been done in advancing the works and improvements hitherto authorized at the different navy yards, except at that of Pensacola. The works and improvements for which appropriations have been made at that yard, have been delayed until a permanent plan for the same, after a due examination of a board appointed for that purpose, could be adopted.

Since my last annual report the following vessels have been employed in the Mediterranean: the frigates Constitution, United States, and Potomac, the sloop of war John Adams, and schooner Shark; the ship of the line Delaware having been withdrawn from that squadron and the frigate United States added to it within the present year.

The frigate Potomac having been employed on that station for upwards of two years, has been ordered home, with instructions to run down the coast of Africa and visit the settlements at Cape Mesurado, Cape Palmas, and Bassa Cove, thence proceed to Rio de Janeiro, and after communicating with the commander of our squadron there, to return to Norfolk.

In the West Indies, the frigate Constellation, the sloops of war Vandalia, St. Louis, Concord, Warren, Boston, and Natchez, and the schooner Grampus, have been actively employed. The Warren sailed for that station the latter part of December last, and has returned within a few days to Norfolk for repairs, and when these shall be completed she will rejoin the squadron.

The Concord sailed from Portsmouth, New Hampshire, the 27th of February last; the Boston on the 10th of July last, from Boston; the Natchez from New York on the 4th of August, and the schooner Grampus on the 10th of April last. All these vessels, except the Warren, are now on that station.

The brig Porpoise has been employed in conveying the commissioners appointed under a resolution of the Senate directing an examination of the harbors south of the Chesapeake bay, with a view to their fitness for the purposes of a navy yard. She is daily expected at Norfolk, after which it is intended that she shall sail as soon as conveniently may be, to join the West India squadron.

On the coast of Brazil, the sloops of war Erie and Ontario have been employed. The Ontario returned to the United States in June last, has been undergoing repairs at Norfolk, and she is reported to be in readiness for a crew.

The brig Dolphin sailed in September last from New York, with instructions to proceed to the coast of Africa, and visit the settlements at Gambia, Bissan, Nunez, Cape Mesurado, Bassa Cove, and Cape Palmas, thence to proceed to Rio de Janeiro, to form a part of the Brazilian squadron.

In the Pacific, the frigate Brandywine, the sloop Vincennes, and the schooner Boxer have been employed. The sloop Vincennes, which previously to my last report was ordered to return to the United States by the way of the East Indies, arrived at Norfolk on the 6th of June last.

The frigate Brandywine has been ordered home, and she is probably on her way at this time: her place will be supplied by the ship of the line North Carolina, now under sailing orders.

In the East Indies, the sloop Peacock and schooner Enterprise have been engaged in protecting as well as extending our commerce. They are now on their return to the United States, with orders to visit the settlements of the American Colonization Society on the coast of Africa, near Cape Palmas, Bassa Cove, and Monrovia.

Our squadrons at sea and on foreign stations have afforded to our commerce all the aid and protection that their means would permit.

It was believed that our commerce in the Gulf of Mexico and in the West Indies would be more exposed than in any other quarter. To meet the apprehended danger an unusually large force has been placed at the disposal of Commodore Dallas, the commander of the West India station. In addition to the vessels already stated as forming his squadron, three revenue cutters and three steamboats have been placed under his command; and he has been charged with the complicated duties of protecting our commerce, of preventing the importation of slaves into Texas or the United States, and of co-operating with the officers of the army and militia in prosecuting the war against the Creek and Seminole Indians; in the performance of all which duties his squadron has rendered the most essential services to the country.

In maintaining so large a force on the West India station, which ought to be still increased, it has not been in the power of this Department to send to other stations the number of vessels which the safety of our commerce required; and serious apprehensions have been justly entertained that our merchants might sustain heavy losses from the want of an adequate force in the Pacific and on the Brazilian station, especially on the latter. Although these apprehensions have not been realized, yet a due regard to the interests of commerce and the honor of our country requires that a more respectable force should be sent to those stations as soon as practicable. There is no serious difficulty in sending out such a force but that arising from the want of seamen, and this difficulty will be in some degree obviated on the arrival of the vessels now on their return to the United States.

When, at the commencement of the last and preceding sessions of Congress, it was recommended that a considerable addition should be made to the number of our ships in commission, to meet the exigencies of the rapidly-increasing commerce of our country, it was perceived that, should the measure be adopted, as it has been by the liberal appropriations of Congress, it would be necessary to adopt, at the same time, measures for increasing the number of our seamen. The most obvious means of accomplishing this object was the one recommended of enlisting into the service of our navy boys over the age of thirteen and under the age of eighteen, until they shall arrive at the age of twenty-one years. A bill for this purpose has been before the Senate for the last two sessions, which it is confidently hoped will become a law during the approaching session of Congress. In the mean time, as a larger number of seamen is required for the merchant service than usual, and as there is at present actually in the naval service of the United States one-fifth more seamen than were employed three years ago, and a greater number than has been employed at any time within the last fifteen years, some difficulty must necessarily exist in recruiting seamen required for immediate service.

The terms of service of the seamen on the Pacific and Brazilian stations are about to expire. Those on the Pacific station have been ordered home, but will not probably arrive before the middle of January next. In the mean time, the North Carolina is ordered to that station, requiring immediately a large number of seamen; and Captain John B. Nicolson has been selected to sail in the razez Independence, to relieve the commander on the coast of Brazil, who, when relieved, will return with the seamen belonging to his station. The Independence will require a large number of seamen to complete her crew; besides, it is important that each of these ships should be attended with one or two smaller vessels; but this is impracticable in the present state of the service.

It will be easily perceived, therefore, that the force wanted for the protection of commerce exceeds the means of supply which this Department can immediately bring into operation. When, therefore, on the 18th of May last, it was provided by an amendment to the general naval appropriation bill that the President of the United States should be authorized to send out a surveying and exploring expedition to the Pacific ocean and South seas, I considered it impracticable to fit out this expedition in a manner to meet the views of Congress, under eight or nine months, without a serious injury to other branches of the naval service.

The only insurmountable difficulty, however, in my opinion, was, the recruiting the requisite number of seamen in three or four months, without interfering with arrangements already made for sending ships to the Pacific and Brazilian stations, and for sending an additional force to the West Indies.

As, however, it was your earnest wish that the intentions of Congress in authorizing this measure should be carried into effect with the least possible delay, and that the expedition should be fitted out upon the extensive and liberal scale which the indications of public opinion seemed to require, and as the officer (Captain Thomas Ap Catesby Jones) selected for the command of the expedition gave assurances that the difficulty of obtaining seamen could be obviated by giving him power to have them recruited under his immediate superintendence, and for this particular service, it was determined to make an extraordinary effort to accomplish these objects.

Every facility consistent with the rules and regulations of the navy was afforded Captain Jones for recruiting seamen in the manner he proposed; and measures were immediately adopted to have one frigate of the second class, one store-ship, two barks, and one schooner, all which he considered as indispensably necessary to the success of the enterprise, prepared without delay. The frigate and store-ship, which were on the stocks when this measure was adopted, have been finished and equipped, and are now receiving their crews; and the other three vessels have been entirely built and equipped for sea. The whole have been finished in the most substantial manner, and adapted to the particular service for which they are destined. These vessels will sail to Norfolk to complete their crews, take in their stores, and to await further orders.

To prevent any delay that might arise from the want of mathematical, astronomical, and philosophical instruments, books, maps, charts, &c. required for the expedition, Lieutenant Wilkes of the navy was sent to Europe, and sailed from New York on the 8th of August last, to make the necessary purchases; in which he has been successful as to the greater part of the articles wanted. For some instruments, however, he has been under the necessity of waiting until they can be manufactured. His return is expected about the middle of this month.

It is believed that every proper exertion has been made to recruit men for this service, but without the anticipated success; no more than about two hundred, according to the returns received, being as yet recruited; and as Captain Jones requires five hundred and eighteen petty officers, seamen, ordinary seamen, boys, and marines, together with eighty-five commissioned and warrant officers, for his squadron, it is evident that a considerable time must yet elapse before the expedition can be ready for sea.

Recruiting seamen for a particular service may be attended with great inconvenience, and should not be adopted but upon the most urgent occasion, such as that of the exploring expedition was conceived to be. If the exigencies of the Government should require of such recruits services different from that for which they were enlisted; discontent, and even mutiny, may be apprehended. Besides, this mode of recruiting cannot but interfere with the recruiting for the general service, and in the present case, the order to recruit for the exploring expedition has made it necessary to adopt the same mode of recruiting for the crews of the vessels about to sail for the Pacific and Brazilian stations.

Recruiting for three distinct objects of service at the same time, while the usual recruiting for the general service is continued, cannot but retard the whole, and compel us to keep in receiving vessels a much larger number of recruits, constantly disposed to desert, than would be required if recruited for the general service alone.

Although the number of recruits is small for any one of these objects, yet, in the aggregate, the number is quite as great as should be expected when we consider the unusually great number of seamen now in the naval service of the United States, and the great demand for them in the merchant service.

Although the return of the public vessels now ordered to the United States will, to a considerable extent, furnish men for future service, yet, sending out so large a force as that required for the exploring expedition, to be detained for the term of three years, cannot but be felt as a serious inconvenience in fitting out the number of vessels wanted for the immediate protection of commerce.

As it has been evident for the last three months that this exploring squadron could not be ready for sea before the commencement of the approaching session of Congress, nor indeed until a late period of the session, I have not yet attempted to organize a scientific corps for the expedition. But, from inquiries made, I am happy to say that, in most of the departments of science, we have gentlemen ready and willing to embark in this enterprise, whose labors will reflect honor upon themselves and upon the country.

From several learned and philosophical societies, as well as from distinguished individuals, I have received the most ample and satisfactory communications, embracing all the various subjects which it will be necessary to give in charge to the gentlemen who are to conduct the scientific researches, which form the most important objects of the expedition.

These communications, so promptly and liberally furnished, are in the highest degree creditable to their authors.

The scientific corps may be organized as soon as accommodations can be afforded them in the vessels of the exploring squadron; and those vessels may leave their place of rendezvous at any season of the year, when prepared for sea.

Under the acts concerning naval pensions, and the navy pension fund, there are—

The annual amount to pay widows is -	$34,185 00
Do. do. do. invalids is -	23,824 00

The nominal value of stocks of every description belonging to the fund is $1,143,638 84; of which, $641,600 is, by direction of Congress, vested in the stock of the United States Bank; and until the law which directs such investment shall be repealed or altered, this Department will have no authority to withdraw the money or make any different investment of it. If permitted to continue in United States Bank stock, it is very probable that many months will elapse before any income can be derived from this part of the capital; and in the mean time the pension fund may sustain a loss, by the necessity of selling other stocks to meet the necessary disbursements.

Of widows on the pension-list, eighty-nine have been paid from the day of their husbands' deaths, respectively; and sixty-nine have been paid only from the 30th day of June, 1834, as required by the act of Congress of that date.

Under the privateer pension fund, the number of pensioners is 35.

The annual amount to be paid them is $2,766. The amount of stock (Maryland five per cent.) belonging to the fund is $4,667 05.

From this statement it is evident that legislative provision must be made for the payment of these pensioners when the fund shall be exhausted, which will probably occur before the 1st of January, 1838.

I would, therefore, respectfully suggest the propriety of making a permanent provision for the payment of these pensions, which, by law, are granted "during disability or during life."

Of the navy hospital fund, the balance on the 1st of October, 1835, was - $52,878 79

Payments to the fund from the 1st of October, 1835, to the 1st of October, 1836 - 25,340 73

Disbursements during the same period, - $78,219 52

Balance on the 1st of October, 1836, - $75,717 36

The necessary disbursements of the fund, it will be seen, bear but a small proportion to the amount of its receipts; and I therefore repeat a recommendation heretofore offered, that provision be made by law for investing this surplus in some safe stock for the benefit of the fund. The documents hereunto annexed, marked and numbered O No. 1 to O No. 5, P No. 1 to P. No. 4, and Q, furnish all the information respecting those funds required by the third section of the act of Congress of the 10th of June, 1832.

I must beg leave to repeat what I have heretofore stated, that, under the act of June 30, 1834, the widows of officers, seamen, and marines, who have died in the naval service since the 1st of January, 1824, or who may die in the said service by reason of disease contracted, or by casualties by drowning or otherwise, or of injuries received while in the line of duty, are entitled to pensions equal to half the amount of the pay to which their husbands respectively were entitled at the time of their deaths.

The act of the 3d of March, 1835, "to regulate the pay of the navy of the United States," and which increased the pay of many of the officers, is silent as to pensions. A difficulty arises in ascertaining the proper amount of pension to be allowed to the widows of naval officers whose pay has been increased by this act.

The pay of a captain in command of a squadron on a foreign station was increased to four thousand dollars a year; when on other duty, to three thousand five hundred dollars a year; and when off duty, to two thousand five hundred dollars. A corresponding increase of pay is made to other officers.

In the case, for instance, of a captain dying when in command of a foreign station, a question arises whether his widow shall receive a pension to the amount of six hundred dollars a year, to which she would be entitled if the act increasing the pay had not passed, or whether she shall receive the half of the amount to which her husband was entitled as commander on a foreign station, as a captain on other duty, or as a captain off duty. Like difficulties occur with respect to the widows of other officers. The necessity of an explanatory act to obviate these difficulties was respectfully suggested. The subject received the attention of both Houses of Congress, but no final action was had upon it. The question remaining unsettled, creates much embarrassment in this Department.

That the widow of a captain who for years has commanded on foreign stations but has returned to his country, and not on duty at the time of his death, shall receive but little more than half the pension she would be entitled to had her husband died a few weeks or days sooner, is evidently unjust. Nor is it just that the widows of captains who died of wounds received in battle or otherwise, in the late war, should receive pensions of but a little more than half what might be awarded to the widows of captains dying since the 3d of March, 1835.

The rank of the officer, it is respectfully suggested, should regulate the amount of pension to the widow, rather than the accidental circumstance of service at the time of his death.

In my last annual report I stated that, previously to the passing of the act of the 30th June, 1834, for the better organization of the United States marine corps, double rations had been allowed to the commandant of the corps, and to the officers of the same commanding at the navy yards at Portsmouth, Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Washington, Norfolk, and Pensacola, and to the senior marine officers in the squadrons in the Mediterranean, the West Indies, the Brazilian coast, and the Pacific ocean, all receiving the sanction of Congress by their appropriations. By this act the officers of the marine corps are to receive the same pay, emoluments, and allowances as are given to officers of similar grades in the infantry of the army.

The act of the 16th of March, 1802, fixing the military peace establishment of the United States, authorizes allowances to the commanding officers of each separate post, of such additional number of rations as the President of the United States shall from time to time direct. These provisions of this last act were there continued by an act of the 3d of March, 1815, fixing the military peace establishment.

The paymaster of the marine corps made payments for double rations to officers heretofore receiving the same, from the 1st of July to the 30th of September, 1834; but the accounting officers of the Treasury did not think proper to allow the same, inasmuch as the commands of these officers had never been designated as separate stations, agreeably to the rule prescribed for the army.

This is a case of difficulty which, it is respectfully suggested, requires legislative interposition. This subject received the favorable consideration, but not the final action, of Congress, at their last session. It is confidently hoped that the claims of this corps will receive the early attention which their necessities require, and to which they are entitled by their merits: merits which are much strengthened by their patriotic conduct in volunteering their services in a campaign against the Creek Indians, in which they have distinguished themselves by their zeal and perseverance in the duties assigned to them. As, however, they have been attached to the army while on this campaign, their merits will more appropriately receive the notice of the War than of the Navy Department.

In obedience to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 3d of March last, requiring a course of experiments to be instituted for the purpose of ascertaining the efficiency, and testing the safety, of the medium or light guns of the navy, and of comparing their effects with the guns for which they were proposed to be substituted, a board of commissioners has been appointed, consisting of Commodore Charles Morris, Commodore Daniel T. Patterson, Commodore Thomas Ap Catesby Jones, Captain William Shubrick, and Captain Lawrence Kearney, to make the course of experiments required. Several officers have been detailed to co-operate with them, and very extensive preparations have been made near Old Point Comfort to have the experiments made in the most complete and satisfactory manner. As soon as the proper experiments can be made, the results will be reported to the House of Representatives.

By your directions, given under a resolution of the Senate of the United States of the 24th of May last, that the Executive be requested to cause to be made the necessary examinations and surveys of the several harbors south of the mouth of the Chesapeake bay, and a report of the comparative facilities and advantages of the same for the establishment of a navy yard, a board has been constituted, consisting of Commodore M. T. Woolsey, Captain Alexander Claxton, and Master Commandant E. R. Shubrick, who were sent out in the brig Porpoise, under the command of Lieutenant William Ramsay, to make the required examinations and surveys. After having made those examinations and surveys, the commissioners have returned to New York. Their report, as soon as received, will be communicated, as required by the resolution. By your directions, also, a board has been constituted, consisting of Commodore Charles Stewart, Commodore Alexander J. Dallas, and Captain W. C. Bolton, aided by a competent engineer, to examine the navy yard at Pensacola, and to prepare plans for the improvement of the same. These commissioners have completed their examinations and plans, the result of which will be submitted to you in a separate report, for your consideration and approval.

Under the act of the 30th of June, 1834, authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to make experiments for the safety of the steam engine, and appropriating five thousand dollars for that purpose, the memorial of John C. F. Salomons, presenting a plan of a steam boiler composed of inverted arches, which he has invented, and which he considers as superior to the common cylindrical boiler, was referred to me by the House of Representatives.

On the assurance of Mr. Salomons that the sum of four hundred dollars would be amply sufficient for making all the experiments necessary for testing the value of his alleged improvement, I directed that sum to be expended in making and preparing two boilers under his immediate superintendence: one a common cylindrical boiler, the other upon his plan of inverted arches. Experiments were made upon these boilers in February last, near the eastern front of the Capitol, in the presence of a large number of the members of Congress and others; but without any satisfactory result.

Mr. Salomons requested me to make further experiments upon these boilers, which I declined, but permitted him to have the use of the boilers for making such experiments as he might think proper, so that if there is any value in his alleged improvement, he has the means of showing it at the public expense.

The sum of $519 75 was heretofore expended under this act in testing Mr. Phillips's supposed improvement in steam boilers, as stated in my last report, which, added to the sum expended on Mr. Salomons's supposed improvement, amounts to $919 75, leaving an unexpended balance of the appropriation of $4,080 25.

By the statement marked U, hereto annexed, it will appear that of the appropriations heretofore made for the suppression of the slave trade there remains in the Treasury a balance of $11,413 58.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

MAHLON DICKERSON.

REPORT OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,

December 5, 1836.

To the PRESIDENT of the United States:

SIR: In his report of last year, the undersigned stated the post roads of the United States to be about 112,774 miles in extent, and the annual transportation of the mails upon them equal to about 25,869,486 miles.

On the 1st July last, the post roads were about 118,264 miles in extent, and the annual transportation of the mails was at the rate of 27,578,620 miles, viz:

On horses and in sulkies,	8,291,504
In stages,	17,408,820
In steamboats and railroad cars,	1,878,296

Within the quarter ending 30th September last, improvements were ordered on old mail routes, increasing the rate of annual transportation 375,824 miles—306,592 miles of which was in stages. Of the routes established at the last session of Congress, 912 miles have been put under contract, adding 140,000 miles of annual transportation.

An express mail has been started within the last month from Philadelphia to Mobile, a distance of 1,230 miles, adding to the rate of annual transportation 895,440.

The rate of annual transportation at this time is little short of 29,000,000 miles.

Of the new routes, 30,557 miles remain to be put in operation, which will add to the annual service 3,487,788 miles.

The accompanying report of the First Assistant Postmaster General, marked (1,) will give this information more in detail.

The number of post offices in the United States on the 1st July, 1835, was 10,770; on the 1st July, 1836, it was 11,091; and on the 1st instant, 11,100.

During the year ending 30th June last, 666 post offices were established, 345 discontinued, and there were 1,844 changes of postmasters.

The number of post offices will be greatly increased in the coming year, in consequence of the great extension of mail routes.

The accruing revenue of the Department, for the year ending 30th June last, according to statements from the Auditor's office, was as follows, viz:

From letter postages,	$3,010,249 43
From newspapers and pamphlets,	376,217 13
From fines,	3,054 63
Estimated for deficient returns,	8,934 00
Total	$3,398,455 19

The engagements and liabilities of the Department for the same year, were as follows, viz:

For transportation of the mails,	$1,638,051 76
Compensation of post masters,	812,802 67
Ship, steamboat, and way letters,	26,470 76
Wrapping-paper,	15,013 82
Office furniture,	3,508 35
Advertising,	22,596 43
Mail bags,	24,837 44
Blanks,	27,029 06
Mail locks and keys and stamps,	5,887 07
Mail depredations and special agents	5,113 12
Clerks for offices,	122,933 35
Miscellaneous,	31,389 93
Estimated for claims not presented,	20,000 00
	2,755,623 76

Excess of revenue over engagements and liabilities,	$642,831 43
---	--------------

In the report of last year the excess was estimated at $476,227; but the revenue was $105,763 19 more than the estimate, and the expenditure $60,841 24 less, which accounts for the difference.

The revenue of the last exceeds that of the preceding year, $404,878 53, equal to 13½ per cent increase.

The general condition of the Department on the 1st July last, is shown by statements from the Auditor's office, to have been as follows, viz:

Due to the Department prior to 1st July, 1835,	$602,482 40
Deduct for bad and doubtful debts,	131,327 36
	$471,155 04
Due to the Department for the year ending June 30, 1836,	590,111 51
Cash in bank 1st July, 1836,	192,005 46
Due from the Treasury for extra clerk-hire,	22,419 81
Estimated for deficient returns,	8,934 00

The suspended claims, a part of which has been paid, are not included in these statements.

Of the old debts, there was paid out of the revenue of the year ending 30th June last, the sum of $466,376.

As anticipated in the last report, the bank debt was paid off in April last. The cash in bank has since rapidly accumulated, and on the 1st of November last was $550,000. Deducting all outstanding warrants it was $503,721 11. The sum of $83,278 has since been paid to Messrs. Stockton and Stokes, on the award of the Solicitor of the Treasury; but notwithstanding this payment, and a great extension of mail service, it is estimated that the cash in bank will exceed $600,000 before the 1st day of May next.

The accounts of postmasters are rendered, and the quarterly balances paid by them with admirable promptitude. There are 1,010 post offices, yielding about $382,000, after deducting the compensation of postmasters and other charges paid by them, which deposit their nett income in bank weekly or monthly during each quarter or within fifteen days after its close. There are 9,388 offices, yielding a nett revenue of $222,000 quarterly, which are directed to pay their proceeds to contractors immediately after the close of each quarter. The number of offices directed to retain their funds until drawn upon is 141, yielding about $8,600 quarterly. The balances of the offices are special, and pay directly to those who carry the mails to them for the proceeds, except a few new offices and others which are not yet arranged under either denomination. From an examination of actual results, the undersigned is warranted in saying that more than ninety-five per cent. of the revenue of this Department is collected within thirty days after the close of the quarters in which it accrues, without any expense therefor whatsoever.

By an examination of a portion of the quarterly accounts, it appears that the increase of revenue for the quarter ending on the 30th September last, over the corresponding quarter of last year, was about sixteen per cent. The ratio will probably be as large during the whole year, especially as the improvements, the express mail, and the new routes, will produce a considerable augmentation. For safety, however, it may be estimated at fifteen per cent.; yielding a revenue for the year ending 30th June, 1837, amounting to $3,908,222.

During the year ending 30th June, 1838, the new routes and other improvements in the mail service will doubtless produce a decided effect on the income of the Department, and it may be reasonably anticipated that there will be an advance of at least fifteen per cent. over that of the current year. If this anticipation be realized, the revenue of that year, at the present rates of postage, will be about $4,494,000, exceeding the estimated current rate of expenditure at its commencement, about $638,000; and it is expected that the Department will have a surplus of cash in bank before the 1st of August next, exceeding $700,000.

In view of these facts and estimates, the undersigned does not hesitate to recommend a revision of the present rates of postage, to take effect on the 1st of July next, with a view to a reduction of about twenty per cent. To this end he suggests the following scale of letter postages, in lieu of the present, viz:

75 miles and under, - - -	5 cents,
150 miles and over 75, - - -	10 do.
300 miles and over 150, - - -	15 do.
600 miles and over 300, - - -	20 do.
Over 600 miles, - - -	25 do.

No better plan than the present suggests itself in relation to charges of double, triple, and quadruple postage, and postage by weight.

From its simplicity this scale will be easily remembered. It proposes to introduce the Federal currency, renders copper coins unnecessary in making change, and saves the loss to the people arising from fractions. It will reduce the labor now required in making up and examining postmasters' accounts about one-fourth.

If the proposed scale of letter postages shall be adopted, it will be necessary to raise the lowest rate of commissions, to enable the postmasters at the large offices to carry on their business.

The propriety of placing gold coins sent by mail on the same footing as bank notes, is suggested.

Great changes have taken place in the newspaper business of the country since the present rates of postage were established. Newspapers have not only increased in number, but many of them have grown to an inordinate size. Postage, however, is the same, whether the newspaper be great or small. If not carried over 100 miles and out of the State where printed, it is one cent; if out of the State and over 100 miles, 1½ cent. The policy of reducing the rates of newspapers, generally, is doubted. They constitute in weight probably two-thirds of the mails, are in many parts of the country difficult of transportation, and produce numberless failures. These considerations would be of no moment, if it were really necessary that large quantities of newspapers should be transported from one end of the Union to the other, as means of instructing and enlightening the public mind; but that office can be as well performed by the local presses as by newspapers from a distance. To reduce the postage on newspapers below the actual cost of carrying them, would be to tax the correspondence of the country generally, for the benefit of the large newspaper establishments in the principal cities, to the injury of all the distant and country presses. Such a measure is not believed to be consistent with sound principle or good policy. It is not sound principle to tax the business of one portion of the people for the benefit of another portion. It is not good policy to aid the large city establishments in monopolizing the newspaper circulation, to the exclusion of the local and country presses. But there is justice and good policy in graduating the postage on newspapers according to the size and weight of the matter to be conveyed. The following scale of newspaper postages is, therefore, suggested in lieu of the present, viz:

Size of newspaper.	Rates of postage.
	Carried not over	Carried over 200
Containing 550 sq. inches or under, { 200 miles, nor out of the State, ½ cent.	{	{ miles, and out of the State, 1 cent.
920 sq. inches and over 550 { do. 1 do.	{	{ do. 1½ do.
Over 920 sq. inches { do. 1½ do.	{	{ do. 2 do.

If these rates were reduced one-half it would not materially diminish the means of the Department, provided the entire newspaper postage were paid in advance. So great an innovation would probably be inexpedient; but when editors will pay in advance the postage of their whole impression sent by mail, the Postmaster General might be safely authorized to accept one-half of the foregoing rates.

Single newspapers are now extensively used, through various devices and conventional signs, to answer the purpose of letters, and evade the payment of postage. It would check this abuse if they were in all cases subject to double postage, to be paid in advance.

The postage on periodical pamphlets may be advantageously regulated upon the same principles as those suggested for newspapers, and reduced to the lowest rates which will pay for their transportation. If a preference be given to any thing it should be to works on agriculture, science, and the mechanic arts; but the principle is believed to be a good one in relation to the mails, that every thing shall pay its own way.

Fugitive pamphlets may with propriety be subjected to double postage, always paid in advance.

The proposed revision of postages, if taken as a whole, would reduce the income of the Department from two to three hundred thousand dollars below its estimated expenditures; but the surplus on hand will sustain it until the regular increase of revenue will cover the difference.

The franking privilege has been so far extended, and is by many so unscrupulously used, as to constitute an abuse which requires correction. Some who possess it do not hesitate to cover the correspondence of their friends and neighbors with their franks, in direct contravention of the laws. A wilful violation by postmasters, when made known to the Department, is punished by instant removal from office; but public officers of higher dignity, though more criminal, cannot be reached by the same authority. Violations of law in this respect by those who are under pre-eminent obligations to set examples of obedience to its precepts, are believed to be diminishing, and there is ground to hope that they will soon measurably cease. The justice or policy of the privilege in the extent now legally authorized, perhaps it does not become the undersigned officially to discuss.

An amendment of the law is necessary in reference to the mode of making contracts with railroad companies. The law prescribing the manner of making mail contracts generally, presupposes the existence of competition in bidding, and is adapted to the existing state of things on all routes where the mails are carried on horseback or in stages. But the reason of the law is not applicable to most cases where railroad service is required, because there is no competition. To advertise for service on such lines is a mockery. Either the Department must give what the companies choose to demand, or the compensation must be adjusted by negotiation before advertisement or afterwards. Practically, the power of the Postmaster General as to the amount to be paid, is unlimited, because he is authorized to accept the lowest offer, however enormous. It is desirable that this power shall be limited by a law prescribing some fixed basis upon which all such contracts shall be made. None presents itself so equitable as the weight of the mails to be conveyed. An act fixing a reasonable rate per pound for carrying the mails a given distance would operate as a restriction upon the power of the Postmaster General, whilst it would undoubtedly facilitate the making of arrangements with the railroad companies. At present the views of the Department and those of most of the companies differ so widely as to the amount which ought to be paid, as to render hopeless any present project of an adjustment. If the price were limited by law the companies would expect no more, and the Department would not refuse to pay it. To secure the advantages of competition where it exists, the practice of advertising might be continued, and the contracts assigned, as in other cases, to the lowest bidder.

A few of the railroad companies have exhibited a disposition to carry the mails at prices deemed reasonable. The most important of these is the Camden and Amboy company. The managers of that road, justly considering their interests as best secured by accommodating the public and the Government on liberal terms, have undertaken to convey the mails in a manner and at a price which are highly satisfactory. The Petersburg and Roanoke company have evinced a like disposition, as have some others.

To render the Department measurably independent of the railroads and accomplish other important results, an express mail has been started on the great mail line between New York and New Orleans. From New York to Philadelphia, and from Mobile to New Orleans, it is merged in the great mail carried in railroad cars and steamboats. The great mail is 12 days and 17 hours, according to contract, in going from New York to Mobile, and 12 days 12 hours returning. The express mail is 5 days 17 hours going from New York to Mobile, and 5 days 23 hours returning. One day is occupied in transporting the mails between Mobile and New Orleans.

The success of this experiment is not doubted, and the size of the mail already affords an assurance that it will produce an income more than sufficient to support it.

This mail leaves far behind all news conveyed upon railroads, or by any other means.

It will give unprecedented activity to commercial transactions between the North and the South. New York communicates with New Orleans in half the usual time; all enterprises are expedited; the whole intervening country, and the valley of the Mississippi, will feel the impulse.

The editors and people of New Orleans will receive the news from New York in less than half the time it has heretofore occupied in the transit. The editors will have the advantage of being the original dispensers of the news to their subscribers: and the people will obtain it through their own papers, without postage, five or six days sooner than it can reach them in the New York papers, with postage. The editors and people along the whole route, and to the right and left, will participate in the same advantages in a greater or less degree. On the other hand, the circulation in the South of newspapers from the principal cities of the North will undoubtedly be diminished. This injury is more than counterbalanced by the benefits secured to the local establishments; and if it were not, it is not to be brought in competition with the advantages of an earlier transmission and dissemination of commercial and other intelligence. No measures should be taken with a view to injure the great city establishments; but it would be unreasonable and unjust in the Department to withhold information from the people of the South because it cannot carry with equal expedition the cumbrous sheets of the Northern newspaper presses. It is, and doubtless will continue to be, the policy of the Department not to send the news with less expedition, but to bring the whole mail to the speed of the express as fast as it can secure continuous railroad or steamboat transportation.

The undersigned confidently believes it will be found expedient within the coming year to start express mails from Washington city, along the route of the national road, to St. Louis; from New Orleans, through Nashville, Louisville, and Cincinnati, to connect above with the great Eastern and Western route; and from Boston, through Albany, to Buffalo, New York. Such mails on these routes he believes would immediately support themselves, and give an activity to business and correspondence in every direction, which would much enhance the general revenues of the Department, and promote public intelligence and prosperity. But should experience or reflection lead to the conviction that these enterprises will not produce an increase of revenue sufficient to support them, they will not be undertaken.

The attention of the undersigned has been urgently called, by the Deputy Postmaster General of the British North American Provinces, to the insecurity of correspondence carried on through the packet-ships between Canada and the United States on the one side, and the British isles on the other. Valuable letters and packets sent from Canada through the port of New York, and from various parts of the United States, never reach their destination. The only effectual remedy which suggests itself is a regular mail across the ocean, and a connexion between the post offices of the two countries. By a reciprocal arrangement, mails might be interchanged between the post offices in New York and Liverpool, or any other foreign port, to be conveyed by the packets or other vessels under contract. The number of letters now crossing the ocean is so great that a moderate postage on them would pay the cost of their transportation. There is scarcely a doubt that such an arrangement may be effected, if Congress shall think it expedient to grant the necessary power.

The object of authorizing printers' exchange-papers to pass in the mails free of postage would be further promoted by extending the privilege to exchanges with printers in foreign countries—an extension which is desired by the printers in the foreign provinces bordering on the United States, and will be the more useful if the proposed interchange of mails with post offices in Europe shall be authorized.

The building in which the General Post Office is kept is not fire-proof, and its valuable books and papers are daily exposed to destruction. With such ample means as the Government now has at command, the undersigned perceives no good reason why the greatest possible security should not be given to its archives. The other Executive departments suffer inconvenience from the distance of the General and City Post Office; and since the passage of the late law which connects the Post Office with the Treasury, and makes frequent references to the President necessary, that inconvenience is seriously felt by the Department itself.

Annexed will be found an outline of the organization of the Department under the late act of Congress.

The contract office is overwhelmed with the increase of business brought upon it by extensions of mail service and the new routes. Its force is found to be inadequate to the performance of its duties, and it requires two additional clerks—one of the first and the other of the second grade.

The appointment office has a sufficient force for the performance of its duties with accuracy and promptitude.

The duties of the inspection office are rapidly extending, and its present force will not long be equal to their performance. Its chief object is a rigid supervision over the rendition of postmasters' accounts and the performance of contractors. Conducted with system and energy, it will soon be felt on our thousands of mail routes whenever a delinquency occurs. Most of the contractors perform their service with great fidelity and precision; but there are a few (some of them on important routes) who evade their contract obligations whenever they have a temptation to do so, relying for impunity on their adroitness in making excuses, and the indulgence of the Department. They will find it their interest to fulfil their engagements or quit the service. In some parts of the country where complaints of irregular mails are loudest, the fault is not in the Department or the contractors, but in the roads. The Department is obliged to use such roads as it finds; and it is unreasonable in the people to expect regular mails unless they will make good roads.

My three assistants are assiduous in their duties, often by night as well as by day, and, in relation to their compensation, deserve the favorable consideration of Congress.

The Auditor's office is proceeding with vigor to accomplish the objects of its creation. The disbursement of the post office funds through the Treasury (formerly deemed impracticable) is effected with the utmost facility. Post office warrants are reduced to the size of ordinary bank checks, and, with the check of the Treasurer endorsed, are remitted with the same ease, and answer the same purpose. Without the inconvenience of specific appropriations, the accounts of the Department are more specific, more easily understood, and more readily examined, than those of any other department of the Government. It is the desire of the undersigned (which the Auditor has shown every disposition to promote) to render them intelligible to any one who may examine the books.

Difficulty has in some cases been experienced in renewing for six months the mail contracts which will expire on the 31st instant, under the authority vested in the Postmaster General by resolution at the last session of Congress. The object of the resolution was to facilitate a change in the commencement of the contract year. To promote the same object, and avoid a like difficulty in relation to the remaining contracts, power is asked to let them in the usual mode for four years and a half, which will lead to the same result.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,
AMOS KENDALL.

REPORT FROM THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY, ON THE FINANCES.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
December 6, 1836.

In obedience to the directions of the "act supplementary to the act to establish the Treasury Department," the Secretary of the Treasury respectfully submits to Congress the following report:

I.—Of the Public Revenue and Expenditures.

It is believed that the whole amount of money in the Treasury on the 1st of January next, applicable to public purposes, will be about $41,723,959.

This conclusion rests in part on what has been actually ascertained, and in part on estimates.

Thus, the balance in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1835, was - $8,892,856 42
The receipts from all sources during that year were - - - - 35,430,087 10

Viz:

From customs	-	$19,391,310 59
From lands	-	14,757,600 75
From dividends and sales of bank stock	-	569,280 82
From incidental items	-	195,561 98
From Neapolitan indemnity	-	516,332 96

Those, with the above balance, make an aggregate of - - - $44,322,945 52
The expenditures on all objects during the year 1835 were - - - 17,573,141 56

Viz:

On civil list, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous objects	-	3,721,261 60
Neapolitan awards	-	508,436 93
Military service, including fortifications, &c.	-	9,420,312 69
Naval service, including gradual improvement	-	3,864,939 06
Public debt	-	53,191 28

For the details of the receipts and expenditures in the year 1835, reference is made to the annual account thereof, which is this day submitted to Congress in a separate communication.

The balance left in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1836, was, therefore - $26,749,803 96
The receipts into the Treasury during 1836, as ascertained and estimated, will be about 47,691,898 00
Of these, the receipts during the first three quarters are ascertained to have been - 38,141,898 04

Viz:

From customs	-	$17,523,151 79
From lands	-	20,048,929 88
Dividends and sales of U. S. Bank stock	-	292,676 67
Incidental items, including excess of repayments on account of public debt, as hereafter stated	-	247,139 70

This does not embrace the receipts in trust on account of the Chickasaw Indians.

Of those receipts and their investment, besides the expenditures from them, a report will forthwith be laid before Congress, in conformity to treaties and acts of Congress carrying those treaties into effect.

Neither does it embrace the receipts on account of the Post Office and Patent Office, of which, as well as the expenditures on the same accounts, separate statements are kept, in conformity to the late laws, and will be rendered by the proper officers.

Nor does it include what has been received in trust the present year for the claimants under the French, Neapolitan, and Spanish treaties.

A separate account will be exhibited in this report, of the receipts and expenditures from those sources, in order to avoid complexity and ambiguity in the statement of the general receipts and expenditures in behalf of the Government alone.

The receipts during the fourth quarter of the present year, it is computed, will be about - $9,550,000 00

These, with the balance on the 1st of January, 1836, form an aggregate of - 74,441,702 00

The expenditures during the year 1836 are ascertained and estimated to be - 31,435,032 00

Of these, the amount during the first three quarters is ascertained to have been - 20,791,372 16

Viz:

On civil list, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous - 3,850,101 55

Military service, including fortifications, &c. 13,010,061 59

Naval service, &c. - 3,931,209 02

Public debt, less than the repayments by the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, as hereafter explained.

For the details of all these and the incidental receipts during those three quarters, reference is made to the exhibit annexed, A 1 and 2.

The expenditures for the fourth quarter, as computed by the proper Departments, will be $10,643,660; but which, it is thought by me, will probably fall short of that amount. This will leave on hand, the 1st of January, 1837, an estimated balance of $43,005,669. From this, if the diminished sum of $1,080,000 for unavailable funds be deducted, the available balance of money on the 1st of January, 1837, would be $41,925,669.

But, beside the charges already imposed on this balance by appropriations for public purposes still unpaid, and which will soon be adverted to, there is in fact included in it about $201,710; which was paid into the Treasury, chiefly in former years, from private sources alone, and for private or specific purposes, and which neither accrued from the usual sources of public revenue, nor ever belonged to the General Government, except to fulfil the particular trusts under which it was received in behalf of others.

A schedule of those items and sums, on the 1st of December, 1836, is annexed, (B.) Deduct their amount from the available balance of $41,925,669, and only about $41,723,959 would remain on the 1st of January next, applicable to the general purposes of the Government.

To this deduction would be subjoined another, had not the receipts and expenditures connected with certain subjects during the present year, or portions of it, been kept distinct, for reasons before indicated.

Thus, the receipts on account of the Post Office, which, under the new organization, are paid into the Treasury, and kept distinct, have, since it took effect, being the last half of the year, been ascertained and computed to be about $1,076,872, including near $410,472 that had been collected previously; and the expenditures have been about $562,952, leaving a balance on hand at the end of the year of about $513,920, as will be more particularly exhibited by the head of that Department.

VOL. XIII.—K

The receipts on account of the Patent Office since its new organization, for the present year, have also been ascertained and computed to be about $16,828, the expenditures chargeable to them about $7,241, and the balance about $9,587, as will be more particularly shown by the report of the proper officer.

Besides these the receipts into the Treasury in trust from the treaties of indemnity with France, Naples, and Spain, have been about $3,765,994, and the payments to the claimants about $3,663,988, leaving a balance of about $102,026 still uncalled for or unadjusted.

The particulars of these will more fully appear in the general annual exhibit of all the receipts and expenditures.

Lastly, the receipts into the Treasury on account of the Chickasaw Indians, have been about $639,252, the expenditures by investment and otherwise, about $577,675, and the balance on hand is about $91,574.

The detailed account of these and the other transactions in their behalf, will be, as remarked in a former portion of this report, immediately presented in a separate communication to Congress.

The charges already imposed on the general balance of $41,723,959, by means of current and permanent appropriations, which it is expected will not be expended till after the 1st of January next, amount to $14,636,062.

Of this sum it is computed that $3,013,389 can be applied in aid of the appropriations for the ensuing year, without reappropriation, and that $195,183 will be carried to the surplus fund, leaving $11,427,490, which will probably be required to accomplish the objects contemplated in the acts of Congress.

Deduct this remaining charge of $14,440,879 from the balance estimated to be on hand on the 1st of January, 1837, and the sum of $27,283,080 would be left to be appropriated by Congress towards new or former objects.

II.—Of the Expenditures for the Public Debt, and its present condition.

Before the passage of the act of Congress, at the last session, on the subject of the public debt, the money which had previously been deposited by the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund in the United States Bank for the payment of the residue of it was, under their direction, repaid into the Treasury, amounting to the sum of $136,773 01.

Since that event, and the suspension of the duties of the Commissioners, this Department, by virtue of the above act, has caused all those portions of the public debt outstanding and presented for payment to be promptly discharged.

The payments made since the 1st of January last, have been as follows, viz:

On the funded debt, towards principal	-	$46,405 72
Towards interest	-	3,139 09

Making, in all, the sum of	-	$49,544 81
----------------------------	---	-------------

There still remains of the funded debt unclaimed and undischarged—principal about	-	$90,367 00
An interest, with dividends, about	-	250,416 00

A small unfunded debt of $37,440 55 also remains, which may hereafter be claimed, on which has been paid during the past year, including $16 07 for interest on Treasury notes, the sum of - 88 57

It consists of claims registered prior to 1798, for services and supplies during the revolutionary war, equal to	-	27,835 46
Treasury notes issued during the war of 1812	-	5,735 00
And Mississippi stock	-	4,320 09

III.—Of the Estimates of the Public Revenue and Expenditures for the year 1837.

The receipts into the Treasury from all sources during 1837 are estimated at $24,000,000, viz:

24th Cong. 2d Sess.]

Treasury Report.

From customs -	$16,500,000 00
From lands -	5,000,000 00
From bank stock -	2,000,000 00
Miscellaneous, including interest from dep. banks,	500,000 00
		24,000,000 00
To these add the balance of available funds in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1837, estimated, as computed, for public purposes, at		41,723,959 00
And they make an aggregate of	$65,723,959 00

The expenditures for all objects, ordinary and extraordinary, in 1837, including the contingent of only $1,000,000 for usual excesses in appropriations beyond the estimates, are computed at $26,755,831, provided the unexpended appropriation at the end of this and the next year remain about equal.

Thus, the new and permanent appropriations chargeable to 1837, for specified purposes, whether ordinary or extraordinary, and including what can be used without reappropriation, are computed at	$25,755,831 00
Of these, the permanent appropriations already made are estimated at	2,347,000 00
The existing appropriations, which will not be required for the service of 1836, and which it is proposed to apply in aid of 1837, amount to	3,013,389 00
The new appropriations that will be needed for 1837 are estimated to amount, in all, to	20,354,442 00

The latter are divided among the different branches of the public service as follows, viz:

Civil, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous	$2,925,671 00
Military service, &c.	10,758,431 00
Naval service, &c.	6,670,341 00

The details of the above estimates are exhibited in a document from the Register's office, which this Department has the honor to lay before the House of Representatives to-day in a separate communication.

To these have been added, for the ensuing year, on account of the usual contingent excesses of appropriations beyond the estimates, $1,000,000, making, in all, as before mentioned, the aggregate of $26,755,831.

From these calculations it will be seen that, if the outstanding appropriations unexpended at the close of 1837 be as large as at the close of 1836, and the other expenditures should agree with the above estimates, they would exceed the computed revenue accruing from all sources nearly $3,000,000, or sufficient to absorb more than half of that part of the present surplus which is not to be deposited with the several States. But if these outstanding appropriations at the close of 1837 should be much less than those in 1836, as is probable; or, should the accruing receipts be much less, or the appropriations made for 1837 be much larger than the estimates, a call will become necessary for a portion of the surplus deposited with the States, though it will not probably become necessary except in one of those events.

IV.—Some explanations of the Estimates for 1837.

The unusual receipts during the last two years have chiefly accrued from the unprecedented sales of public lands.

It is remarkable that those sales assumed their extraordinary character chiefly between July, 1835, and October, 1836, a period of little more than fourteen months.

Arising, as they have, principally from private entries, and not from any unusual quantities of land offered for public sale, and marked, as they have been, by sudden and great vibrations, it has not been deemed judicious to consider them as a proper basis for permanent estimates of a public character.

Accordingly, the sum adopted for the estimates of the sales the past year, as well as that for the ensuing year, though larger than usual, has been grounded on general considerations of a less fluctuating character, leaving accidental and occasional excesses or deficiencies to happen, as they often will, without either the attempt or ability in this Department to predict the extent of them with much certainty.

The receipts from customs the present year will be somewhat augmented by the great speculations which have characterized the business of the country generally, and the destruction by fire of an extraordinary amount of foreign goods near the close of the last year. This calamity, followed by credits more liberal, and competition increased to supply the sudden and large deficiencies in the market, led to an excess in the importations of merchandise during the present year, even greater than the amount destroyed, and thus essentially contributed to swell the revenue from customs beyond the estimates. But overtrading, from whatever inducements it may arise, usually produces a reaction, and it is hoped that no accident of a similar and deprecated character will occur which may enlarge our importations the ensuing year. The receipts from customs for 1837 have, therefore, from those and other circumstances which it might be tedious to detail, been estimated at not more than $16,500,000.

Only about $50,000 of the amount secured by special bonds from the sufferers by fire last December, under the authority of an act of Congress on that subject, has been postponed, so as to fall due within the ensuing year, while a reduction on account of the diminished rate of duty imposed on wines since July last, has been made in the estimates for 1837, equalling quite three times that sum. Besides usual speculations and overtrading, which are temporary in their operation, the last two years have exhibited an extraordinary degree of prosperity throughout the whole country, and which it is presumed will continue to exercise a considerable direct influence on the whole amount of our exports and imports; and, consequently, an indirect influence on our receipts from customs. Much of this flattering condition of things may have arisen from the great reductions already made in the tariff and duties on tonnage; from having cast off the burdens of the national debt; from our increasing expenditures on works favorable to commerce and public security; from permanent additions to the moneyed capital of the nation by the many millions obtained abroad for foreign indemnities; from the immense fertile tracts of land redeemed from Indian claims and opened to the profitable enterprise and industry of our citizens at very low prices, by the humane policy of removing the aboriginals west of the Mississippi; from the unprecedented improvements in the facilities, the rapidity and cheapness of communication and of transportation by steamboats and railroads; from the greater safety of our foreign commerce, and its extension to new and distant regions; from abundant crops and high prices; from the increasing numbers, intelligence, and enterprise of our people generally; or from these and various other causes combined. But though some of these causes may have spent most of their influence, others are acting in full vigor, and our national prosperity does not appear likely to be soon essentially checked, except so far as the excesses before mentioned, or war, or unavoidable physical calamities, like those of pestilence and bad crops, may from time to time produce temporary reactions.

The receipts from customs, therefore, though not estimated so high as they proved to be during the past or preceding year, have still been computed at a larger sum than it was formerly anticipated they would, on an average, equal, under the existing tariff.

The imports during the year ending September 30, 1836, are ascertained and estimated at - $173,540,000

They show, compared with the preceding year, an increase of - $23,644,258

The imports during the three past years have, on an average, been about - 149,985,691

The exports during the past year are ascertained and estimated at - 121,789,000

Of these, $101,105,000 were in domestic, and $20,684,000 were in foreign products.

Compared with the preceding year they exhibit an increase of $35,423, and are $5,829,150 more than the average for the last three years.

The crop of cotton grown the present year, which will constitute the chief exports of that article for 1837, is believed to be large; but from present appearances will probably be less valuable than during the two past years. At the same time the exports of flour and grain are likely to be smaller in both quantity and value; and those of tobacco and rice, which, with the articles before named, form our principal subjects of domestic produce for exportation, are not believed to be materially greater, and have seldom, during the last quarter of a century, in any series of years, much exceeded their previous amount. However enlarged by our rapid increase of population, has been the demand at home for those and other articles of our own growth and manufacture, the most tempting and augmenting product for exportation seems to be cotton.

During near forty years it has attracted and engrossed a large portion of the spare capital and labor of nearly half the territory of the Union. And by the great demand for it abroad, independent of its increased consumption at home, it will probably long continue to constitute, not only our chief and most profitable product for exportation, but be the regulator, in some degree, of our ability to import, and of the balance of trade between this country and Europe.

The receipts from incidental and miscellaneous sources have been estimated on the following data. Nothing very definite could be presented as arising from an arrangement which, under the recent act of Congress, is contemplated with the Bank of the United States in respect to the stock owned by the Government in that institution, until further progress shall be made, and the bank may indicate when it is willing to pay some specified amount.

It will be seen by the documents annexed, (C 1, 2, 3,) that this Department took early steps to procure suitable information for a settlement with the bank, and payment in the course of the present year of the due share of the United States in the nett collections from the assets existing on the third of March last, as well as to obtain specific proposals for an early adjustment of the whole concern.

It has been a cause of some surprise that the information desired has not yet been communicated, nor any payment been yet made. On the contrary, the president of the State corporation to which the assets of the United States Bank have been assigned, forwarded, in September last, a report of a committee appointed under authority of only those two bodies, estimating the value of the stock on the 3d of March; but it was accompanied by no offer to pay that value, or any other particular amount, then, or at any future specified period, though professing a willingness that the United States should receive a just proportion out of the assets of the bank.

Commissioners were therefore appointed, and an invitation given to have them joined by others on the part of the United States Bank, to revise the estimate of the value put on the stock by the above committee; and, after urging early payments as practicable towards what might in the end be found due to the United States, if failing to obtain any, to recommend such arrangement as might seem just for securing and paying hereafter what they considered to be the true worth of the share of the Government in the capital stock. Copies of the letters, report, and instructions before named are annexed, (D 1, 2, 3, 4, 5.)

It is clearly to be inferred from the correspondence since had by the commissioners above mentioned with a committee of the bank, that no payment whatever is intended to be made during the present year, and that long credits are expected and considered by the bank proper for portions of what may be due. That correspondence, and all the steps which have been taken under the particular instructions given to those commissioners, will more fully appear in the further documents which will be submitted to Congress after the commissioners make their final report. No reasonable efforts will be spared by me to conclude some appropriate arrangement of this embarrassing and troublesome subject before the adjournment of the present Congress. Trusting that a proper sense of its obligations to the Government, as a large stockholder, will induce the bank to refund at least one-fourth of our original capital, with the profits thereon, in the course of the ensuing year, two millions of dollars have on that account been inserted in the estimates. To this are to be added the dividends anticipated on the stock owned in the Louisville and Portland canal, interest from the deposit banks, and some small receipts from other miscellaneous sources.

V.—Of the surplus in the Treasury and disposition of it.

Various objects of a national and constitutional character were recommended in the last annual report from this Department, as suitable for the application, by way of extraordinary appropriation, of any surplus funds for which the General Government should happen to have no other immediate use.

Liberal and useful appropriations were fortunately made to many of them, which will save expense in the end, and prove to be the soundest economy. The reasons for a continuance of the same wise policy, while our resources remain so ample, have lost none of their original force.

As the present surplus had chiefly arisen from an earlier sale of large portions of the public lands than had been expected, it seemed to this Department judicious to suggest completing with it sooner than had been contemplated, the projected fortifications and naval establishments of the country; improving more rapidly the navigation and security of its commercial bays and rivers; and, while its imports and exports were prosperous beyond example, erecting, where needed, appropriate custom and warehouses, as well as suitable marine hospitals, court-houses, and post offices. In fine, the whole state of our finances appeared to justify and require that all those great works heretofore deemed useful and constitutional, and which are intimately connected with the duties and powers of the General Government, should be more hastened, with our means so much increased and so prematurely available, than would have been proper or practicable, had the revenue continued at only the reduced amount which was generally anticipated. By pursuing such a provident course, it was supposed that much less would remain to be accomplished, and hence, that our expenditures would be much diminished, when our revenue shall become less by the reductions which, under the existing laws, are to take effect in the customs before and in 1842, and which will probably happen in the receipts from public lands during that period.

The necessary expenditures of the Government would thus, by that time, become naturally as well as safely lessened, so as to bear a near proportion to our diminished receipts; while otherwise, if the expenditures for these works are not previously increased or expedited, the probabilities would seem to be, that the ordinary charges for them and other usual claims on the General Government, with the extraordinary charges incident to war and similar calamities, from which no people can be wholly exempt, might then so far exceed the receipts as to require new taxation or an increased tariff.

In respect to another branch of the subject, which relates to a reduction of the present large surplus in the Treasury, either by an immediate diminution of the existing tariff, or some new regulation calculated to limit and lessen the amount of the sales of the public lands by confining them to actual settlers, or otherwise, this Department felt bound, in the discharge of its public duties, to submit to Congress, last year, a few considerations which are still equally applicable. It is believed that when the balance on hand, with the accruing receipts, are likely for some time to come to exceed the real wants and just objects of the Government for expenditure, a reduction in those receipts, and especially such as are derived from taxation, is the true remedy.

Beside the considerations relating to this reduction which were formerly submitted by this Department, it would now respectfully suggest that all the duties under 20 per cent., and which amount to near three millions annually, could, with about half a million more on the articles paying a higher duty and specified in a report to the Senate at the last session, be at once repealed by Congress, without any encroachment on the principle of the act of 3d of March, 1833. Nor has this Department any doubt that if all the present and anticipated receipts from customs are considered by Congress not to be wanted for any public appropriation or other legitimate object, a reduction could be made in many other duties more rapidly than is now provided for, without any essential injury to any great interest intended to be fostered by the provisions of that act. At the same time, such a step as the last, unless found indispensable from high public considerations, and hence generally concurred in, does not appear to this Department consistent with the expectations of most of those who united in the passage of that law, and has not therefore been urged. But, if found indispensable, the next articles which, in my opinion, could be most appropriately selected for greater and quicker reduction, are the raw materials of foreign origin used in some of our important manufactures, and though certain rival articles produced here might suffer by such a change, yet in this way the whole manufacturing industry of the country would probably be benefited. If sufficient reduction cannot be obtained on that class, the next kind of articles selected should be such as are largely consumed in promoting the comforts and satisfying the necessities of the people generally, and at the same time do not materially compete with important manufactures, nor conflict with great agricultural interests. And the next, if more be deemed necessary, might be such as have now a much higher duty or protection on them than others of greater national consequence.

Certain it is that a much more just and useful discrimination could be introduced into the whole present system, by reducing more quickly the duties which are found to be least beneficial by way of protection, and by reducing more slowly those deemed most indispensable.

Equally feasible would it be, in the exercise of a proper spirit of comity and justice, to make some legal enactments which should prevent the further sale of the public domain to any persons who do not want it for immediate cultivation. This seems peculiarly proper at a time when the Government neither needs the proceeds of such sales for any public use, nor considers the money received adequate to the real value of the land sold; and when the settlement of the new States is retarded, by permitting the public domain to pass in large quantities into the hands of others than actual settlers. By a wise revision of our present laws, the enterprising, industrious, and needy, might, for a fair compensation, be liberally secured in the purchase and enjoyment of a due portion of land for immediate cultivation, and, at the same time, all be effectually prevented from seizing and securing, as a matter of speculation, in any case, on the best tracts, without previous purchase or any pretence of title, and from procuring, through floats or otherwise, for wealthy persons, whether residents or non-residents, the most valuable situations at the minimum prices.

It must be obvious that nothing beyond a very general, and in some degree uncertain exhibit, could, at this time, be presented of the probable amount of the surplus in the Treasury deposited with the banks and the States during a few subsequent years, and more especially of the various sums connected with the different hypotheses for the future disposition of it by appropriations for public objects, or by a diminution of it through a large reduction in our future revenue from either customs or lands. The uncertainty as to these sums is greatly increased, not only by the fluctuating character of our receipts from both of these sources during the last four years, and as is anticipated for the future, but from the doubtful amount of our annual expenditures hereafter, and the absence of any determination yet expressed by Congress, whether to retain, unexpended, all or any portion of the present surplus, till after 1841, with a particular view to supply the place of the great reduction which is then to be made in our receipts from customs under the existing laws. Minute details, therefore, on these points, would be only hypothetical, and might, without further data on which to found them, mislead instead of proving useful.

But it is probable that Congress may deem it expedient to pursue one of the following general courses in relation to the present large surplus, and any which might hereafter accrue under our existing laws—either to appropriate more liberally to great objects of national consequence, while the Treasury is so full, and in that way gradually call for and employ the surplus till those objects are accomplished, and then to reserve only the residue, if any, in deposit with the States, to meet future contingencies and the anticipated deficiencies in the revenue after 1842; or to make a more rapid reduction of the balance of public money now on hand, by legislation, which will largely diminish our revenue either from customs or lands, and thus require more of the current expenditures to be paid from the present surplus, until the whole shall be exhausted; or to permit the most of it to remain longer in deposit with the States, and so shape future appropriations as never to render it necessary to call for the surplus, except to meet unexpected and extraordinary wants.

In respect to this last measure, so far as already adopted by Congress, and the operation of it upon our fiscal concerns to this time and hereafter, a few further observations may be expected.

Before the two sessions of Congress just passed, it was considered doubtful whether that body would deem it expedient to adopt the recommendations of this Department, to expend early, on proper objects, all the net balance in the Treasury, after defraying existing charges; or, if unwilling to do that, to reduce at once the revenue from customs and lands, and leave with the people the excess which would otherwise be collected, so as gradually to absorb the present surplus, and ere long to collect none of any considerable magnitude, whether for extraordinary expenditures, distribution, or other purposes. Consequently, a suggestion was made in the annual reports of 1834 and 1835, for the temporary investment of the surplus while either of those operations might be going on, and, if neither of them was adopted, then to remain safe and productive until it should hereafter be needed for public purposes. The proposed disposal of it for these periods, which it was expected would not be very protracted, was in a form which was considered secure and profitable by the purchase of safe stocks. Thus, easily and gradually, as well as most prudently, it was supposed the inconveniences of so unexpected and embarrassing an event as a large surplus would be obviated, and at the same time, a provident fund created which would be yielding interest, and which could afterwards be resorted to when the current expenditures might, from any cause, either before or after 1841, exceed the current revenue. In relation to that subject, though a topic still intimately and deeply connected with our finances, few additional remarks at this time seemed called for, since Congress, at the last session, by a clause in the deposit law, provided for what this Department considers, and has taken all the proper preliminary steps to make, a temporary disposition of the whole money in the Treasury on the first of January next, except five millions of dollars. Looking at that as a financial measure, which is the only view now under consideration, the granting the use of the money without any interest, constitutes a difference from the mode proposed by this Department, which was doubtless designed as a benefit to the several States, and in that view was also very properly proffered to all if to any of the States, whether now in debt or not, and whether needing the money for any great public purpose or not. While treated in the nature of a mere temporary deposit or investment on the credit of each State respectively, without interest, the profits or income of it alone to be expended, and the principal to be ever held sacred and ready for repayment whenever needed, like a fund that is providently designed to meet any future public contingencies, this kind of deposit may not embarrass our finances, and is likely to prove useful and convenient to the Treasury. But, should considerable portions of it be soon wanted by the General Government, the deposit will probably occasion to many of the States inconvenience and difficulties, if not losses, in the management and repayment of it, more than equivalent to the interest received. On the contrary, if much of it be not wanted for some years, or till after 1841, the result may be otherwise to such States as either need the money or are able to employ it beneficially.

The experience of this Department has been too brief, under the constant and laborious preparation to carry into effect in due time, all provisions in the late deposit act, to warrant, on the present occasion, any recommendations of modifications in this particular portion of it; but it is respectfully suggested, that although a gradual investment of the surplus in existing State stocks would, it is believed, have produced no pressure in the money market, yet the embarrassments incident to the transfers of such large sums of money as became necessary in order to divide it seasonably among a greater number of banks as well as among the different States, and the consequent temporary withdrawal of considerable portions of it from immediate use, are embarrassments inseparable from the provisions and faithful execution of the law in its present form. Though they constitute only a portion of those evils which now afflict the commercial community, and have been mitigated in their operation by this Department, where practicable, they could not be wholly obviated without departing entirely from the duties imposed by the law. Immediately after its passage, steps were taken, as required by Congress, to commence a reduction of the deposits, which had then accumulated in certain banks beyond three-fourths the amount of their capital, and at the same time to have some portion of the anticipated surplus taken from States where its accumulation had been large or inconvenient, and placed, before the first of January next, in States where enough had not before been deposited, and where suitable banks existed willing to receive it. These steps will be more fully detailed in a subsequent part of this report. All the payments to the several States, for the whole year, are expected to be made punctually at the times required; but it will be necessary, from the mode of keeping public accounts, to take the current statement of the Treasurer on the first day of January next, as the guide for the supposed amount in the Treasury required to be apportioned among the States, and one-quarter of it to be deposited on that day. By pursuing any other course an unavoidable delay of weeks, if not months, would be necessary in making the preliminary arrangements for the first payment. But that statement seldom differs more than a few hundred dollars from the result as ascertained on subsequent settlement, and hence its amount, independent of unavailable funds, and what is held for the Post Office and Patent Office, and in various special trusts, will be deemed the true sum intended by Congress as subject to apportionment, after deducting five millions, unless, in the mean time, the Department shall be otherwise directed by that body.

The whole sum to be deposited with the States will, on these principles, and according to the present appearances, range between $35,000,000 and $38,000,000, and exceed somewhat $120,000 to each electoral vote in each of the twenty-five States now in the Union—Michigan, from the language of the act, not being considered as yet entitled to an apportionment under it. (Three States have already signified their willingness to receive the money on the terms proposed, and it is expected that several more will do the same before the first of January, and probably most of them in the course of the present winter.)

Leaving further suggestions on these and various other considerations which bear on this interesting subject, but which need not be repeated, the Department will next proceed to an exhibit of the manner in which this surplus, as well as the rest of the public money, has been kept during the past year, and of the detailed preparations which have been made for the future custody and preservation of it, in conformity to the act of Congress to regulate the deposits of the public money, passed June 23, 1836, and the supplementary act on the same subject, passed on the 4th of July, 1836.

VI.—Of the keeping of the Public Money and state of the Deposit Banks.

The money in the Treasury has been safely kept during the year 1836. Until July last, as during the two previous years, it was placed in State banks, selected according to the discretion of this Department, on account of their high standing and favorable position for fiscal purposes, and regulated in a manner considered most secure to the Treasury and convenient to the community, as well as useful to all concerned.

It is a source of high gratification to be able to add that, while so selected and employed, not a single dollar was lost to the Government by any of them, or a single failure occurred to transfer promptly and pay out satisfactorily the public money intrusted to their custody; nor is it believed that the domestic exchanges of the country were ever lower or more regular than during that period; and the large amount of them performed by those deposit banks, in ordinary purchases or discounts, equalling from one hundred and fifty to two hundred millions of dollars yearly, or near a third more than those of the same kind by the United States Bank while the fiscal agent of the Government, evinced the great ability and usefulness of those banks on this important subject.

But since the passage of the act of Congress, June 23, 1836, "to regulate the deposits of public money," most of the discretionary power before exercised by this Department on this subject, under previous laws and long usages, has been considered as no longer possessed, and various solicitations to use it, though some of them were in cases of extreme hardship, could not therefore be complied with. Relieved from great responsibility, and in many cases from much delicacy in the exercise of it by the passage of that act, a new system, in conformity with its provisions, and in place of the former one, was at once commenced by this Department, and has since been pursued with all the strictness and regularity which the nature of business so extensive and complicated would permit; and at the same time, with every indulgence and forbearance in cases of embarrassment or suffering, which were permissible without a violation of law. It was necessary by the act to appoint anew all the former deposit banks, if they were to be retained in the service of the Government. Accordingly, the preliminary inquiries rendered proper by the new law before any selection was authorized to be made, were immediately instituted in every case of the former deposit banks; and having been satisfactorily answered, all of them have been reappointed except three, where some formalities in their papers are not yet completed. The provision of that act which prohibits more public money to be left in any one bank than three-fourths the amount of its capital, rendered the selection of numerous new banks, to receive the sums which the old ones were not allowed to retain, indispensable in the present overflowing condition of the Treasury, and especially at places in which the capitals of the old banks were small.

The transfer of all the money in the Treasury, except five millions, on the 1st of January next, to be deposited in the treasuries of the several States quarterly during 1837, in ratable proportions, made it proper to select also a few other new banks in some of the States, to receive those proportions or sufficient parts of them, when they happened to be either collected there, or to be incidentally and easily transferable there.

Thus the trouble and embarrassment of a second and sudden transfer in January next, and quarterly thereafter during the year, were often saved by combining, in several appropriate cases, the transfers ordered by Congress to be soon made from banks having an excess, with the transfers of that excess to other banks in the States where it was to be paid during the present year on appropriations, or the ensuing year on the apportionment, and in which last-described banks and States a deficiency existed. In this way, on several occasions, the opportunity has been improved of beginning to perfect, gradually, and in some degree contemporaneously, between places near, suitable, and of easy intercommunication, the great and difficult apportionment of the deposits of the public money among several different States, as well as among different banks. The whole amount of transfers ordered since the 1st of July last, have of necessity been at times very large; but many of them have not yet taken effect; many more are still to be ordered, and the whole amount necessary to accomplish both objects will be less, and their operation easier, than if a different course had been pursued, and the two apportionments between the banks and the States had not been united, in cases where practicable and convenient, and where large accumulations existed on the one hand to be reduced, and deficiencies on the other to be supplied. Their union, in such cases, is supposed to have been specially contemplated by Congress, as explained in the second and supplementary deposit act, passed in July, and as seemed just to the several States which had not before enjoyed much, if any, benefit from the deposit and use of the public money within their limits. Hence, while many transfers have been forborne, when feasible under the law, and desired from public considerations connected with the great pressure in the money market, and which pressure they would, though authorized by the acts, have severely aggravated, yet great care has been employed not to make a single transfer, except in the language of the first deposit act, "to facilitate the public disbursements, and to comply with the provisions of the act;" or, as described more fully in the second act, either "to prevent large and inconvenient accumulations in particular places, or in order to produce a due equality and just proportion, according to the provisions of said act." All the transfers ordered have likewise been so modified in respect to time, place, and business, as to produce the least inconvenience and expense possible to the banks or the community consistent with faithful endeavors to execute the law on both subjects seasonably and efficiently. They have been so conducted as also to relieve the Treasury from any expense whatever in a financial operation so large and unusual; but, in carrying out so large a moneyed operation as the new law demanded, and one neither comporting with our usual fiscal proceedings, nor following the ordinary channels of trade, it has required great caution not to create more embarrassment than has really occurred from this source, and a greater derangement in exchanges than actually exists.

In complying with the deposit act, it has already been found necessary to appoint forty-eight more banks, making, on the 1st instant, with the former ones, without their branches, the whole number of eighty-one. The Department has endeavored, in these selections, to conform to the spirit of the act of Congress as regards their convenient location for accommodating either the collections or the disbursements of the public money. It has in all cases required the preliminary information made necessary by the act. It has, as enjoined, chosen at least one bank in every State which had banking institutions, and which included all except Missouri and Arkansas. It has obtained from each bank a written agreement to comply with the duties prescribed by law, and in every case except four or five not deemed suitable, from peculiar circumstances, has received collateral security for the faithful fulfilment of these agreements, and has endeavored from time to time to make such requests on the subject of specie and other topics connected with their condition and with their mode of transacting business as seemed conducive to safety and public convenience. The names of each deposit bank, with the amount of public money in each, and its detailed condition in all respects, near the 1st of November, 1836, are exhibited in the document annexed, (E 1 and 2.)

In another document (F) is presented more fully and recently the condition of those banks with this Department; as it shows, by their last returns to the Treasurer on the 1st instant, the amount of public money then on hand, the outstanding drafts then against them, and the existing transfers to and from each bank. A number of the States now have deposits sufficient, with the accruing revenue, so meet all the probable demands within their limits the next year. But it is otherwise with several of them, and where money has not yet been placed in each State sufficient to meet the probable amount of deposits required there during the first quarter of the next year, for expenditure as well as apportionment, it has been or will be put under orders of transfer, so as to reach there seasonably.

Numerous difficult and embarrassing questions have arisen in the execution of the new deposit act, in consequence of the novelty of many of its provisions, and the unequal operation of others on some of the depositories; but, where great doubts existed as to the true intention of the law, the opinion of the Attorney General has been taken. When that opinion has been unfavorable to the views entertained under the law as it now stands, the parties have been left (as they must always be in such cases of supposed inequality and hardship) to resort to Congress for appropriate relief. It is, therefore, respectfully suggested that relief for the past may be proper in several cases, which it is anticipated the parties interested will present to the consideration of Congress. For the convenience of this Department, it is desirable that a provision be made for the future, that any agency furnishing ample security be regarded, under the law, as having the same separate capital where established as the bank to which it belongs.

It is further recommended that authority be given to discontinue such of the newly-selected banks as may, from time to time, be no longer needed for fiscal or other purposes. A large portion of them, after the contemplated deposits are made with the several States, will probably become entirely useless to the Treasury, while their returns and correspondence will continue to be burdensome to all concerned.

Immediately after the passage of the law, it became the duty of this Department, among other things, to select a sufficient number of banks to hold the public money, without exceeding three-fourths of the amount of their capitals, and one, at least, in each State having banks.

As it seemed impossible to carry these provisions into execution in several of the States, unless banks should be selected which might possibly have issued or paid out some small bills after the 4th of July, and before they had completed the agreement, and assumed the duties imposed by the act, it was thought that a natural construction, given to the limitation in that respect, would make it applicable only to such banks as were selected and subject to the law previous to that date, and that the others must not, on a like principle, make any such issues after their selection. This would impart a reasonable and practical effect to the clause, and, at the same time, not tend entirely to defeat the operation of other provisions in the act. Accordingly, minute inquiries were not instituted, whether the banks applying to be selected had, previous to their application, issued such bills or not, but all were required, at the time of their selection, to enter into an express written agreement to conform to all the provisions of the act, and, consequently, not to issue any while they were public depositories. On more mature reflection, doubts having arisen whether this was going far enough, and whether any banks which may have issued small bills between the 4th of July and their selection, could in strict law be retained, or could have been legally appointed, it was deemed proper to take the opinion of the Attorney General on that point. He confirmed these doubts, but recommended the submission of the subject to Congress, before discontinuing any of the banks, which, upon investigation, might appear to have made such issues before entering into the agreement. The Department would, therefore, respectfully recommend that an act be passed sanctioning the selection and continuance of deposit banks which may be so situated, provided such banks have not issued or paid out small bills after their appointment as public depositories.

VII.—Of the Mint and the Currency.

On the subject of the Mint and the new coinage, the Department is gratified to state that, by means of additional appropriations, of improvements in machinery, and of an ample supply of metal for coining, through the fortunate remittances to this country of the French, Spanish, and Neapolitan indemnities in gold, more money has been, and will be coined during the present, than in any previous year since the foundation of the Government. The whole amount, from the 1st of January, 1836, to the 1st of November, 1836, has been, in gold, $3,619,440; in silver, $2,877,000; and in copper, $22,634. The sums transferred to the Mint in aid of the coinage, under a clause in the late deposit act, have amounted to $700,000. When the annual report of the Director is made, on the 1st of January next, a more minute account of all his operations, with his views on these transfers, will be presented, accompanied with such suggestions for further legislation on the subject as his experience may lead him to consider useful. The Mint and its branches would, in my opinion, be more efficiently assisted by means of appropriations, rather than mere transfers, to supply fully and promptly the additional coinage which the additional wants of the community may from time to time require. The Department is still convinced, for reasons formerly urged, on the consideration of Congress, that a gold coin of one dollar in value might be very convenient and useful to the public in many of the ordinary transactions of society. The branch mints are all in progress, and will probably be completed by June next, and their machinery at a still earlier day. The coinage in them can commence immediately after their completion, if the proper appropriations are in the mean time made, and the proper officers appointed. The greatly increased quantity of gold now existing in the country amounts, probably, to upwards of $15,000,000. For this we are chiefly indebted to the new valuation of our coin, though some influence must be ascribed to the efforts made by the General Government and most of the States to suppress the circulation of small bills, as well as to the favorable condition of our foreign exchanges since 1834, and the policy of ordering home the foreign indemnities in gold, and encouraging public payments to be in part made with this kind of coin. At this time, the abundance of gold here is such as to have produced increased facility in distant specie operations, and it is becoming more widely and beneficially diffused over the different sections of the Union, to the greater accommodation of most classes of people, particularly in travelling and exchanges, and to the permanent improvement of our circulating medium. The amount of gold coined since the new valuation in 1834, has been near $10,000,000, and has exceeded, by one or two millions, the whole amount coined in the thirty-one previous years which had elapsed after the Mint went into operation. The amount coined during the past twelve months alone is greater than that during the whole of the first sixteen years after its establishment.

Another important and gratifying consequence, which has resulted principally from the present policy and system as to the currency, has been, that of all the gold coined before August, 1834, amounting to about $12,000,000, probably not $1,000,000 then remained in the country, and of that small amount only a very diminutive portion was in active circulation. Indeed, before 1834, our coinage of gold was of little benefit, except to purify and prepare the bullion for exportation, and for the use of foreign mints. But the great mass of near $10,000,000, since coined, undoubtedly remains in the country, and an increased and increasing portion of it is in active and convenient circulation. To promote this desirable end, a larger proportion than usual of quarter eagles has been recently struck; and the whole number of gold pieces, of every kind, made since the beginning of the present year, is about $1,000,000, and almost equals the entire number coined during the whole forty years previous to the new coinage. The change in the amount of specie, of all kinds, in the country, during the last three years, is highly gratifying, as an earnest of a more solid basis to a paper circulation already too large in proportion, and as a security, not only to those classes who are most safe in the employment of a metallic currency for all common purposes, but to the banking institutions themselves in periods of panic and unfavorable balances in foreign trade.

The whole specie in the country in October, 1833, when the public deposits were removed from the United States Bank, did not probably exceed thirty millions, and the portion of this in banks is not supposed to have exceeded twenty-six millions; while now the whole specie in the country probably exceeds seventy-three millions, and of that the portion in banks is believed to be over forty-five millions, leaving twenty-eight millions in active circulation.

The paper circulation within the above period has also been greatly and unfortunately enlarged.

From about eighty millions, which was then the supposed aggregate, after deducting the large amount of twenty millions for notes held in different banks, it has probably risen, and chiefly within eighteen months past, to about one hundred and twenty millions.

But this increase, though great, it will be seen is not half so great a relative increase as has taken place in the whole specie in the country, nor quite as great as has happened in the specie of the banks alone.

Computing that the paper in active circulation in the United States has generally averaged about two to one of specie on hand in the banks, and was in October, 1833, about three to one, or near fifty per cent. over the usual proportion, the comparative amounts of specie at the several returns from 1833 to 1836 presented a very favorable change; had become greater than the usual proportion, and even now, in all the banks, taken as a whole, are somewhat improved since 1833. But they have much deteriorated the last year and a half. Again, while the whole amount, as well as proportion of specie in the country, is much greater than it was two years ago, and the proportion is ample for the paper circulation in several of the banks and States, yet it is manifest that many institutions in other States have of late departed more widely from the proper and safe proportions than their peculiar location or advantages for business, however favorable, might warrant on sound banking principles.

As some illustration of the general changes on those points since 1833, the following brief exhibit, in round numbers, and in a tabular form, prepared partly from actual returns and partly from estimates, may be useful:

Dates.	Paper in active circulation.	Specie in active circulation.	Specie in banks.
Near Oct. 1833	$80,000,000	$4,000,000	$25,000,000
1 Jan. 1834	76,000,000	12,000,000	27,000,000
1 Jan. 1835	82,000,000	18,000,000	43,000,000
1 Jan. 1836	108,000,000	23,000,000	40,000,000
1 Dec. 1836	120,000,000	28,000,000	45,000,000

At all these periods, except the 1st of January last, twenty millions of paper have been computed as issued, but not in actual circulation among the people, being held by other banks, and so far considered as equivalent to a deduction of a like amount from their own circulation, liable to be redeemed in specie. On the 1st of January last, the amount so held was about thirty-two millions, and in July last the active paper circulation was also probably some millions larger than it now is. This exhibit makes the whole active circulation, of both paper and specie, about $6 50 per head of our whole estimated population in October, 1833; about $6 50 in January, 1834; about $7 in January, 1835; about $8 50 in January, 1836; and near $10 at the present time. Though this is a less proportion of circulating medium than is now usual in the countries of Europe which are most commercial, and where specie is more used than bills, yet it is a larger ratio than has ever been supposed to be necessary in the United States, considering the character of two or three millions of our Southern population.

The average here has usually been about $6 per head; nor has the amount ever, before 1811, been supposed much to exceed $5; and, at no time since, has exceeded about $7 per head, except under the excessive paper issues towards the close of the late war, by which, in 1816, it was estimated to have reached $11 per head.

While our country has, of late years, become more commercial and wealthy, and has a larger portion of specie in use, which circumstances would somewhat increase the necessary and proper amount of circulation per head, it has, as counteracting causes to these, greatly increased in the ease and quickness of communication, whether by mail or otherwise, and in the use of bills of exchange and drafts instead of money, for distant operations.

Hence our circulation, during the past twelve months, at $8 50 and $10 per head, is deemed excessive, and, as in 1816, one great cause of the exorbitant prices which have prevailed in relation to almost every article, as well as of the extraordinary propensity to overtrading and speculation which has pervaded almost every section of the country. It is true that, during a few months past, the paper proportion of our circulation has, as before suggested, been considerably reduced; but till that, with our present large amount of specie in circulation added, falls as low as about $7 per head, or the bank notes to about $80,000,000, instead of $120,000,000, the currency may be considered as too redundant, and in an unnatural and inflated condition. The credit system has not only undergone an unusual expansion among individuals and States, but it has, by means of these inordinate paper issues, penetrated more deeply than is safe into the whole currency of the country, and rendered that which, as money, is and should be deemed the substitute or antagonist of credit, dependent too much on credit itself, and subject to many of the dangers and fluctuations in value inseparable from mere credit, rather than possessing the intrinsic and uniform value attached to specie.

This condition is believed to have been produced chiefly by numerous incorporations of new banks, without suitable legal restrictions, in many States, on either the amount of discounts or of the paper issued, in proportion to the specie on hand, and by the excessive demands for money thus tempted and stimulated to aid an unusual number of extravagant adventurers in lands, stocks, and trade.

These acting together, and in some degree influencing and exciting each other, have induced many banks to hazard unreasonable and indiscreet issues, as well as loans, to supply the wants of such an extraordinary crisis, and which there is good reason to believe (however large a proportion of specie fortunately exists in the country, and which may tend sooner to avert the usual evil consequences from the above state of things) will produce much distress, embarrassment, and ruin, before this specie can be duly equalized, the excesses of paper sufficiently curtailed, and the exorbitant discounts gradually lessened to their safe and proper limits.

This increase of about forty millions, or one-third of the paper circulation, in a year and a half, is a sudden and great fluctuation, which never could occur in a currency entirely metallic, and which would probably during the past year, as in 1811, have been much greater, had not the larger proportion of specie now in the country, and the increasing disuse of small bills, operated strongly as preventive checks.

But even now, the excess has been sufficient to constitute the chief cause for the artificial augmentation in prices—an unnatural stimulus to speculation, and a rapid vacillation in the regular modes of doing business, which cannot, under sound views of political economy, be too greatly deprecated or their recurrence too carefully guarded against.

These sudden and great vibrations in the value of property, labor, and debts, however produced, or however flattering to many at first, are in the end dangerous to all classes, as well as ruinous to commerce and every species of regular industry.

But should paper issues, according to anticipation, continue to be reduced as during the four months past, by the natural and conservative reaction of commercial causes, at home and abroad, and by the general wise and increasing discontinuance of the use of small bank notes, through State legislation, and provisions of a similar character and tendency by Congress, as at the last session, in the general appropriation act, and in the deposit law, and by the diminished receipt of all bank notes, the last few months, at the different land offices for the sales of the public domain, a sounder and a less artificial state of things will ere long return.

The prospect on the subject of the currency is therefore on the whole becoming more satisfactory, even without further legislation. But if all the States would unite in repressing entirely the circulation of small notes and in rigidly restricting all paper issues, so as not in any case to exceed three to one of specie on hand, which would be about two of paper in active circulation to one of specie on hand, and would add a few judicious limitations on the amount of discounts, as compared with the capital and deposits, and on the safe kind of security to be taken for them, with the requirement of frequent publicity of their condition in detail, and of rigid accountability to periodical examinations by legislative authority, the time is not distant when our currency would become quite stable. Indeed, it deserves consideration whether, under such circumstances, the whole monopolies of banking might not, with public advantage, be entirely abolished, and the banking privilege, under the above general restraints, securities, limitations, and requirements, might not, particularly if the personal liability of the stockholders is superadded, safely be thrown open to all.

A larger amount of tax or bonus to the States would probably be thus collected, without any increase in the usual rate; and it is believed that the interest now paid by borrowers would, by these changes, become, at an early day, sensibly reduced. But, without the most careful and rigid restrictions, such a measure in this country, whatever may have been its operations elsewhere, would, under our different institutions and habits, probably increase rather than diminish any existing evils in the currency.

It is conceded that these disproportionate issues by banking institutions are in fact much more frequent in regions where the number of banks is small than where it is large, provided their charters be similar in omitting prudent limitations: because, in the former case, there is less vigilance, caution, and correction, produced by the jealousies and interests of rival institutions, to prevent excessive issues and irregular and dangerous discounts.

But the tendency to excessive trading, excessive credits, and rash enterprises, is so strong, and sometimes ungovernable in individuals, and in some respects equally or more so in corporations, as to endanger the stability of both banks and business, unless the power to manufacture paper money is carefully restricted and wisely regulated. The present amount of bank capital, as well as its increase for some years past, is another kindred topic of some interest. But space does not exist on this occasion for its full exposition, and at the same time it is not very alarming, except where it has been authorized without proper limitation on paper issues, and without other prudent bank restrictions.

The whole bank capital in active operation is computed to have been over $200,000,000 in 1833-'4; $231,000,000 in 1834-'5; $250,000,000 in 1835-'6; and near $50,000,000 more has been authorized, most of which is supposed not yet to be in full operation.

More facts will be exhibited on these points, and particularly on the amount of bank capital in each State, in a special report soon to be presented from this Department to Congress, concerning the detailed condition of the State banks near the 1st of January, 1836.

Had it not been for large sales of American stocks abroad, and the very high prices given there for our principal staples, a demand for specie for export would doubtless have arisen ere this from our over-trading, and have greatly enhanced the present difficulties which some of the banks now experience, chiefly from the great excess of paper in circulation. The comparative value of specie being reduced by such excesses, the evil would have been still more aggravated if those excesses had not become somewhat diminished, and specie had not become in greater demand here, in consequence of the circular as to the kind of money receivable for the public lands, issued by direction of the President in July last. This demand has contributed to retain and diffuse it wider, and to make its great and early export less probable than it otherwise would have been. The other objects of that circular were gradually to bring back the practice, in those payments, to what was deemed to be the true spirit as well as letter of our existing laws, and to what the safety of the public money in the deposit banks and the desirable improvement of our currency seemed at that time to unite in rendering judicious. The reasons more in detail for the measure are contained in the document itself, of which a copy is annexed. Our moneyed operations have also been somewhat affected by a few difficulties abroad in the nation with which our commercial intercourse is greatest, and whose monetary system of late years, often beating with a pulse like our own, is under influences nearly corresponding.

Since 1833, the paper circulation in England is supposed to have increased over sixteen millions of dollars, while the specie possessed by the banks has diminished over twenty-three millions. The whole circulation of private banks, joint-stock banks, and the Bank of England, is now probably about one hundred and fifty-two millions of paper to less than twenty-six millions of specie on hand; whereas, in 1833, it was only about one hundred and thirty-seven millions to fifty millions of specie, or now from five and six to one, but then only two and three to one: consequently, an alarm and pressure have arisen there, which are operating unfavorably here, though they have arisen not so much from an excessive amount of both the paper and specie currency united, as from the greatly increased disproportion, being quite double, between the paper issues and the specie on hand by all the banks.

What portion of their paper was or is now held by each other is not known; but, as the bills of the Bank of England are a tender by all the private and joint-stock banks, the amount is probably large.

Their banking system, as a whole, with every supposed benefit to be derived from a national bank, is believed to be under much more defective regulations, as to excessive issues, excessive discounts, and secrecy of condition and proceedings, than is our own in most of the States of the Union. Indeed, so unsatisfactory has been its operations, that they have recently become the subject of parliamentary inquiry, which it is proposed to resume and push much further at a subsequent session.

VIII.—Land Office.

Immediately after the passage of the law at the last session, reorganizing the General Land Office, some doubts arose whether it still remained attached to the Treasury Department, and the opinion of the Attorney General was taken on the question. In consequence of his opinion, that the supervision over its concerns remained here, and of the direction of the President of the United States, under whose control that law now places all the affairs of the General Land Office, steps were taken by me to carry it into immediate effect. The result, thus far, has been a sensible diminution in the pressure of the business of that office, a better system of supervision and despatch for most of it, and much less delay in completing titles to the public domain. Should the sales not continue very large during a few ensuing years, it is believed that the whole arrearages of business can be disposed of, and the promptitude in all its future operations secured, which is so immediately important to the great Western and Southwestern sections of the country, and more or less beneficial to all, as well as creditable to the administration of the Government.

The report of the Commissioner will speedily be laid before Congress in a separate communication, and contains many suggestions which seem to deserve careful attention.

IX.—Miscellaneous.

Great inconveniences have been sustained, in many parts of the country, by an omission to repeal or modify the provisions in the tariff act of 1832. A detailed report on this subject has once been submitted by this Department; and the interests of the community connected with the articles of hardware affected by these provisions, and convenience in the execution of the revenue laws, appear to require the earliest attention of Congress to the subject.

The revision of the present system of compensation to custom-house officers, with the various changes in our collection laws, heretofore recommended in connexion with that revision, is deemed very important to the mercantile community as well as to the Treasury; and at the same time to the just and ratable compensation for arduous and responsible duties to many collectors and other officers who are now inadequately paid, while some receive an amount disproportioned to their situation and labors.

In connexion with this subject, and in addition to former recommendations to Congress, as well as the valuable report on the safety of steam-boilers, submitted at the last session from the Franklin Institute, it seems proper to urge earnestly for consideration the necessity of some provision for the more careful management of steamboats navigated under papers from the custom-houses—subjecting their commanders, and in suitable cases their owners, to the forfeiture of their papers, and other severe penalties, in cases of carelessness or neglect, destructive to property or life.

The security of the public money would be promoted in many cases by requiring bonds from district attorneys, through the hands of some of whom large sums pass in collections, without any collateral obligation being given for the indemnity of the United States, as required in most analogous cases of public officers.

The act in respect to insolvent debtors, the execution of which is placed in the charge of this Department, expires in June next, and the propriety of the further continuance of its provisions is suggested to Congress.

The first four instalments due under the French treaty have been paid in Paris since my last annual report. The sum claimed by our agent and by this Department exceeds that paid by the French Government in the amount of more than a million of francs, and the difference is now the subject of correspondence and negotiation.

What was actually paid has been remitted to this country in gold, and divided among the claimants. From the rates of exchange and price of gold, it was deemed most advantageous to the claimants to have it sent home in that form, though a direction was subsequently given to substitute bills of exchange or other modes of remittance, if more profitable, but which the agent did not find it expedient or beneficial to do.

The third instalment of the Neapolitan indemnity, and the first payments due on the inscriptions under the treaty of indemnity with Spain, have also been since discharged with punctuality, and remitted here in a similar manner and under similar instructions.

Various other topics suggested in the last two annual reports to the consideration of Congress, and not yet finally legislated on, the Department would earnestly but respectfully present again to its attention. Among them may be more particularly mentioned the reorganization of this Department, and the change in the commencement of the fiscal year and of the annual appropriations.

Several other subjects have received proper attention, which are connected with the official duties of the Treasury, or have been specially devolved on its charge: such as the repairs of the bridge across the Potomac; the survey of the coast; and the manufacture of weights and measures, not only for the different custom-houses, but for each State in the Union; the appropriate sites for new marine hospitals; the practices pursued in other countries as to the transportation of their poor citizens hither, who have been burdensome for their maintenance; a digest of the returns and condition of State banks, near January 1st, 1836; the sums disbursed under each appropriation made the present year, and more detailed exhibits of all the contingent expenditures of the Department. The most important of these will, at an early day, be made the subject of separate communications.

All which is respectfully submitted by

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

HON. MARTIN VAN BUREN,

President of the Senate of the United States.

DOCUMENTS RELATIVE TO TEXAS.

Message from the President of the United States, relative to the "political, military, and civil condition of Texas."

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

During the last session, information was given to Congress, by the Executive, that measures had been taken to ascertain "the political, military, and civil condition of Texas." I now submit, for your consideration, extracts from the report of the agent, who had been appointed to collect it, relative to the condition of that country.

No steps have been taken by the Executive towards the acknowledgment of the independence of Texas; and the whole subject would have been left without further remark, on the information now given to Congress, were it not that the two Houses, at their last session, acting separately, passed resolutions "that the independence of Texas ought to be acknowledged by the United States, whenever satisfactory information should be received that it had in successful operation a civil Government, capable of performing the duties and fulfilling the obligations of an independent Power." This mark of interest in the question of the independence of Texas, and indication of the views of Congress, make it proper that I should, somewhat in detail, present the considerations that have governed the Executive in continuing to occupy the ground previously taken in the contest between Mexico and Texas.

The acknowledgment of a new State as independent, and entitled to a place in the family of nations, is at all times an act of great delicacy and responsibility; but more especially so, when such State has forcibly separated itself from another, of which it had formed an integral part, and which still claims dominion over it. A premature recognition, under these circumstances, if not looked upon as justifiable cause of war, is always liable to be regarded as a proof of an unfriendly spirit to one of the contending parties. All questions relative to the government of foreign nations, whether of the old or the new world, have been treated by the United States as questions of fact only; and our predecessors have cautiously abstained from deciding upon them until the clearest evidence was in their possession, to enable them not only to decide correctly, but to shield their decisions from every unworthy imputation. In all the contests that have arisen out of the revolutions of France, out of the disputes relating to the crowns of Portugal and Spain, out of the revolutionary movements of those kingdoms, out of the separation of the American possessions of both from the European Governments, and out of the numerous and constantly occurring struggles for dominion in Spanish America, so wisely consistent with our just principles has been the action of our Government, that we have, under the most critical circumstances, avoided all censure, and encountered no other evil than that produced by a transient estrangement of good will in those against whom we have been, by force of evidence, compelled to decide.

It has thus been made known to the world that the uniform policy and practice of the United States is, to avoid all interference in disputes which merely relate to the internal government of other nations, and eventually to recognise the authority of the prevailing party, without reference to our particular interests and views, or to the merit of the original controversy. Public opinion here is so firmly established and well understood in favor of this policy, that no serious disagreement has ever arisen among ourselves in relation to it, although brought under review in a variety of forms, and at periods when the minds of the people were greatly excited by the agitation of topics purely domestic in their character. Nor has any deliberate inquiry ever been instituted in Congress, or in any of our legislative bodies, as to whom belonged the power of originally recognising a new State; a power the exercise of which is equivalent, under some circumstances, to a declaration of war; a power nowhere expressly delegated, and only granted in the constitution as it is necessarily involved in some of the great powers given to Congress; in that given to the President and Senate to form treaties with foreign Powers and to appoint ambassadors and other public ministers; and in that conferred upon the President to receive ministers from foreign nations.

In the preamble to the resolution of the House of Representatives, it is distinctly intimated that the expediency of recognising the independence of Texas should be left to the decision of Congress. In this view, on the ground of expediency, I am disposed to concur; and do not, therefore, consider it necessary to express any opinion as to the strict constitutional right of the Executive, either apart from or in conjunction with the Senate, over the subject. It is to be presumed that on no future occasion will a dispute arise, as none has heretofore occurred, between the Executive and Legislature, in the exercise of the power of recognition. It will always be considered consistent with the spirit of the constitution, and most safe, that it should be exercised, when probably leading to war, with a previous understanding with that body by whom war can alone be declared, and by whom all the provisions for sustaining its perils must be furnished. Its submission to Congress, which represents in one of its branches the States of this Union, and in the other the people of the United States, where there may be reasonable ground to apprehend so grave a consequence, would certainly afford the fullest satisfaction to our own country, and a perfect guarantee to all other nations of the justice and prudence of the measures which might be adopted.

In making these suggestions, it is not my purpose to relieve myself from the responsibility of expressing my own opinions of the course the interests of our country prescribe, and its honor permits us to follow.

It is scarcely to be imagined that a question of this character could be presented, in relation to which it would be more difficult for the United States to avoid exciting the suspicion and jealousy of other Powers, and maintain their established character for fair and impartial dealing; but on this, as on every trying occasion, safety is to be found in a rigid adherence to principle.

In the contest between Spain and her revolted colonies, we stood aloof, and waited not only until the ability of the new States to protect themselves was fully established, but until the danger of their being again subjugated had entirely passed away. Then, and not till then, were they recognised. Such was our course in regard to Mexico herself. The same policy was observed in all the disputes growing out of the separation into distinct Governments of those Spanish American States who began or carried on the contest with the parent country, united under one form of government. We acknowledged the separate independence of New Granada, of Venezuela, and of Ecuador, only after their independent existence was no longer a subject of dispute, or was actually acquiesced in by those with whom they had been previously united. It is true that, with regard to Texas, the civil authority of Mexico has been expelled, its invading army defeated, the chief of the republic himself captured, and all present power to control the newly organized Government of Texas annihilated within its confines. But, on the other hand, there is, in appearance at least, an immense disparity of physical force on the side of Mexico: The Mexican republic, under another Executive, is rallying its forces under a new leader, and menacing a fresh invasion to recover its lost dominion. Upon the issue of this threatened invasion the independence of Texas may be considered as suspended; and were there nothing peculiar in the relative situation of the United States and Texas, our acknowledgment of its independence at such a crisis could scarcely be regarded as consistent with that prudent reserve with which we have heretofore held ourselves bound to treat all similar questions. But there are circumstances in the relations of the two countries which require us to act, on this occasion, with even more than our wonted caution. Texas was once claimed as a part of our property; and there are those among our citizens who, always reluctant to abandon that claim, cannot but regard with solicitude the prospect of the reunion of the territory to this country. A large proportion of its civilized inhabitants are emigrants from the United States, speak the same language with ourselves, cherish the same principles, political and religious, and are bound to many of our citizens by ties of friendship and kindred blood; and, more than all, it is known that the people of that country have instituted the same form of government with our own, and have, since the close of your last session, openly resolved, on the acknowledgment by us of their independence, to seek admission into the Union as one of the Federal States. This last circumstance is a matter of peculiar delicacy, and forces upon us considerations of the gravest character. The title of Texas to the territory she claims is identified with her independence. She asks us to acknowledge that title to the territory, with an avowed design to treat immediately of its transfer to the United States. It becomes us to beware of a too early movement, as it might subject us, however unjustly, to the imputation of seeking to establish the claim of our neighbors to a territory, with a view to its subsequent acquisition by ourselves. Prudence, therefore, seems to dictate that we should still stand aloof, and maintain our present attitude, if not until Mexico itself, or one of the great foreign Powers, shall recognise the independence of the new Government, at least until the lapse of time or the course of events shall have proved, beyond cavil or dispute, the ability of the people of that country to maintain their separate sovereignty and to uphold the Government constituted by them. Neither of the contending parties can complain of this course. By pursuing it, we are but carrying out the long-established policy of our Government—a policy which has secured to us respect and influence abroad, and inspired confidence at home.

Having thus discharged my duty, by presenting with simplicity and directness the views which, after much reflection, I have been led to take of this important subject, I have only to add the expression of my confidence, that if Congress shall differ with me upon it, their judgment will be the result of dispassionate, prudent, and wise deliberation; with the assurance that, during the short time I shall continue connected with the Government, I shall promptly and cordially unite with you in such measures as may be deemed best fitted to increase the prosperity and perpetuate the peace of our favored country.

ANDREW JACKSON.

WASHINGTON, December 21, 1836.

Extracts from the Report of the Agent appointed to collect information relative to Texas.

VELASCO, TEXAS, August 13, 1836.

SIR: As far as opportunities have permitted since my arrival in Texas, I have made inquiries upon the various subjects referred to in your letter of instructions, but am only able at this time to furnish the following information. The present Government is in operation by virtue of an ordinance organizing an Executive Government ad interim, to consist of a President, Vice President, Secretary of State, Treasury, War, and Navy, passed by a convention of delegates in March last, immediately after the adoption of the constitution of the 17th of that month. The administration is to continue until a new arrangement shall be made by the approaching Congress in September, as provided under the constitution. I have not seen the ordinance referred to, as the original is at Columbia, and no publication of it has yet been made. My next despatch will probably contain a copy of it.

The attention of the Government seems to be directed at this moment almost exclusively to the increase and discipline of the army. I am informed that the troops now in the field amount to two thousand men, under the command of General T. J. Rusk; five hundred men of this force are cavalry, under the immediate command of Brigadier General Houston, who occupies a position on the river Nueces, at or near San Patricio, on the Matamoras road. Two companies of mounted men are at San Antonio de Bexar, to cover that place from the incursions of the Indians; the balance of the army is encamped on the Coleta creek, between the Guadalupe de Victoria and Goliad, about fifteen miles east of the latter place. The old inhabitants, it is said, are at home, attending to their crops, but are organized so as to be ready for the field at a moment's warning. Besides this number, the authorities here state that there are about six hundred men, composed of various corps of volunteers, encamped at different points or on the march between this place and the headquarters of the army, all of whom can be incorporated into it at any time, if necessary. Finding that these forces were collecting in the neighborhood of the Rio del Norte, and knowing that our merchants had a large interest in the commerce in that direction, which might be put in jeopardy by a successful investment of Matamoras, I waived for the present any further inquiry into the political condition of the country, and directed my attention to the latter subject.

During the absence of Major General Samuel Houston, the command of the army devolves upon Brigadier General Rusk, who is now in command. Brigadier General T. J. Green and Brevet Brigadier General Felix Houston are the principal field officers under General Rusk.

The vessels to be employed will consist of the Invincible, carrying eight port guns and one pivot nine pounder; the Brutus, of the same force; the Independence, carrying eight guns; and the Liberty, of three, the latter being now under repair.

Within the last month, the emigrants have increased by several hundreds; many having arrived in the schooners Flora, Passaic, and Julius Caesar, and the brig Good Hope, besides settlers over land by the Nacogdoches road.

General Santa Anna is now at Orazimbo, opposite Bolivia, on the Brazos river, and about forty-five miles above this place; he was removed there from Columbia about two weeks since, and is guarded by a company of troops under the command of Captain Patton.

So far as an opinion can be formed, from the present indications of public sentiment, as to what disposition will be made of that officer, it is probable he will be finally disposed of in some way by the next Congress of Texas. Some of the candidates for Congress have pledged themselves, if elected, to advocate the trying him as a murderer.

Colonels Almonte and Nunez, and Mr. Carro, the latter his private secretary, are with General Santa Anna.

There are forty-eight Mexican officers, and near six hundred men, prisoners at and near Galveston, besides a few in this place. I examined in Quintana many of the arms taken at the battle of San Jacinto, and am not surprised that the Mexicans were defeated, as the muskets are of Spanish make, and appear to have been worthless many years ago. If the weapons to be used by those in any future battle should be such as these, the prediction of the Texans that they will succeed in the same proportion as their last victory, may be readily fulfilled, without any reproach upon the patriotism or bravery of their enemy.

In a few days I shall proceed to the interior, to collect, from personal observation, the materials for a more systematic despatch.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,
HENRY M. MORFIT.

To the Hon. JOHN FORSYTH,
Secretary of State.

VELASCO, SEAT OF GOVERNMENT OF TEXAS,

August 22, 1836.

SIR: The present political condition of Texas has been produced by a series of alleged aggressions upon the laws of colonization; a refusal, upon the part of Mexico, to protect the colonial settlements from the depredations of the Indian tribes; by laws excluding citizens of the United States of the North from admission into the country; by a refusal to incorporate this province into the federal system, as provided by the constitution; and, finally, by the establishment of a central or consolidated Government, and the destruction of the constitution itself. Such are the reasons assigned by the old inhabitants with whom I have conversed for the separation of this State from Mexico.

The history of the events leading to the revolution, as I find it in the public documents, is this: In 1824, a convention was held by representatives from all the provinces, and a federal system and constitution adopted, by which all Mexico became a republic. Texas, at that time, did not contain the required population to become a State, but was provisionally united with the neighboring province of Coahuila, to form the State of Coahuila and Texas, until the latter should possess the necessary elements to form a separate State for herself. This law was understood and intended to guaranty to the latter a specific political existence, as soon as she should be in a condition to exercise it.

In 1833, the inhabitants having ascertained that their numbers were equal to most and exceeded several of the old States, and that the resources of the country were such as to constitute the required elements for a State, they held a convention, and formed a constitution upon the principles of that of the Mexican republic. This was presented to the general Congress, with a petition to be admitted into the Union. The application was rejected, and the delegate imprisoned.

In 1834, the constitutional Congress was dissolved by a military order of the President, Santa Anna, before the expiration of its appointed term; and in the following year a new Congress was assembled, by virtue of another military order, which is said to have been "aristocratical, ecclesiastical, and central, in its politics." Numerous applications were made, by meetings of the citizens, and by some of the State Legislatures, to restore the constitution and Federal Government, and protests were presented against the subversion of the laws; but they were disregarded, and in many instances the authors were persecuted and imprisoned.

The central Government deposed the constitutional Vice President without trial, elected another in his place, united the Senate and House of Representatives in one chamber, and, thus constituted, declared itself invested with all the powers of a legitimate convention. Under this assumption, it abolished the federal constitution and established a consolidated Government.

In September, 1835, General Cos invaded the province of Texas by land, with orders to disarm the citizens and to require an unconditional submission to the central military Government, under penalty of expulsion from the country. At the same time all the ports were declared to be in a state of blockade; and a military force having been sent to Gonzales to require from the citizens a surrender of their arms, a battle ensued, which terminated in the retreat of the Mexicans.

The Texans assert that this resistance was not because they then wished to separate from the confederacy, but, on the contrary, because they were desirous to bring back the Government to the terms of the constitution of 1824.

They therefore held a convention at San Felipe, in November, 1835, composed of fifty-six representatives from all the municipalities, in which they declared that, as Santa Anna and other military chieftains had, by force of arms, overthrown the federal institutions of Mexico, and dissolved the social compact which existed between Texas and the other members of the confederacy, they had taken up arms against the encroachments of military despots and in defence of the constitution.

This was considered as an absolute separation from Mexico; and on the 2d of March, 1836, delegates of the people from all the districts declared Texas a "free, sovereign, and independent State."

A provisional Government had already been formed under the convention of November, 1835, which continued until a general Congress met at Washington, on the Rio Brazos, on the day previous to the declaration of independence.

This convention took place by writs of election issued by the provisional Government; and it is said that all parts of Texas were represented in it, from the extreme western settlement, at San Patricio, on the Nueces, to the Sabine and Red rivers.

On the 17th of March, 1836, that convention unanimously adopted the present constitution, which, in the greater part, very nearly resembles that of the United States, and seems to have received the general approbation of the citizens.

The powers of the Government, under that instrument, are divided into legislative, executive, and judicial departments; the representatives to be chosen annually, until Congress shall otherwise provide by law, and the Senators for the term of three years.

The House of Representatives to consist of not less than twenty-four nor more than forty members, until the population shall amount to one hundred thousand souls; after which, the whole number shall not be less than forty nor more than one hundred.

The Senate to be never less than one third nor more than one half the number of representatives.

The executive authority is vested in a Chief Magistrate, styled the President of the Republic of Texas; the first to hold his office for two years, and all succeeding Presidents to be elected for three years, and be ineligible during the following terms.

The judicial powers are confided to one superior and such other courts as Congress may establish; the judges to hold their offices for four years, and be eligible to re-election.

Some of the peculiarities of this constitution are: that ministers of the gospel shall not be elected to the executive office nor to a seat in either branch of Congress;

That no holder of public money or collector thereof shall be entitled to a seat in the Legislature until he shall have acquitted himself of all responsibility;

That the supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction only, and no judge shall sit in a cause in the supreme court which shall have been tried by him in a court below;

That the judges are to be elected, by joint ballot of both Houses of Congress, for four years;

That the Executive shall not command the army or navy in person, without the authority of a resolution of Congress;

That all officers shall remain in office during the term of the President, unless sooner removed with the advice and consent of the Senate;

That Congress shall not have the power to emancipate slaves; nor shall any slaveholder be allowed to manumit without the consent of the Legislature, unless he shall send the slave without the limits of the republic;

That no free person of African descent, either in whole or in part, shall be permitted to reside permanently in the republic, without the consent of Congress;

That the admission of negroes, except from the United States, is forever prohibited, and the importation of them declared to be piracy;

That no alien shall hold land except by title direct from the Government, though their heirs may take by descent;

That perpetuities or monopolies are contrary to the genius of a free Government, and shall not be allowed;

That no appropriation shall be made for private or local purposes, unless two thirds of each House shall concur;

That the President shall not renominate the same individual to office, after rejection of the Senate.

It also protects the public domain from donations made by the Legislature of Coahuila and Texas, to persons not citizens of the republic, and declares such grants to be fraudulent.

Although the constitution has been approved in its general features, it is probable an early attempt will be made to change it in several particulars not involving the stability of the republic.

The period of service of the President is thought by some to be injudiciously limited to three years, as the frequent recurrence to election will too often divert the people from the pursuits of industry to political contests. The term of six years, and to be ineligible after, has been proposed as most likely to allay the feeling of party, secure stability to the Government, and repress the influence of the ambitious.

The independence of the Judiciary has been discussed, and the propriety of charging both the election of the judges by the House of Representatives, and their continuance from four years to a tenure for life, it is supposed may be readily understood, when one of those intricate cases of emprusano grants is contested, which will involve the term of service of half a dozen judges, and require all the integrity which a permanence in office and personal disinterestedness can inspire. That part which declares the grants by the State, when annexed to Coahuila, void, will perhaps at some day be rescinded, without prejudice either to the Government or the demandants, as it prejudices questions purely of a legal nature, which should necessarily be left to the judicial forms. That restriction upon appropriations for local or private purposes, without the concurrence of two thirds of each House of Congress, will be either changed, to avoid sectional and personal prejudices, or the constitutional effect will be destroyed by a reciprocal interchange of influence and votes.

I have brought those points to your view, as they have been commented upon by intelligent citizens, honorably interested in the cause of the country, and because they are questions coming strictly within the letter of my instructions.

The Government is now administered ad interim, by virtue of an ordinance of the convention of the 17th March, 1836, which followed immediately after the adoption of the constitution. There is an anachronism as to that paper, which would make it seem to have been passed before the constitution; but that error arises from the circumstance that the date on which it was reported has been mistaken for that of its adoption, which followed that of the constitution, and on the same day.

This ordinance provides that the administration shall have ample powers to do whatever was contemplated to be done by the general Congress, excepting judicial acts, and makes the Government to consist of a President, Vice President, Secretary of State, Secretary of War, Secretary of the Navy, Secretary of the Treasury, and Attorney General, to be elected by the convention, and to continue until their successors shall be chosen and qualified.

The officers to constitute the Government ad interim were elected immediately by the convention, and, except where vacancies have been filled in the cabinet upon resignations or appointments to other offices, the administration still continues as it was then created.

The legislative part of the Government, at this moment, may be said to be in abeyance, as no provision is made for that branch of it by the convention previous to the meeting of Congress; but that will soon be in session, and its powers and the mode of its administration are defined by the constitution.

The executive department ad interim is administered by a President, as pointed out in the organic law of the 17th March, 1836. The President and cabinet form an executive council, and, among other powers, have that to create a loan not exceeding one million of dollars, and to pledge the faith and credit of the republic, and the proceeds of the sale of the public lands, for the repayment of the same, with interest; to appoint commissioners to any foreign Power, and to issue writs of election for Senators and Representatives at an earlier day than that fixed by the constitution, and to convene them as soon after the election as may be convenient.

The judicial department, as now partially exercised, consists of the municipal judges, alcaldes, and ayuntamientos, of the old provisional Government, and the appointment of a judge, under the present administration, for admiralty causes, in the district of Brazoria.

The judges are, however, restricted, by a law of the provisional Government, from all civil jurisdiction, except in claims against absconding debtors, where process of sequestration under the civil law, similar to writs of attachment with us, may issue against the property; but no process of ne exeat, nor any other proceeding in personam, is admitted, except in criminal matters, of which the courts take cognizance, as under the laws anterior to the revolution.

The alcaldes are merely nominal conservators of the peace, and have only authority in litigated actions to call the parties before them for imparlance or arbitration. The ayuntamientos were small corporations of the respective municipalities into which the province was formerly divided, and had the regulation of the police. The jurisdiction of the alcaldes and that of the ayuntamientos is now scarcely or never invoked, and the whole system of jurisprudence under the old forms has gone entirely out of use.

The appointment of the district judge for Brazoria was by virtue of the powers conferred upon the Executive under the organic law, and in conformity with the 4th article of the constitution; it was made more especially for prize cases, several of which have already been adjudicated. With the exception of the patriotic excitement occasioned by the present movements of the army, and the interest manifested in the cause of independence, the country is tranquil, and her citizens zealous in sustaining the Government, good order, and the laws.

In pursuance of the authority given in the executive ordinance, "the President, with the advice and consent of the cabinet, has issued his proclamation for the election of a President, Vice President, Senators and Representatives to Congress.

The election is to take place on the first Monday in September next, and will comprise fourteen Senators and thirty-two Representatives, who are required to convene on the first Monday of October ensuing, at Columbia; so that the presumption is, the Government, as contemplated by the constitution, will be in full operation within a few days after that time.

I am obliged to leave this subject for the present, to address you another letter by the same conveyance upon matters of a more incidental nature.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,
HENRY M. MORFIT.

To the Hon. JOHN FORSYTH,
Secretary of State.

VELASCO, August 23, 1836.

SIR: I returned a few days ago from Galveston and that neighborhood. The easternmost end of that island is garrisoned by the Texans, who have hastily thrown up a mud fort and erected a few cannon. General Cos, with forty-seven other Mexican officers, and about four hundred men, have been confined to that post since the battle of San Jacinto; the rest of the prisoners, with the exception of General Santa Anna, are dispersed among stations in this vicinity. On the 16th instant I was present at the embarkation of the officers for Anahuac, a small town on the north side of the bay, about twenty miles from Galveston, whither they have been ordered by the President, so as to diminish the risk of the garrison in the event of a naval attack by the Mexicans. This place is under the command of Colonel Morgan, with two companies of regulars and some volunteers, the whole not exceeding one hundred men, who nevertheless manifest great confidence in being able not only to control the prisoners but to defend the place against any approach of the enemy. The whole place has the appearance of a military encampment ready for action, as the officers, soldiers, and prisoners, are dispersed among a hundred tents and huts.

The course to be pursued towards Santa Anna is becoming a subject of much interest, and will probably divide the country into two warm parties; the moderate of which will contend that the honor of the country is worth more than the life of the prisoner; and the other, that crime is more justly punished under the law of retaliation than by that of humanity.

The Secretary of War has addressed a letter to his associates, in which he expresses himself as "impressed with the importance of an early determination of the question" that "Santa Anna has forfeited his life by the highest of all crimes, and is not a suitable object for the exercise of the pardoning power." He proposes, however, as the next best course after the rejection of that for execution, an exchange of prisoners, and to detain Santa Anna, and the most influential, until Mexico shall recognise the independence of Texas. He repudiates the idea of retaliation, and asks only for even-handed justice. The rest of the cabinet are opposed to taking the life of their prisoner, but, I believe, agree in the expediency of detaining him until Mexico shall establish a permanent treaty of peace. The argument of the President is, that Santa Anna was brought to camp a prisoner of war, and treated as such; and that, under military usages in relation to one surrendered and received as a prisoner, the preservation of his life "is the first and unequivocal axiom of those customs;" that "it is the untutored savage only who immolates his captives to the disembodied manes of his slaughtered friends: to his benighted fancy the spirits of the slain in battle rejoice in the sufferings and gambol amidst the agonies of dying captives." The address of the Secretary of War has been published, a copy of which I now send. The views of the Executive have not been printed, but I have heard them expressed in the language just quoted.

Notwithstanding the general indignation against the prisoner, for the perpetration of so many crimes alleged against him, it is probable that, after the next victory, the chivalrous feelings of the brave men of the country will prevail, and that clemency will take the place even of justice.

Texas.

[24th Cong. 2d Sess.]

On Sunday morning last, a company of citizen soldiers came down from Marion, on the river Brazos, bringing information that a plan for the liberation of Santa Anna had been detected, and the conspirators taken; and that some volunteers from New Orleans, and who were then here, were supposed to be implicated. The President forthwith gave the necessary orders for surrendering those volunteers, and they were escorted by the company from Marion up to that place for examination.

While I am writing, a vessel has arrived from Matagorda, giving a flattering account of the Texian army, and of the means they have to sustain them in their present campaign.

These are the desultory points to which I alluded in the conclusion of my letter of yesterday, and which I thought it might be advisable to communicate.

At the very earliest opportunity I shall write again;

And have the honor to be your obedient servant,

HENRY M. MORFIT.

To the Hon. JOHN FORSYTH,

Secretary of State, Washington.

NEAR THE RIO BRAZOS,

August 27, 1836.

SIR: The boundaries claimed by Texas, since the repudiation of the treaty with Santa Anna, will extend from the mouth of the Rio Grande, on the east side, up to its headwaters; thence, on a line due north, until it intersects that of the United States; and with that line to the Red river, or the southern boundary of the United States; thence to the Sabine, and along that river to its mouth; and from that point, westwardly, with the Gulf of Mexico, to the Rio Grande.

It was the intention of this Government, immediately after the battle of San Jacinto, to have claimed from the Rio Grande, along the river, to the 30th degree of latitude, and thence due west to the Pacific. It was found, however, that this would not strike a convenient point on the California, that it would be difficult to control a wandering population so distant, and that the territory now determined upon would be sufficient for a young republic.

Some speculative plans were laid for extending the commerce of the United States, when those limits were first proposed. In New Orleans it was said that, as steamboats could go to Natchitoches, a railroad should be constructed from that place through a gorge in the southern Rocky mountains, and thence to the Gulf of California, so as to give the Western States access to the East Indian, Peruvian, and Chilean trade, which would set competition, by all other countries, at defiance. The merchants at the North argued that the Rio del Norte could be ascended by steamboats nearly seven hundred miles, which would be within a short distance of the Colorado of the West, a river that empties into the Gulf of California; and that thus, in a short period of time, a communication would be opened to India, and the route there and to the western coast of South America would be shortened more than one half. All these calculations were of course made in good faith with regard to the territorial rights of Mexico, as they were only upon the hypothesis that she would acknowledge the independence of Texas, and give the Americans a right of transit through her limits.

I am informed by the Executive, that when the treaty with Santa Anna was under consideration, he stated that it would be better to leave that question open for adjustment in the city of Mexico, as the influence of his party, and his own representations about the Texian force, would enable him to meet the wishes of this Government on the subject with more certainty and ease than if the boundaries were abruptly fixed without such previous arrangement. The Rio Grande was nevertheless made the western line by implication, as the third article of the agreement stipulates that the Mexican troops should evacuate the territory of Texas, passing to the other side of the Rio Grande del Norte.

The boundaries, as I have first described them, seem to be those which will be insisted upon in any future negotiation.

The political limits of Texas proper, previous to the last revolution, were, the Nueces river on the west, along the Red river on the north, the Sabine on the east, and the Gulf of Mexico on the south.

The population within that territory is said to have been seventy thousand; but, from all that I can learn, it should be estimated at about fifty thousand, or less. The races consist of Anglo-Americans, Mexican natives, aborigines, and negroes. Of these, there are perhaps thirty thousand Anglo-American settlers, distributed principally between the Nueces river and the Sabine, and on the Trinidad, Colorado, and Brazos rivers. About four or five thousand of the men of this population still remain at home, attending to their farms. There are three thousand five hundred native Mexicans, of Spanish descent, all interested in the cause of Texas. Of these, there are in the neighborhood of Nacogdoches,	-	-	800 souls.

In San Antonio de Bexar,	-	-	2,000
In Victoria,	-	-	120
San Patricio,	-	-	50
La Bahia,	-	-	500

The aborigines amount to about twelve thousand; of whom there are four hundred souls, or one hundred and fifty warriors, of the Whaco tribe, who have a village near the headwaters of the Brazos; fifty warriors, or two hundred souls, of the Towackanies, who are a branch of this tribe; two hundred warriors, or eight hundred souls, of the Tonkawas, between the Colorado and La Baca; eighty warriors, or three hundred and fifty souls, of the Conshattees, near the Trinidad; sixty warriors, or two hundred and fifty souls, of the Alabamas, on the Neches; two thousand warriors, or eight thousand souls, of the Camanches, ranging from the Guadalupe mountains, across the headwaters of the Colorado, Rio Brazos, and Trinidad, up to the Red river; one hundred and twenty warriors, or five hundred souls, of Caddoes, who have lately migrated from the borders of the United States towards the Trinidad, and who, a few weeks ago, destroyed the village of Bastross; two hundred and fifty warriors, or nine hundred souls, of the Lepans, principally above the Colorado and San Antonio. Besides these, there are small portions of several wandering tribes, amounting to two hundred warriors.

This enumeration does not include the northern Indians from the United States, consisting of the Cherokees, Kickapoos, Choctaws, Chickasaws, Pottawatamies, Delawares, and Shawnees, amounting to about two thousand warriors, who are restrained from taking part with either side, in consequence of the position of General Gaines.

It is said that General Urrea has already proposed a treaty of alliance with those tribes; the consideration for which, in the event of success, is, that the Indians shall possess Texas. This fact has been communicated to the commander-in-chief, at Camp Sabine, who will, no doubt, take care to enforce the neutrality of all parties, according to the treaty of 1828.

The Towackanies and Tonkawas are merely predatory, making occasional incursions upon settlements, and carrying off cattle. The Whacos are inimical, but their acts are chiefly confined to inroads upon the stock. The Lepans are entirely neutral. The Camanches, who are the largest tribe in the country, are more numerous than all the rest together, having about two thousand warriors, or eight thousand souls; are friendly to Texas, as are also the Conshattees and Alabamas.

24th Cong. 2d Sess.]

Texas.

From this it will be seen that, of the Indian tribes belonging to the State, the proportion of those friendly is as four to one of those who are inimical. The negroes are about five thousand in number. The additional territory claimed by Texas, since the declaration of independence on the 2d March, 1836, will increase her population at least fifteen thousand, so that the State may be said at this time to contain sixty-five thousand souls. Of this augmentation, there will be in the village of Taos about one thousand five hundred, in Santa Fe two thousand five hundred, in San Miguel one thousand, and two thousand in the other settlements. There are also eight thousand souls belonging to the families of Rancheros, or herdsmen, who will add to the products, but not to the physical force of the country. Two tribes of Cananahuas, the one of which is friendly and the other opposed, are in the vicinity of Espirito Santo, and have seventy or eighty warriors, or about three hundred and fifty souls, each tribe. The rest will consist of the several little bands of Apaches between the Paso del Norte and the mountains of Anahuaca. They were originally branches of the Camanches, and, like all the rest of the Indians in the country, are nomadic. The Rancheros are several, and in some instances numerous herdsmen, congregated upon a large estate, called a hacienda, generally belonging to one proprietor. Some of the Rancheros are feudal, where the land and greater profits, with certain services, are claimed by the hacendado or proprietor; others are allodial, where the herdsmen are either owners in fee, or are lessees at a rent in money or in kind, without the rendition of any personal duties. The feudal tenures are confined to the district of Santa Fe and Coahuila, and not many even there. Some of the haciendas have herds of one hundred thousand horned cattle, and very few less than ten thousand, exclusive of mules and horses. The Rancheros themselves, of the poorest grade, have never less than two hundred head. This information is derived by inquiry of intelligent men, who have traversed all that region of country; and I advert to it in order to show the resources which the newly acquired portion of territory will bring in aid of the future operations of the State, if her independence is acknowledged.

As regards the population of emigrants from the United States, they are said to be not less than 50,000, being all those whom I have denominated Anglo-Americans. They have been coming to this country from the first grant to Moses Austin, in 1820, down to the present moment. Those who were here before the revolution were called settlers, because their objects were agriculture, trade, and commercial enterprises. Those who have come since the declaration of independence are termed emigrants, and devote themselves in the first instance as volunteers, to secure the soil upon which they afterwards intend to fix their homes.

The inducements to this change of country proceed from various causes, some coming to avenge the blood of their relations, who were slaughtered in violation of all faith by the Mexicans, some from the salubrity of climate and the prospects which a new country holds out for future wealth, and some on account of the great productiveness of the land, and the ease with which it can be cultivated.

The bounties to volunteers have also created a separate motive for emigration, as the convention which sat at Washington on the 17th March last granted one thousand two hundred and eighty acres of land to all then in service, and who shall continue to the end of the war. To those who served for a period not less than six months, six hundred and forty acres; to those who had served not less than three months, three hundred and twenty acres; to such as entered previous to the 1st July, 1836, and shall continue during the war, nine hundred and sixty acres; and to those who shall enter after that time, a quantity proportionate to their services, to be hereafter determined by law; in addition to which, the troops received the same pay and rations as those in the army of the United States. The population has been temporarily diminished to a great extent by the removal of the women, children, and infirm, to the United States, since the war has approached the eastern part of the State; and my observations are made upon the supposition that they were still in the country, and that the information given me upon the subject is correct.

If I were to take my own judgment exclusively on this matter, and were to reason as to what I have not seen by that which I have, I should say the population, exclusive of Mexicans, Indians, and negroes, has never exceeded thirty thousand.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,
HENRY M. MORFIT.

To the Hon. JOHN FORSTH,
Secretary of State, Washington.

COLUMBIA, IN THE INTERIOR,

September 4, 1836.

SIR: The views of this Government and of the leading individuals, as to the true line of boundary between the United States and Texas, are the same as those assumed by Mexico upon that question, and invariably I have been referred to the treaty of limits as defining precisely the adjoining territory of either party. The only point admitted to be doubtful is that relating to the source of the Arkansas, which some old hunters suppose may go beyond the forty-second degree of north latitude, so as to extend the north-western boundaries beyond those described in the maps. The idea prevailed in the neighborhood of Natchitoches, previous to the treaty with Spain in 1819, and I am told is still entertained by some of the settlers, that the river designated as the Neches was traditionally known as the western Sabine. Doctor Sibley, of the former place, is said to have supported that belief as early as 1816; and the fact that the Neches has its source in about the thirty-second degree of North latitude, and is the western river that empties into Lake Sabine, would seem to countenance that position, and to account for the language used in the second article of the renewed treaty of 1819. I had a conversation recently with Colonel Almonte, who informed me that he had been appointed the commissioner, upon behalf of Mexico, to run the boundary line between the two countries; and that, before the events of the last campaign, he had expected to have joined the commissioner from the United States upon the frontier, for the fulfilment of their duties; but that, as an unfortunate turn had taken place in the affairs of Mexico since that time, he was unable to say what would be the result of that appointment, or even of the treaty. The intended expedition against Matamoras, of which I advised you some weeks ago, seems to be for the present suspended, as the army has retired from its advanced position on the Colito to the La Baca, which is thirty-five miles nearer to the Gulf, and more convenient for the transportation of supplies.

A majority of the three-months volunteers, who are now returning from the army, are desirous to re-enlist for this special service; and the cabinet are disposed to press the attack by sea, provided there is a hearty co-operation upon the part of the military. The intention now is neither spoliation nor to levy contribution on that place, but to effect a neutral feeling, as far as possible, in that city, and to demonstrate the ability of the Texans to destroy it if necessary. The Camanche Indians, who are very numerous and friendly, have intimated a wish to take part in the present contest; and yesterday it was proposed by one of the cabinet to unite the warriors of that tribe with a portion of the army, and carry the war into the interior, beyond the Rio Grande, against Chihuahua, while the naval expedition against Matamoras should be advanced at the same time.

Texas.

[24th Cong. 2d Sess.]

Nothing has yet been decided as to this matter, and I think it probable the army will remain at their present encampment until some plan of operation shall be determined upon by the approaching Congress. The present resources of Texas are principally derived from the sympathies of their neighbors and friends in the United States and by loans upon the credit of the State. The donations from the former quarter have been, and will no doubt continue to be, very liberal, and indeed munificent. Several individuals, not interested in the success of the country further than their general attachment to the cause of independence and that of their old compatriots, have unostentatiously presented $5,000, while numbers have contributed $1,000 each, and small associations in the different States have thrown in their aid, until the aggregate has swelled to a large amount. I have been surprised to find that Texas has carried on a successful war, thus far, with so little embarrassment to her own citizens or her Treasury; and perhaps it is the first instance in the history of nations where a State has sustained itself by men and means drawn wholly from a distance.

All the loans which have been created were by authority of the late provisional Government, and do not exceed $100,000. One of these was conditional, to be extended to $200,000 if necessary; of which, however, only $20,000 have been drawn; another was for $50,000, and the third for $10,000; the first two in New Orleans, and the latter in New York. I have had access to the Treasury exhibits, and find that the amount due for supplies, as near as may be, is $450,000 00

Amount due the navy, and unpaid, including supposed liabilities for six months to come	$112,000 00
Estimated expenses for six months	65,000 00
		177,000 00
Amount due the army for pay and clothing	$412,000 00
Expenses for six months to come, for pay and clothing	210,000 00
		622,000 00
		$1,249,000 00

The probable outstanding debts on all accounts are thus:

Amount of debts audited, for which the Treasury orders have been issued, and debts under consideration in the auditor's office	$309,280 00
Estimate for supplies, exclusive of the amount audited	250,000 00
Loans	100,000 00
Amount due the navy, exclusive of the amount audited	60,000 00
Amount due the army, exclusive of the amount audited	412,000 00
Amount of civil and contingent expenses, exclusive of amount audited	118,720 00
		$1,250,000 00

Whole amount to this date, one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. As this estimate is made so as to comprehend a period in advance, and supplies are still coming in from neighboring friends, the presumption is that the public debt will not be increased for six months, except in those particulars which arise from the establishment of the several branches of a complete Government under a new constitution. The prospective resources for the payment of the public debt and the future support of the Government, are the public domain, imposts and tonnage duties, and moneys due from settlers on lands heretofore granted under the colonization laws of Coahuila and Texas.

The public domain will be the most available and fruitful source of means to the State. The "head rights" yet due to settlers, together with all other claims for land, are estimated at fifty millions of acres, and the quantity which will remain, after all deductions for costs of the war and soldiers' grants, is one hundred millions of acres.

The present army is about 2,200 strong, not including the settlers or farmers, who can be drawn upon any emergency so as to augment the number to at least 5,000 efficient men; and the supplies for the winter campaign are now in the country and at the command of the Government. Besides this, emigrants are coming in weekly, who enrol themselves first in the military service, so that the army in fact is never diminished by the lapse of terms of enlistment.

The answer, therefore, to the inquiry as to the present condition of Texas and her future means, is, that she owes one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars; that her grants in lands to citizens and others, for "head rights" and military services, are about fifty millions of acres; and that she will have one hundred millions of acres left, after all deductions, to meet the expenses of the war; that she has a standing army of 2,200, which will be increased to 4,000 before the close of the year, besides a reserve of 3,000 yeoman soldiers at home; and that her citizens say she relies for success upon the merits of her cause, the aid of her friends, and the weakness of the enemy.

I am upon the point of starting for the Colorado, further into the interior, whence I shall write you in a few days.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

HENRY M. MORFIT.

To the Hon. JOHN FORSYTH
Secretary of State.

NEAR ORAZIMBO,

September 6, 1836.

SIR: The zeal of the citizens of the district of Brazos has induced many of the richest of them to propose to the Government to raise half a million of dollars for the war, upon their own several bonds. Forms have been printed this day, by which they individually promise to pay various sums at the Bank of New Orleans on the 1st of March, 1842, with interest annually, and the whole secured by the "present and future real estate" of each obligor. The Executive, with the consent of his cabinet, has accepted the offer, and will issue scrip, pledging the faith and credit of the Government for the repayment of the money; so that the citizens and their property are first bound to the State, and then the republic bound to those who may advance the money.

The general election for President, Vice President, and members of Congress, took place last Monday, and it is supposed that General Samuel Houston is elected, by a very large majority, to the first office, and Mirabeau B. Lamar to the second; the latter had no competitor. I enclose a copy of each of the papers prepared for the new loan;

And have the honor to be your obedient servant,

HENRY M. MORFIT.

To the Hon. JOHN FORSYTH,
Secretary of State.

Copy of papers prepared for the new loan.

Know all men that I, ———, for value received, am firmly bounden, and by these presents do bind myself, unto David G. Burnet, President of the republic of Texas, and his successors in office, and his or their assigns, in Nevertheless, this bond to be cancelled, acquitted, and made void, whenever, at any time after the first day of March, eighteen hundred and thirty-eight, I, the above bounden ———, shall pay, or cause to be paid, to the said David G. VELASCO, TEXAS, Sept. 9, 1836.

SIR: The military force of Texas, as now imbedded, consists of regulars and volunteers. The first comprised two regiments of infantry, one of cavalry, and one incomplete regiment of artillery, so that the regular army will be about 1,700 strong. Of volunteers, there are now in the field, for the war, four full companies, and about six hundred men who were engaged for six months, besides several companies enlisted for three months, whose period of service is near expiring. The whole army may therefore be put down at 2,500; and the Secretary of War reports that "volunteers continue to arrive by every vessel, without scarcely an exception."

The army will be 5,000 strong before December. In this estimate the old colonists and farmers are not included. They are prudently left to their usual pursuits, and will be called only upon the greatest emergency. This class of citizens amounts, it is said, to at least 3,000, so that the whole force of the country in the last resort will be 8,000 men.

The plan of receiving volunteers for three months has been found to be injurious to the cause as well as to the economy of the State, and hereafter enlistments will be received principally for the duration of the war, and none for less than six months.

As regards an exact detail of the military condition of Texas, it is impossible, as the department which should furnish the information is not itself in possession of regular returns. The acting Secretary of War estimates the army at near 3,000; and officers with whom I have conversed, and who were immediately from camp and the several garrisons, suppose the whole force at the various points to be much less. I have, therefore, in presenting the preceding estimate, taken the mean number as the most probable, upon their own statements, and have put it at 2,500 men.

Notwithstanding these representations from the officers of Government, and the reports which are circulated by individuals interested to corroborate them, I am induced to believe, from personal observation, that all the troops now in Texas do not exceed 2,000, and that the expectation of her citizens, as regards either new volunteers or the number that can be drawn to the field from her own colonists, will not be realized.

In my despatch No. 6 I supposed that the army might be increased before the close of the year to 4,000; and, in reviewing the data upon which that opinion was formed, I am induced to reiterate it as expressing the maximum extent of the ordinary force. With respect to the augmentation of this number by the old settlers, it will at once be seen that, although they would take part in the contest, it could only be for a short time, and to prevent or determine a crisis, as during their absence the families would be unprotected, and the provisions and crops abandoned. Out of these 3,000 men, there could never be spared more than one third; so that, admitting all the contingencies to happen out of which the army is to be composed, it will not exceed at any time 5,000 men. Nearly the whole of the present army is composed of citizens recently from the United States; and, supposing the number to be 2,000, the proportion of Texans proper will not exceed 300. Heretofore the conflicts have been sustained mainly by the colonists themselves, as in the battle of San Jacinto there were only 200 volunteers out of an aggregate of 783, the rest being settlers, and a small detachment of Mexicans under a native chief.

The equipment of the army is such as might be expected in a new country, where the operations of an established Government are just beginning to assume a system.

Commissariat and quartermaster's departments have been established, with the necessary assistants, and supplies of rations and clothing are furnished according to the wants of the soldiers and the quantity on hand. In the subsistence department there have been occasionally some delinquencies, in consequence of delay in receiving supplies, and the want of opportunity to transport them to the army speedily by water. Provisions frequently arrive as donations. In the other department there is more irregularity, as clothing can only be purchased for cash, and the means of Government are not always available in that form.

The munitions of war appear to be abundant for the present, and perhaps for a much larger number of troops. Every emigrant brings with him some military weapon, and there is scarcely a cabin in the country that cannot at a moment's warning arm several men. Besides these, there are frequent shipments of muskets, sabres, and powder; and there is a small extra supply of each at the several posts. In the last battle, the official return shows a gain of 600 muskets, 300 sabres, and 200 pistols. The embarrassment to the ordnance department is, that the arms for the same class of troops are not always of the same kind, and that soldiers, who retire after the stipulated tour of duty, frequently take them home, to be ready on any emergency. From this cause, no certain calculation can be made as to the number, description, or depot of the arms; and hence there must be an irregularity, as well in the general armament as in the description of the troops. The pay and subsistence of the army and navy are the same as in the corresponding service in the United States, and the rules and regulations of each have been adopted here.

The soldiers appear, for the most part, to be satisfied, upon the settlement of their accounts, in receiving auditor's certificates for the amounts due, as they expect to derive from the bounty in land a speculative profit beyond the present depreciation of their scrip. The latter is made payable out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; but as all the present funds are applied to the subsistence and equipment of the army and navy, the payment of those certificates will be postponed until the State shall be able to perform the obligations of an independent nation.

It is said, that upon any future invasion, the citizens will not again remove their families beyond the Sabine, as experience has proved that, with the present foe, a brave defence by any numbers is better than a hasty retreat. This determination will keep the whole of the settlers together, and inspire general confidence.

The Comanche Indians are looked to by the Texans as ready auxiliaries, as they have immemorially been opposed to the Guachupins (Guachinangos); or Spaniards, and are not less so to their successors—the Mexicans. If those warriors are enlisted in the cause, the pretensions of Texas may assume a stronger form.

The fortifications consist of the Alamo, near San Antonio de Bexar, and the fort at La Bahia, now nearly destroyed. They were both built by the Spaniards in the early part of the eighteenth century, and were fortresses of great strength. Colonel Travis defended himself in the former with 184 men against 1,600; and Colonel Fanning supposed that with 400 at La Bahia he could have withstood 1,500 men. Besides these, there are several small stations between La Baca and the Rio Grande, called refugios, or places of retreat for the early Spanish settlers from the approaches of the Indians. They are chapels, surrounded by walls of masonry, now dilapidated, and were capable of holding 200 men each.

The naval force of Texas has already been described in a former communication. It consists of the Invincible, of nine guns; the Brutus, of the same force; the Independence, of eight guns; and the Liberty, of three: the whole manned by 200 men.

The ability to repel further invasion from Mexico is fully believed here, as the strength of the army is greater than it has been at any former period, and the operations of the Government will be more systematic than heretofore, as the approaching Congress will no doubt combine the wisdom and direct the energies of the people. There is not, at this time, nor has there been since the retreat of General Filisola, a single Mexican enemy on this side of the Rio Grande.

What Texas may be able to do hereafter in her conflict, it would be merely supposititious to say; but to compare the probability of coming events with the success of those that have passed, the result would be highly favorable to the establishment and maintenance of her independence.

In order that you may determine whether her history, thus far, may be considered as experience that will teach successfully by example, I submit the following summary:

In the year 1827, when the Texans near Nacogdoches had been aggrieved by the military at that post, and had ineffectually endeavored to procure their removal, they took up arms for the purpose, and, with 250 undisciplined men, defeated 375 regulars under General Las Piedras.

In 1832, during the administration of Bustaménte, and after the violation of the federal constitution, a detachment of 132 Texian settlers, under Captain John Austin, besieged and reduced the fort at Velasco, garrisoned by 173 Mexicans, under Colonel Ugarticha, with great loss to the besieged.

In 1835, the Mexican garrison at Anahuac, under Captain Tenorio, surrendered to Colonel Travis, commanding a smaller force. In October of the same year, the Mexican cavalry from the fortress at Bexar were completely routed at Gonzales.

A few weeks after, 92 Texans, under Colonels Bowie and Fanning, fought the battle of Conception, and defeated 450 Mexicans. In November, Sepantillan, on the Nueces, was captured by Adjutant Westover. The battle near Bexar was fought in the same month, and 400 Mexicans were obliged to retire under cover of the artillery of the town before 200 Texans; and in December, the city of San Antonio and the Alamo, defended by 1,300 Mexicans, under General Cos, surrendered to 400 Texans, commanded by Colonel Milam. This terminated the first campaign in the cause of civil liberty in Texas. The second commenced with a small expedition against Matamoras, which failed, and was succeeded in March, 1836, by the assault of Santa Anna upon the Alamo, its surrender, and the massacre of the Texans.

Then followed the defeat of the Mexicans at the Mission del Refugio, by Captain King, and the destruction of Gonzales, on the retreat of General Houston.

The second fight at Refugio terminated favorably to the Texans, under Colonel Ward. But Colonel Fanning, a few days after, submitted to General Urrea, and 400 men were shot.

On the 21st of April, 1836, the decisive battle of San Jacinto was fought, in which General Santa Anna, with 1,300 men, were defeated by General Houston, commanding 783; and on the 24th of the same month, all the Mexican forces retreated beyond the frontiers of Texas. This concluded the second campaign, and thence, it is said, a new epoch in her history was dated.

If we recur to the military incidents of Mexico in which persons from the United States took part, even while that country was under the dominion of Spain, it will be seen that nearly all the conflicts were disastrous to her subjects, and that there seems to be a fatality against her that is likely to keep pace with all her pretensions on this side of her natural boundary, the Rio Grande. As early as 1810, the military post at Baton Rouge, whose commandant had committed many wrongs against Colonel Kemper, was attacked by 40 Americans under General Thomas, and the garrison, with Colonel Lassus and 120, subdued. The Mexicans, about that time, had commenced a revolution against Spain, and Colonel Ross, with 500 men, proceeded into Texas to aid the patriots; he attacked and took the strong fortress of Goliad, without any loss, and soon after defeated and captured 1,500 Mexicans. This army determined upon the conquest of Mexico, and routed and cut to pieces 3,000 men, near San Antonio. A reinforcement of 4,000 Mexicans assaulted Bexar, in the absence of the American generals; but the troops resolved to act themselves, and defeated the assailants, with the loss of only three men.

In 1812, General Toledo, who had revolted from the Spanish Government, took command of San Antonio, and with Ross's force of 400, and 300 Indians, routed another Mexican army of 4,000 men. These events led to the general revolution which separated Mexico from Spain; and ever since then, whenever the Texans have been engaged, either with the Mexicans to establish a republic, or against them to defend it, they have almost invariably prevailed.

Notwithstanding all these examples of success, and the improved condition of Texas, which seem to justify her declaration of ability to establish and maintain her independence, there are many circumstances in the mind of an impartial observer which would authorize the suspension of that belief until after the issue of the next campaign. The independence of a nation may be considered, first, in relation to her ability to defend herself against the Government from which she has withdrawn; secondly, in regard to the performance of those obligations which, as a separate nation, she has undertaken; thirdly, with respect to her means of complying with such parts of treaties made by the mother country with foreign Powers as would be sought to be enforced against her; and, fourthly, as to her ability to defend herself against such demands, upon the plea that a separate sovereignty repudiates all liability not undertaken by the State in its independent character.

24th CONG. 2d Sess.]

Texas.

The first and fourth views embrace the physical or military condition of the country, and the second and third only the civil obligations.

If we judge the prospective affairs of Texas by those which have already occurred, and can count upon a continuance of the sympathies and migration of her brethren from the United States of the North, she will accomplish the first category of those inquiries, and be able to defend herself against any further invasion by Mexico. She will escape the penalty of the fourth condition, because none of the treaties of Mexico with foreign Powers contain obligations that would operate against her interest, and no prohibitory stipulations, except in relation to the slave trade, and that is already provided against by the 9th section of the "general provisions" of the constitution, which declares the importation of Africans or negroes, except from the United States of America, to be forever prohibited, and to be piracy.

The second view, as to her undertakings since she has separated from Mexico, is confined at present exclusively to liabilities to her citizens, and Government loans made upon the pledge of public faith and the public domain; all of which will no doubt be complied with if she succeeds in her independence, and the third position is not applicable to her, because, even admitting it to be one which could be insisted on by the law of nations, it is explained away by the reasons that prevail in relation to the fourth inquiry.

Under this aspect, and seeing that the constitution of the 17th of March, 1836, has been finally adopted by the voters at the elections on the first Monday of this month, and that the present administration is continued under the provisions of that instrument until the second Monday in December, it may be said that Texas now has in successful operation a civil Government, capable of performing the duties and fulfilling the obligations of an independent Power.

The reasons I should urge against the present declaration of this opinion are these:

First. The Mexicans, it is said, are preparing to invade Texas during the winter, and already there are 4,000 at Matamoras.

Secondly. The increase of emigrants from the United States is contingent, and may be prevented by various causes, some of which have already operated.

Thirdly. The ordinance of the 16th of March diminishes the quantity of bounty lands to soldiers who shall enter between that time and the 1st of July, and leaves the quantity for those after that period undefined and to be determined by Congress. This has lessened the zeal of many already in the service, and has taken away a strong motive for the services of others.

Fourthly. Enlistments are expiring every week, and there may not be one thousand in the main army in one month.

Fifthly. The troops expected in a body from the South are to be furnished by contract; so that, without any imputation against the motives or chivalry of the individuals, the obligation may fail when the hope of profit is destroyed.

Sixthly. The great majority of the emigrants, no matter by what good feelings actuated in the commencement of service, always manifest a reversionary desire for home, and return to the United States as soon as their duty is over, so that the population of the country is never actually augmented.

Seventhly. The old colonists would not by themselves be able to sustain an invasion, and, at the same time, supply the means for the war.

And, finally, independent of any other objection, the ardor of volunteers and the interest which the fate of the brave in the late battles produced have greatly abated by the suggestions and arguments that this whole enterprise of independence is a mere speculative scheme, concocted and encouraged for the aggrandizement of a few.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

HENRY M. MORFIT.

To the Hon. JOHN FORSYTH,
Secretary of State.

VELASCO, September 10, 1836.

SIR: Upon the inquiry as to whether any negotiation has been commenced or is intended with Mexico for the acknowledgment of the independence of Texas, I have ascertained that no attempt of that kind has been made since the failure of the treaty with General Santa Anna.

It was hoped that the commissioners, Lorenzo de Zavalla, the Vice President of this State, and the honorable Bailly Hardiman, Secretary of the Treasury, would have been enabled, in conjunction with the President of Mexico, to have effected a full recognition, according to the understanding previously had on that subject; but the detention of Santa Anna by the popular voice, after he had embarked with those two gentlemen, and his continued captivity, together with the political changes in Mexico since then, have put an end to all favorable expectations from that quarter.

No attempt has been made by the authorities here to open any negotiation with any foreign Power other than the United States, and I believe all their wishes and applications on this subject are directed exclusively to that Government.

After the Mexican President was compelled to disembark from the vessel in which he was about to return, in pursuance of the public treaty, he presented, on the 9th June, 1836, a solemn protest against this alleged breach of good faith, averring, at the same time, his intention and ability to perform all that had been promised upon the part of Mexico. The public will, however, prevailed over the judgment of the cabinet, and General Santa Anna still remains subject to the disposition of the ensuing Congress.

The constitutional term of service of that President will expire in April; but, from intelligence daily arriving, we are apprized that his popularity and power are already extinct. Indeed, Mexico appears to be divided by various factions, some following or aiding the fortunes of individuals, while others are formed into political classes, in favor or against the consolidated form of government.

General Urrea is for re-establishing the federal constitution, and in consequence has been recalled from the army, to give place to General Bravos.

The Cosmopolita, a newspaper published in Mexico, states that such is the distressed condition of public affairs, that "Government cannot in any way procure money for a single campaign." It refers to several executions that have recently taken place for political reasons, and compares the acts of the party in power to the tyranny of Bustamante.

The Congress which is now in session seems to have exhausted all ordinary modes of raising revenue, and adverts to the necessity of levying new contributions. The national power and integrity of Mexico seem to be lost in these domestic difficulties, and hence Texas argues that no other army will be raised to cross the Rio Grande against her.

There is much reason in this assertion; and besides the feebleness of the Government, the people in the provinces adjoining Texas are opposed to the war, as they have already suffered severely in the progress and return of their own army through their country. Zacatecas and Chihuahua have manifested great desire for peace; and if the ambition of a few men contending for power could be allayed, Mexico would be quiet and Texas free.

The population of Mexico is about eight millions, and that of this country between forty and fifty thousand; so that it cannot be supposed that, under ordinary circumstances, the issue of this war would remain long undecided.

Texas.

[24th Cong. 2d Sess.]

It is owing to the confused state of parties, the exhausted Treasury, the division of the troops into opposite commandancies, the contest between those who are for a consolidated Government and those who desire a republic, that the fate of Texas is thus protracted; and, after all that can be said in regard to her ability to sustain her independence, it resolves itself into the single fact that, without foreign aid, her future security must depend more upon the weakness and imbecility of her enemy than upon her own strength.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

HENRY M. MORFIT.

Honorable JOHN FORSYTH,
Secretary of State.

VELASCO, September 12, 1836.

SIR: The disposition of the Government and the people of this country towards the United States is the same as that in any of the States of the Union; though geographically separated, they have all the attachment which transient emigrants may be supposed to retain for their own country, and universally desire a political annexation of Texas with the United States.

It was intended originally to have submitted the constitution of the 16th March to a convention of the people, after its approval or amendment by Congress; but, as much delay would have been caused by this mode, and it was argued that, with whatever defects, it were better to adopt and confirm it at once, so as to put the Government in complete operation at the earliest moment, the President, in his proclamation for the elections, proposed this as a question to the voters, and the returns show that almost unanimously the people have approved and accepted that constitution without amendment. Every precaution was taken in the general writ of election to preserve the election rights of the citizens, so that those who were absent from their respective precincts upon public duty, or had been obliged to retire temporarily upon invasion of the enemy, should still exercise a voice in the formation of the new Government; and in this way, whatever has been done may be considered as an unequivocal expression of public sentiment. The voters at the different polls were required to state "whether they were in favor of annexing Texas to the United States," and the response through every municipality has been wholly in the affirmative.

I attended one of those elections, and found it conducted with much moderation as to the respective candidates for office, and great unanimity as regards the important points of confirming their present magna charta, and seeking admission into the Union of the United States of the North.

The terms upon which they desire to become an integral part of that Union have been discussed in the cabinet, and have already been or will be made the heads of instructions for the conduct of their representative near the Government at Washington. They are somewhat as follows:

That all the laws, acts, and obligations, of the present as well as the provisional Government of November, 1835, shall be respected and held valid;

That bonafide settlers shall be protected in their rights to so much land as they can rightfully claim by virtue of laws under which they emigrated;

That locations of land shall not be deemed defective for any failure to comply with formal requisitions—such as cultivation in toto, erecting landmarks, paying annual fees or dues to the Government; and that grants good in the beginning shall continue so upon a compliance with the neglected requisites, whenever they may be legally insisted on;

That slavery shall be allowed in Texas of persons of African descent, and that all persons of that description now in Texas, and held as slaves, shall be respected as the property of their respective owners;

That citizens of this who may be bound to those of foreign countries, for debts contracted previous to their coming hither, shall, in respect to such debts, be protected from suits during a certain number of years;

That liberal appropriations of public land shall be made for the endowment of seminaries of learning and "other institutions of public utility;" and that all ordinances or laws, declaring as subject of confiscation or forfeiture property of any description, shall be duly respected, and allowed to be carried out by the authorities of Texas.

The first provision of those instructions would affect the interest of the United States, upon her adopting Texas, only so far as concerns the public debts and grants of lands to settlers and soldiers, as the other laws referred to are of a municipal character, and relate principally to the internal policy of the State.

I discussed the mode in which these obligations should be complied with, as it is easy to see that all the liabilities of the Government, for its administration and the support of the war, must be paid entirely out of the proceeds of the lands. There were two ways proposed: first, to let the State satisfy all the demands of her own tribunals or auditors, and then turn the residuum of the public domain over to the United States; or, secondly, to let the latter take the whole encumbrances of the war, with all the land, and pay the claimants as our Government may direct.

The objection to the latter plan, on the part of the United States, would be, that those expenses and the extent of the liabilities are unknown, and cannot be ascertained; that a greater liberality would be claimed from her in the interpretation of grants and other demands than would be expected from the State, whose citizens, for their own interest, would be obliged to adjust them upon more cautious and rigid rules; and, finally, that if the war is continued much longer, the sacrifices of the public land for the means of defence will leave no surplus beyond her debts.

The part which provides that locations of land shall not be deemed defective for any failure to comply with formal requisites, is, I believe, not consistent with public opinion, as great complaint is made against the tenure of lands by persons who have merely complied with some of the unimportant conditions of the grants, such as erecting a temporary cabin and marking boundaries, and then have left the premises.

The very object of the grants, which was to induce actual settlement, and provide security by the increase of population, has in this way been often defeated; and the colonists, who have borne the burden of the troubles, have built up a society, and have made the country what it is by their labor, will be likely to insist that the lands of others, who have not acted in this good faith, shall be retained by the State, to increase her ability and resources.

The section which requires slavery to be allowed of persons of African derivation refers to a limited toleration of it as it exists in the United States. The constitution prohibits the importation of slaves except from that country, and the President has already, on the 3d of April last, issued his proclamation declaring that trade to be "destructive of national morals and to individual humanity," and requiring the public functionaries of the Government to be vigilant and active in arresting all persons and vessels attempting to contravene that article of the constitution. The proviso exempting the citizens of Texas for a limited time from suits for debts contracted previous to their coming here, is one of policy, and will rather be favorable to foreign creditors than otherwise, for the condition of emigrants must improve with their continuance in the country; and the stipulation that all ordinances of confiscations shall be respected, is profitable to whatever Governments may exist, as the quantity of public land will be augmented by the escheats from private hands.

But the desire of the people to be admitted into our confederacy is so prevailing, that any conditions will be acceptable which will include the guarantee of a republican form of government, and will not impair the obligations of contracts.

The old settlers are composed for the most part of industrious farmers, who are tired of the toils of war, and are anxious to raise up their families under the auspices of good laws, and leave them the inheritance of a safe and free Government.

If we were permitted to view the future condition of this country, under a continuance of present circumstances, or under those which must attend it as a part of Mexico, where it would remain subject to military despotism, and be kept back, like her own subjects, in the scale of civilization for ages, and then compare it with the high station it would reach, in industry, commerce, and the arts and social relations, under the annexation to our country, humanity would speedily dictate her redemption, and the philanthropy of nations give a sanction to the act.

The constitution has been very liberal in the appropriation of lands, and has placed the citizens who were living in the country at the date of the declaration of independence upon a footing with the old colonists, giving to every head of a family one league and labor, and to every single man, of the age of seventeen and upwards, one third of a league. The same instrument has been careful in protecting the State from large grants made to various individuals, some of whom were non-residents and aliens.

The public sentiment seems to be in accordance with those provisions, as they exclude large monopolies, which it is said have been illegally acquired, without consideration and against the laws of colonization. The Legislature of Coahuila and Texas passed acts in 1834-'5, granting away to a few persons eleven hundred leagues of land, all of which, and every survey under them, are declared to be null and void.

The fourth article of the laws of colonization forbids the settlement of the "ten lateral leagues" on the coasts, and of the twenty leagues on the frontiers adjoining a foreign nation, and yet grants were also made by the Legislature in parcels of eleven leagues each. They are likewise denounced as illegal, and the authority over them will be resumed by the Government. This will affect many of our citizens in the United States, who have been led to purchase lands from supposed proprietors, claiming under irregular or conditional public grants.

The constitution precludes foreigners from holding lands except by title direct from the Government, so that our countrymen at home should understand that the acquisition of such property here carries with it the penalty of expatriation.

I have now given you, in my several letters, information upon all the subjects that concern the present condition of this country, in its several relations, and shall in a few days leave it, to return to Washington. I have taken copious notes, from conversations with the officers of Government and intelligent settlers, the substance of which I shall communicate in person, or as the matter of a future despatch.

I have the honor to remain your obedient servant,

HENRY M. MORFIT.

Hon. JOHN FORSYTH,
Secretary of State, Washington city.

TEXAS, September 14, 1836.

SIR: I intended any further communication about the country to have been left for a personal interview; but as there were several points which, though not strictly within my inquiries, were blended in my notes, as exhibiting the views of citizens here upon interesting questions, I have thought it best to transcribe the whole, in the form in which they stand.

The revolutionary history of Texas, as far as it has been published, is erroneous in the ascription of important measures to wrong periods of time, and in mistating the order of its progress.

From an original journal of the proceedings of the delegates in my possession, being the only one in the country, it appears that after the destruction of the constitution by General Santa Anna, the repeal of the colonization laws, and when the news reached Columbia that their citizens had been illegally imprisoned, the people of that jurisdiction held a meeting, in August, 1835, and various resolutions were adopted, declaring that they would resist, with force and arms, any attempt to deliver their fellow-citizens into the hands of the military, and inviting the inhabitants of the different municipalities to elect delegates to devise measures for the relief of Texas. This was the first public act towards a separation from Mexico. The delegates were appointed, and on the 16th October, 1835, met at San Felipe de Austin. The convention was termed the "Consultation of Texas," which, on the 7th of November, unanimously adopted a declaration of rights, setting forth the causes that induced the people to take up arms.

On the 10th of the same month, the plan of a provisional Government, to consist of a Governor, Lieutenant Governor, and Council, was adopted, and on the 12th the several officers were elected, and the oaths of office administered in presence of the Consultation. The proceedings have been neither published nor fully copied, but the Comptroller of the Treasury is supervising the arrangement of them in proper form.

As all the steps of a new nation, from its political birth to the maturity of its being, are interesting to those who look upon history as an instructive species of philosophy, I have copied the captions of the most important of the manuscript ordinances, which I now present, and, though principally of a fiscal nature, they are so many presages of future system.

The first acts of legislation by the provisional Government were to create a loan of one hundred thousand dollars; the next to raise a regular army and create a navy; one to regulate the militia; to purchase munitions of war; grant registers to vessels; organize auxiliary corps of volunteers; and one requiring the Governor to instruct commissioners to the United States of the North. On the 12th December, 1835, a General Post Office Department was created. The law was carried into effect by the appointment of a Postmaster General, and various routes were established, which had got into partial operation, from the mouth of the Rio Brazos to the different frontier settlements. The system was interrupted by the incursion of the army, and is now only beginning to be renewed. The aggregate distance proposed in the courses was one thousand five hundred and thirty-six miles in direct lines.

Duties on imports and tonnage were laid by several ordinances, and an act passed prohibiting the migration of free negroes and mulattoes into Texas.

It is remarkable that this State attended to the regulation of its commercial revenue within a month after the establishment of a provisional Government, while that of the United States did not create a tariff for thirteen years after the declaration of its independence.

The "provisional Government," which contained the three separated ingredients of good policy—an executive, legislative, and judicial department—continued until the 2d March, 1836, when a convention of delegates at Washington proclaimed the independence of Texas, and declared her fully invested with all the rights and attributes which properly belong to independent nations.

The same convention, on the 17th March, adopted a constitution, and provided for a Government ad interim, which took the place of the provisional Government. This constitution was confirmed by the voice of the people in their elections on the first Monday in this month, and the Government ad interim continues until the second Monday in December, when the President and Vice President elect will assume their constitutional duties, and thus perfect, to that extent, the intentions of the people.

The authority of sovereignty, even as to foreign nations, was very soon exercised by Texas after her provisional Government went into operation, and that too at the expense of some of our own citizens.

On the 2d of June last, the American schooner Watchman was captured in Coparo bay, with a cargo of bread, rice, and beans.

On the 19th of the same month, the schooners Comanche and Fanny Butler, similarly laden, were taken in the same neighborhood, and the cargoes of all condemned by the Ruse court for "consisting of articles for the comfort and subsistence of the Mexican army."

The value of the Watchman's invoice was about $4,000 00
That of the Comanche's - - - 7,528 14
Of the Fanny Butler's - - - 8,664 56

Making in all - - - $20,192 70

On the 21st of July, the President proclaimed the blockade of Matamoros, the Brazos, Santiago, and all the neighboring estuaries. This included American vessels, and the trade, which is very considerable from our ports to the Rio Grande, particularly from New Orleans, was thus interrupted, and indeed cut off, until the 13th of August, when, upon my representations, the decree was rescinded. These proceedings would give rise to three propositions: First. Whether Mexico, so far from maintaining her ability to protect her own territory, as required by the law of nations, has not failed in that duty, and extended the injury to the commerce of the United States. Secondly. Whether, if Texas is not an integrant of Mexico, but a separate Government, Mexico has not directly violated her treaty of 1831, by allowing the subjects of an adjoining State to blockade her ports. And, third. If Texas is not a distinct Government, but still part of Mexico, whether the latter has not permitted her own subjects to commit acts in relation to the United States which, strictly speaking, amount to a state of imperfect war.

Though early plans were laid to support the Government, in part, by imposts, they were never carried into effect. The whole community were engaged in one occupation, which was war, and therefore it would have been only crippling the cause of the country to have taxed the necessities that were introduced.

Custom districts were established, and collectors appointed; but, by general consent, the Government acquiesced in the suspension of the law, and to this day every thing is practically free of duty. The consumption of bread-stuffs, provisions, and clothing, is very great, and they are nearly all drawn from the United States.

The products of Texas are principally cotton and corn; the former is the most cultivated, on account of its superior value. This year there will be less than 10,000 bales; but if the country had been quiet there would have been 50,000. Abundance of fine cattle is raised with very little difficulty, and the climate and soil are adapted to the usual grain of our own country.

It is said that the sugar cane would thrive well here, but I should doubt it, though I believe, from personal observation, that the soil would yield abundant crops of indigo, and with but little trouble.

The tonnage of Texas is, as might be expected for a country so new, very small. Heretofore part of the trade was carried on in Mexican shipping, and then the amount was much greater. At present they have not more than a dozen commercial vessels, including two or three steam-boats.

I should say that if this country were in a tranquil condition, with an industrious population peaceably engaged in the cultivation of their rich lands, the raising of cattle, which are so abundant, and the associated pursuits of a settled people, properly organized by the restraints and protection of good laws, it would become, in a few years, a market for as much English, French, and other foreign productions, as any State in our Union. The rationale of this would easily appear, by carrying the mind through the vast region comprised within the limits of this country, looking to the population that must necessarily be drawn to it under a proper system, the proximity of our Western and Northwestern territory, and to the interior of Mexico itself, which at no very distant day may be furnished through this medium. But, as things now are, I doubt whether any of those fruits of good order will ever be matured.

The present Government is as well administered as its resources and the appliances of the country will admit; but as it is just in its pupillage, with no strength but confidence in the cause, no help but that which sympathy gives, and is not yet harmoniously adjusted in the motions of its respective branches, it may still be considered a mere experiment upon independence, which the loss of friends or of a single battle may disperse to the winds.

In a former letter it was said that the residuum of public domain, after all deductions for military services and "head rights," would be one hundred millions of acres. That statement was made upon the views of the Secretary of the Treasury. Since then I have obtained an original estimate, addressed to the auditor by a scientific gentleman who has officiated as a surveyor, in which he reports that Texas possesses 249,900 square miles, or 160 millions of square acres, and allows 80 millions to be taken up and covered with claims; which amount, he says, "is too large, no doubt, by one half." This would leave 80 millions of acres unencumbered for the State; and, supposing only one fourth of it to be available, would yield, at fifty cents per acre, ten millions of dollars. I should presume this calculation as to quantity is incorrect, as the Mexican Government supposed Texas proper to contain, in 1835, only 104,500,000 acres, and the territory between the Nueces and the Rio Grande, claimed by this country since then, will hardly augment the quantity by 60 millions.

Texas, within the present limits, is nearly four times larger than the largest State in our Union, (Virginia,) and two hundred times larger than Rhode Island, the smallest.

The separation of Texas, as an independent State, from Mexico, it is said, will awaken the attention of some of the European Powers against the slave trade, which her citizens will carry on; but it is contended that this assertion must fail, when it is seen that the constitution prohibits that commerce.

Even if it did not, it is argued that it has been judicially settled, in the highest tribunal in the United States and in England, that whatever may be said against that traffic upon the score of moral consequences, it has nevertheless been protected by the laws of all commercial countries, has been claimed by each and allowed by each, and cannot, therefore, be considered as contrary to the law of nations. Those States whose municipal enactments make that kind of commerce unlawful can of course punish their own subjects who may be engaged in it, but they cannot interfere with the subjects of other Powers found in that trade, although those nations have also prohibited it, because the civil tribunals of one country will not enforce the penal laws of another.

But, apart from all international rights or jealousies on this question, the vindictory sanctions of the law here against the slave trade are sufficient to suppress it, without the aid of distant Powers.

The administration and people entertain no apprehension that any foreign nation will interfere in their contest with Mexico, as they rely upon the policy and example heretofore set by the United States and Great Britain in the struggle between Spain and her revolted colonies, in which both the former Governments protested against the right of the allied Powers to interpose by forcible means.

Our Government went further, and held that any attempt to extend the peculiar political system of Europe to this continent would be considered dangerous to the peace of its own States. The Texians hold that the only exception to the rule against the rights of interfering by neutral nations, is, when it is in aid of the oppressed, and where the general interests of humanity are infringed by the outrages or evils of despotism; and that Texas, having for years suffered under that condition, is entitled, like the Greeks, to the commiseration of all civilized nations. They say that the revolutionary state of Mexico, since her separation from Spain, has been so boisterous in action and so contradictory in policy, that in examining how far this province has the right to a separate national existence, it necessarily involves the inquiry of whether Mexico herself has not ceased to possess a distinct sovereignty; that the material attributes of a nation are ability to enforce the laws and protect her own institutions; that even in cases of a neutrality, where an abuse of the neutral territory proceeds from the weakness of the sovereign, and her inability to defend it, the party injured acquires authority and may extend his jurisdiction over it; that much more so may that distinct portion of a large State which is found adhering to a written constitution, while the rest are separated into revolting factions, be entitled to an exclusive control over her own limits and people, because the State has not only failed to protect that particular portion of the country, but has taken part in a revolution to overthrow the very principles she was pledged to support. Texas, instead of rising in arms against Mexico, is said to have remained adhering to the republican system, while Mexico deserted it.

Arguments are used, based upon the history of Mexico, to show that her citizens proper were never capable of appreciating liberty in its political American sense, and that her pretended institutions of liberal government and laws, from the time of her separation from Spain to the present day, have existed only in the forms of delusive promises that were always broken to the hope. The first important act of the first President, after the separation from Spain, was to bring the Government back to an order of things more oppressive than that of its ancient rulers; and Iturbide, instead of continuing as President of a republic, regenerated a monarchy, and proclaimed himself an Emperor. Either from an imagined love for freedom vaguely understood, a belief that a constitutional government could be adapted to the habits and notions of the people, or from restless ambition, it seems that General Santa Anna was the first to overthrow the imperial government, the first to aid in the establishment of a republic, and, finally, the first in its destruction.

The only President who has been permitted to exercise his functions for the appointed time, and who has retired to the shades, if not to the enjoyment of private life, unscathed by revolutions, was Victoria, the successor of Iturbide.

Manuel Gomez Pedraza was elected by a small majority over General Guerrero; but Santa Anna, at the head of the military, declared the election void, and proclaimed Guerrero President. Pedraza fled, and Guerrero was confirmed by Congress. He was invested with the powers of a dictator, and refusing to lay them down, Anastasio Bustamante assumed the presidency, and Guerrero was shot.

Bustamante was in favor of a consolidated form of government, and General Santa Anna for a complete republic; the latter declared for the constitution of Vera Cruz—in 1832 deposed Bustamante, as well as the Vice President Farias—elected General Barrazan in his place—became himself President of the republic, and, in 1835, repealed the constitution by military orders, which re-established the very system, under new rules, that had caused the revolution of 1823.

The question is then asked by the Texians, is a nation which is incapable of protecting any form of government from overthrow, by a few military leaders, entitled to hold the peaceable citizens of a distant part of her country forever subject to all the evils of anarchy?

Other arguments are advanced to show that, besides all this, the incongruity between their citizens, who have been practically accustomed to the protection of the laws as well as to liberty in its true meaning, and those untutored subjects of Mexico who, combining a variety of races in one blood, lose the identity of all, and submit, in the ignorance of their rights and their power, to the authority of a few who are bold, is another reason why the people have a moral right to establish a separate State. Politically considered, they contend that, as allegiance and protection are reciprocal, and Mexico has failed to aid them against the inroads and murders of the Indians, has overturned the republican constitution, the establishment and promised continuance of which were the first inducements to emigration, has for years exhibited a determination to annihilate the colonial settlements, and has, by a law of 1830, excluded the admission of Americans of the North into Texas, Mexico has forfeited her claim to allegiance, which ceased when her protection failed, lost her right of sovereignty over Texas when she violated her compact, and became an enemy to her own citizens when she excluded their brethren from the country.

The only resource left to these citizens in the periods of partial calm when they were oppressed by the laws, or in those boisterous times when the ambition of opposing leaders kept the country in revolution, was to adhere quietly to the principles of a free government, which they had been invited to join, and to wait patiently in the hope of their re-establishment.

Long after the federal system was destroyed, the Texians continued to petition Mexico to restore it, and only took up arms when she was obliged to defend herself against those who made war upon republicanism, so that her present position proceeds not from her own revolutions, but from those of Mexico. In this state of things, the feelings and hopes of the citizens revert to the United States for sympathy, not only because of consanguinity, but because they are pioneers in the new country, carrying with them, in the common cause of humanity, the light of free government, borrowed from their ancient homes. If we view the condition of Texas by comparison with other Governments that are established, it will be found greatly deficient in many of the materials of a nation; but as the independence of States is considered equal in the eye of international law, whatever may be their relative power, and Texas has not only maintained herself within her own boundary, but manifested an ability to invade that of her enemy, it would result that she has thus far accomplished, though in a limited degree, the criterion of sovereignty, in being a "nation which governs itself, independent of foreign Powers."

The United States have, in common with every other nation, a right to enlarge their resources in the proper acquirement of territory, the extension of their commerce, the increase of revenue, and the promotion of alliances; but, as an offset to this, in reference to the present question, may be considered the doubtful policy in the application of the rule, from the infancy of Texas, the uncertainty of her ability to continue her efforts to the full fruition of freedom, the custom of neutrals not to interfere with belligerents, and the convention between the United States and Mexico, which inculcates the establishment of friendly relations upon a firm basis.

These, and other considerations referred to in my former communications, constitute the reason for pausing in expressing the opinion that Texas is now capable of performing the obligations of an independent nation.

The rigid course of duty, which requires a candid statement from facts, prevails over partialities that prompt a different picture; and though a regard for truth, a sense of national integrity, and a desire to manifest their strict exercise by the United States, may justly delay the period for enrolling Texas in the list of nations, her citizens, and those who participate in the principles of her cause, may be consoled by the certainty that, without the aid of any Government, the career of political freedom which is extending throughout the world will of its own speed accomplish what caution now withholds.

Foreign policy, the conventional faith of nations, or the efforts of Mexico, may detain Texas lingering in her embryo state for many years; but the fertility of her soil, the remoteness of her situation, which affords an asylum from the angry subjects that often agitate the Northern and Southern parts of our country, and, above all, the current of emigration, which, through the whole West, looks like the advent of the oppressed of all nations seeking to build up free altars in a new hemisphere, must disenthral her by a moral force which no power nor potentates can resist.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

HENRY M. MORFIT.

To the Hon. JOHN FORSYTH,
Secretary of State.

MR. MADISON AND HIS WORKS.

Message of the President of the United States to Congress on the subject.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, to Congress, copies of my correspondence with Mrs. Madison, produced by the resolution adopted at the last session by the Senate and House of Representatives, on the decease of her venerated husband. The occasion seems to be appropriate to present a letter from her on the subject of the publication of a work of great political interest and ability, carefully prepared by Mr. Madison's own hand, under circumstances that give it claims to be considered as little less than official.

Congress has already, at considerable expense, published, in a variety of forms, the naked journals of the Revolutionary Congress, and of the Convention that formed the constitution of the United States. I am persuaded that the work of Mr. Madison, considering the author, the subject-matter of it, and the circumstances under which it was prepared, long withheld from the public as it has been by those motives of personal kindness and delicacy that gave tone to his intercourse with his fellow-men, until he and all who had been participators with him in the scenes he describes have passed away, well deserves to become the property of the nation, and cannot fail, if published and disseminated at the public charge, to confer the most important of all benefits on the present and every succeeding generation—accurate knowledge of the principles of their Government, and the circumstances under which they were recommended, imbedded in the constitution for adoption.

ANDREW JACKSON.

DECEMBER 6, 1836.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 9, 1836.

The Secretary of State has the honor to report to the President that there is no resolution of Congress on the death of Mr. Madison on file in the Department of State. By application at the offices of the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, the enclosed certified copy of a set of resolutions has been procured. These resolutions, being joint, should have been enrolled, signed by the presiding officers of the two Houses, and submitted for the executive approbation. By referring to the proceedings on the death of General Washington, such a course appears to have been thought requisite; but in this case it has been deemed unnecessary, or has been omitted accidentally. The value of the public expression of sympathy would be so much diminished by postponement to the next session, that the Secretary has thought it best to present the papers, incomplete as they are, as the basis of such a letter as the President may think proper to direct to Mrs. Madison.

JOHN FORSYTH,

Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON, July 9, 1836.

MADAM: It appearing to have been the intention of Congress to make me the organ of assuring you of the profound respect entertained by both its branches for your person and character, and of their sincere condolence in the late afflicting dispensation of Providence, which has at once deprived you of a beloved companion, and your country of one of its most valued citizens, I perform that duty by transmitting the documents herewith enclosed.

No expression of my own sensibility at the loss sustained by yourself and the nation could add to the consolation to be derived from these high evidences of the public sympathy. Be assured, madam, that there is not one of your countrymen who feels more poignantly the stroke which has fallen upon you, or who will cherish with a more endearing constancy the memory of the virtues, the services, and the purity, of the illustrious man whose glorious and patriotic life has been just terminated by a tranquil death.

I have the honor to be, madam, your most obedient servant,

ANDREW JACKSON.

MRS. DOLLY P. MADISON,
Montpelier, Virginia.

MONTPELIER, August 20, 1836.

I received, sir, in due time, your letter conveying to me the resolutions Congress were pleased to adopt on the occasion of the death of my beloved husband—a communication made the more grateful by the kind expression of your sympathy which it contained.

The high and just estimation of my husband by my countrymen and friends, and their generous participation in the sorrow occasioned by our irretrievable loss, (expressed through their supreme authorities and otherwise,) are the only solace of which my heart is susceptible on the departure of him who had never lost sight of that consistency, symmetry, and beauty of character, in all its parts, which secured to him the love and admiration of his country, and which must ever be the subject of peculiar and tender reverence to one whose happiness was derived from their daily and constant exercise.

The best return I can make for the sympathy of my country is to fulfil the sacred trust his confidence reposed in me—that of placing before it and the world what his pen prepared for their use—a legacy the importance of which is deeply impressed on my mind.

With great respect,

D. P. MADISON.

TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

MONTPELIER, November 15, 1836.

SIR: The will of my late husband, James Madison, contains the following provision:

“Considering the peculiarity and magnitude of the oc-

24th Cong. 2d Sess.]

Transfers of Public Moneys.

casien which produced the convention at Philadelphia, in 1787, the characters who composed it, the constitution which resulted from their deliberations, its effects during a trial of so many years on the prosperity of the people living under it, and the interest it has inspired among the friends of free government, it is not an unreasonable inference that a careful and extended report of the proceedings and discussions of that body, which were with closed doors, by a member who was constant in his attendance, will be particularly gratifying to the people of the United States, and to all who take an interest in the progress of political science and the cause of true liberty."

This provision bears evidence of the value he set on his report of the debates in the convention; and he has charged legacies on them alone, to the amount of $12,000, for the benefit of literary institutions and for benevolent purposes, leaving the residuary nett proceeds for the use of his widow.

In a paper written by him, and which it is proposed to annex as a preface to the debates, he traces the formation of confederacies and of the articles of confederation, its defects which caused and the steps which led to the convention, his reasons for taking the debates, and the manner in which he executed the task, and his opinion of the framers of the constitution. From this I extract his description of the manner in which they were taken, as it guarantees their fulness and accuracy:

"In pursuance of the task I had assumed, I chose a seat in front of the presiding member, with the other members on my right and left hands. In this favorable position for hearing all that passed, I noted down in terms legible, and in abbreviations and marks intelligible to myself, what was read from the chair or spoken by the members; and, losing not a moment unnecessarily between the adjournment and reassembling of the convention, I was enabled to write out my daily notes during the session, or within a few finishing days after its close, in the extent and form preserved in my own hand, on my files.

"In the labor and correctness of this I was not a little aided by practice, and by familiarity with the style and the train of observation and reasoning which characterized the principal speakers. It happened, also, that I was not absent a single day, nor more than the casual fraction of an hour in any day, so that I could not have lost a single speech, unless a very short one."

However prevailing the restraint which veiled, during the life of Mr. Madison, this record of the creation of our constitution, the grave, which has closed over all those who participated in its formation, has separated their acts from all that is personal to him or to them. His anxiety for their early publicity, after this was removed, may be inferred from his having them transcribed and revised by himself; and, it may be added, the known wishes of his illustrious friend, Thomas Jefferson, and other distinguished patriots, the important light they would shed for present as well as future usefulness, besides my desire to fulfil the pecuniary obligations imposed by his will, urged their appearance, without awaiting the preparation of his other works; and early measures were accordingly adopted by me to ascertain from publishers in various parts of the Union the terms on which their publication could be effected.

It was also intended to publish with these debates those taken by him in the Congress of the confederation in 1782-'8-'7, of which he was then a member, and selections made by himself, and prepared under his eye, from his letters narrating the proceedings of that body during the periods of his service in it, prefixing the debates in 1776 on the declaration of independence, by Thomas Jefferson, so as to embody all the memorials in that shape known to exist. This exposé of the situation of the country under the confederation, and the defects of the old system of government, evinced in the proceedings under it, seem to convey such preceding information as should accompany the debates on the formation of the constitution by which it was superseded.

The proposals which have been received, so far from corresponding with the expectations of Mr. Madison when he charged the first of these works with those legacies, have evidenced that their publication could not be engaged in by me without advances of funds and involving of risks which I am not in a situation to make or incur.

Under these circumstances, I have been induced to submit for your consideration whether the publication of these debates be a matter of sufficient interest to the people of the United States to deserve to be brought to the notice of Congress. And should such be the estimation of the utility of these works by the representatives of the nation, as to induce them to relieve me individually from the obstacles which impede it, their general circulation will be insured, and the people be remunerated by its more economical distribution among them.

With high respect and consideration,

D. P. MADISON.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

TRANSFERS OF PUBLIC MONEYS.

Report from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting statements of Transfers of Public Moneys, in obedience to a resolution of the Senate of the 20th instant.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

December 26, 1836.

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following report, in further compliance with a resolution of the Senate, passed the 20th instant, directing "that the Secretary of the Treasury communicate to the Senate a detailed statement of all transfers of public moneys ordered since the 23d of June last, for the purpose of executing the act of that date for regulating the deposits of the public money; showing the dates and amounts of such transfers; from what place to what place; from what bank to what bank; and the times allowed for such transfers, respectively; also, a similar statement of all transfers other than such as were made in execution of the aforesaid act."

From the manner of making transfers which has long prevailed in this Department, the cause for making them does not appear on the face of the transfer draft, nor, in general, on any record.

The cause of any particular transfer is, therefore, usually known to no person except the Secretary who orders it; and hence, such transfers as have been issued "since the 23d of June last, for the purpose of executing the act of that date for regulating the deposits of the public money," and which are called for in the first part of the resolution, cannot be discriminated from any others called for in the last part of the resolution, and which may not have been made in execution of the aforesaid act, unless the Secretary is able to do it, and from memory rather than the records.

In order, therefore, to avoid any mistakes as to the whole amount of transfers directed, from all causes whatever, within the period mentioned, the Treasurer was, on the day the resolution reached me, required to prepare an exhibit of the whole since the 23d of June last, and to accompany it by the details desired in the resolution, as to the times of payment and the names of the banks to and from which they have been respectively ordered.

The whole amount of these transfers which have taken effect, or been paid, appears to be $25,129,385.

Those which have not taken effect, and are not payable, many of them till January, February, March, and April, of next year, equal $12,910,000, making the whole amount ordered $38,039,385.

To be able to decide, nearly as practicable, what portion of those have been directed "for the purpose of executing the deposit act," and what portion, if any, for other objects, it will be necessary to advert to the following facts and explanations. The Department supposes that they may all be construed by some as having been ordered for that purpose, because they were all issued under the authority of that act, and the supplement to it, passed July 4, 1836. But a portion of them having been issued with a view to facilitate disbursements and make payments, at convenient points, of the appropriations by Congress, may not, in strictness, perhaps, be considered by others as ordered for the purpose of executing the act, and hence will, as far as practicable, be estimated by themselves. The amount of them, though not attainable with exactness, can, by a few considerations, probably be separated and computed distinctly from the rest, with sufficient certainty for any general object contemplated by the resolution.

Thus, the sum in the Treasury subject to draft on the 23d of June, 1836, was about $34,000,000. Of this amount, about $6,200,000 were then under transfer to different places, and to take effect at future periods, for purposes of safety, and affording facility to future disbursements.

On the passage of the deposit law, however, and in execution of the first section of it, prohibiting any amount over three fourths of the capital of any bank to be left in it longer than was necessary to select new banks, and to complete the transfers proper for removing the excess, it became indispensable to transfer, for that purpose alone, about $18,300,000. New transfers for this whole amount became necessary, except in a few cases where the transfers outstanding tended to accomplish that object, though in other cases they quite as much retarded it. The Department, therefore, took immediate steps, even before the adjournment of Congress, to comply with this direction of the law. But it was at once perceived that, by the peculiar phraseology adopted in the deposit act, it was very doubtful whether any of these new transfers could be made to banks in other States than those where the money then was, unless done to facilitate the public disbursements, or unless suitable and sufficient banks to hold the excess could not be obtained in the latter States; and, hence, that the transfers of any of it, for the purpose of beginning the equalisation of the surplus among the different States, could not probably, in any case, however convenient, be carried on at the same time, or be commenced before the 1st of January next. These impressions were communicated by me in reply to several members of Congress who inquired at the Department on the subject, and wished new banks selected, and transfers made under the new act, immediately from States where the public money had greatly accumulated beyond their proportion, to other States where large deficiencies existed.

Accordingly, the form of a bill was, at their request, prepared, which might, if Congress deemed it proper to legislate further on the subject, remove the supposed difficulty, and which, with some modifications, afterwards passed into a supplemental law, on the 4th of July last. Consequently, in any subsequent proceedings to accomplish those first transfers of about $18,300,000, with a view to equalise the amount among different banks, in conformity to the first section of the deposit act, it was considered that Congress, by the supplemental act, expressly intended to remove the doubts and objections before entertained to the course previously proposed, of combining with the division of the excesses among new banks the commencement of the apportionment of the deposits among the different deficient States, preparatory to a gradual and easy payment to the States themselves the ensuing year.

In several cases, therefore, both objects or purposes, when convenient, were seasonably united, and with a mitigated and more beneficial effect, it is believed, on the whole administration of the law, and the condition of the money market generally, than if all the transfers to all the different States had been delayed till next year, and at that time have been ordered in much larger sums.

But, as the payments were not required to be made into the State treasuries till the 1st of January next, and quarterly thereafter during the year, it will be seen by the exhibit that few or no separate transfers have yet been ordered for equalisation among the States, disunited with the other purpose of equalisation among the banks, except such as were to take effect the next year, near the dates when the several payments are due to the States themselves, and none whatever have been ordered to remain permanently, except in cases where great excesses existed in some States, to be reduced, and deficiencies in others to be supplied, and where, if desired on account of greater convenience, merely in point of time, they have not been postponed to 1837. The distinction between permanent and temporary transfers is adverted to in the above remarks because, though that distinction does not, any more than the cause of the transfer, appear on its face, yet it often happens that transfers are made from one place to another on account of its being more easy in the course of trade and exchange to have the money go to that other place, in the first instance, temporarily, and afterwards be forwarded further by new transfers, and with greater public convenience, to the place where it is permanently to remain till expended.

If this be done sometimes, in the first step of its progress, without a rigid regard to deficiencies or excesses in the bank or State receiving the money, yet, in the next and final step of transferring it to its ultimate destination, those are always strictly adhered to.

In several cases, also, where the transfers are at first, for the convenience of commerce, or other proper cause, ordered to banks in an amount beyond three fourths of their capital, it will be seen that, before all the transfers take effect or become paid, other transfers are ordered from the receiving banks, so as to prevent them from holding permanently more than the amount prescribed in the law. But, besides the transfers of the $18,300,000, rendered imperative to equalise the money among the banks, there has been an accruing revenue since the deposit act passed, amounting to nearly $22,500,000, and most of which, being at first paid into the banks where an excess already existed, and hence not by law retainable there, has also been, necessarily, placed under transfer to some other banks, in compliance with the first section of the act of Congress, except so far as while accumulating; the revenue, whether new or old, has in part been used to meet current expenditures at the places where collected.

In addition to all these removals of money, rendered indispensable under the 12th section of the act, amounting in all to over forty millions of dollars, except the deduction of the current expenditures at those points, equalling perhaps one third of the whole $17,500,000 which have been paid out on appropriations since last June, other transfers, to the amount of $700,000, authorized for the purpose of supplying the mint with metal for coining, as explained in my annual report, have, under the direction of the President and advice of the director, been made to promote the execution of that desirable object.

The result of the whole is, that the amount of transfers ordered to execute only these purposes would be about $30,666,666, or but seven to eight millions less than all the transfers ordered since the deposit act passed.

This residue is near the whole amount which has probably been required to be transferred for facilitating the public disbursements at other points, amounting, since June last, at those other points, it is presumed, to about twelve millions of dollars out of the whole. This sum is only from one to two millions larger than the transfers outstanding for this and a similar purpose when the deposit act passed, and is less than the average amount required during the two years before the act passed, as well as while the United States Bank was employed as the depository of the public money in the expenditure of a similar sum. This is the nearest approximation which can be made to the amount which has been transferred since June last, not strictly, perhaps, "for the purpose of executing the act," provided that the clause in it by which they are authorized be not so understood, in connexion with the resolution, as that these transfers may be properly considered as made "for the purpose of executing the act."

The dates of the particular transfers which were made exclusively to aid disbursements, and the names of the banks from and to which they were made, cannot now be distinguished from the others, except by some general circumstances which may be briefly indicated. They embrace a portion of all those transfers which have been made to places where the public money is disbursed to a large amount for any legitimate purpose, and especially in the deficient States. Besides, some of these transfers required in over one half of the States of the Union, the largest amounts rendered necessary to meet appropriations, since the 23d of June last, have been to New Hampshire, chiefly for the navy yard and pensions; to the District of Columbia, for various great public expenditures, of almost every description; to Norfolk, Virginia, very large sums for the navy yard and fort near that place; to Charleston, South Carolina, and Savannah and Augusta, Georgia, as well as to New Orleans, for the prosecution of Indian hostilities, and disbursements anticipated on our Southwestern frontier; and to Tennessee, as well as the other places last named, a sufficiency to meet heavy payments connected with the removal of the Cherokees, Creeks, and Seminoles, beyond the Mississippi.

The explanations of both branches of the last resolution, and of the tabular statements referred to, in answer to the call of the Senate, might here be closed, had not the Treasurer prepared the schedule of transfers in a form only chronological, when it might be desirable to some members to have the results presented in their connexion with the situation of the different States, as bearing on the amount of deposits of public money within each as well before these transfers began, in June last, as at the date of this inquiry, and both of these as compared with the proportion of deposits which the States will respectively be entitled to receive under the act. An exhibit has therefore been added, which gives, in round numbers, the proportion each State would be entitled to receive from a distribution of deposits amounting to thirty-seven millions of dollars; and in other columns the amount on deposit in each State subject to draft about the time the act passed, and also at the present time.

By this document, and those on the subject of the deposit banks submitted to the Senate with my last annual report, and connected with the present call, it will be seen that sufficient transfers have already been issued, though all have not yet become payable, to execute the 1st section of the act prohibiting more money to remain in any bank than three fourths the amount of its capital. It deserves notice, however, that the revenue has increased over our expenditures during the last six months so constantly, and in such large amounts, as to keep up to the present moment, and imperatively require, almost weekly transfers and weekly selections of new banks, in order to comply with the above direction of the deposit law. But the utmost care has been exercised, while endeavoring to enforce the spirit of the law on this point, to take every precaution to prevent, as far as practicable, any unnecessary derangement or pressure in the money market, by affording reasonable time for all those transfers to be effected, varying the notice given by this Department to all the parties concerned, generally according to the amount and distance, from thirty to one hundred and twenty days, and in several cases to a longer period, so as to enable the banks easily to remove the money, by bills of exchange, drafts, bank balances, and other satisfactory remittances, and by allowing the payment to be made, as has always been usual, at the places to which the money is to be transferred, unless the bank making the transfers prefers to pay them at its own counter.

But it will be seen, at the same time, that while all has thus been accomplished which was deemed necessary to execute the purpose of the 1st section of the deposit act, dividing the excesses among different banks, and to aid the operations of the mint under the 13th section, and to facilitate our very large disbursements the last half year, and for a few months to come, at the necessary points, yet the other and last process of transfers for the apportionment of the deposits among the States in the prescribed proportions, so as to be gradually and seasonably ready for payment to each State the next month, and quarterly thereafter during the year, has made but little progress since June, by means of transfers to the several States then deficient, and has not been thus completed in a single case, unless the State of Ohio be considered an exception. Her contiguity to other States which had not banking capital sufficient to hold the great accumulation in them, has required the Department, under the act, in order to execute the 1st section alone, to place enough within her limits, by transfers from only the neighboring States, to supply, with the aid of collections there, any deficiency before existing, and all the current expenses of the Government, with some excess for transmission elsewhere. Very unequal sums have been placed in some other States, from the same unequal cause; a cause not within the control of this Department, but yielded to under the express directions of the deposit act. It deserves notice under this head, that, of the other States which were deficient last June, being seventeen in number, all except Indiana still remain deficient in sums ranging from $150,000 to $1,600,000 each, and requiring in the whole, to produce an equality, nearly $11,000,000 more to be paid from other States, besides about two thirds of the five millions to be reserved next month to defray current expenditures. Indiana has since been filled up, and now has an excess of more than a million, derived from the large sales of land within her limits, and not from transfers.

On the other hand, all of the States which last June had an excess, still retain one, except Maryland, which has now only about her just proportion. In all of them, likewise, with a single exception, those excesses, instead of being much diminished by large transfers to a distance, or payments at home beyond the accruing revenue within their limits, have been all increased, and in several cases in such great amounts as to range from a third of a million to two millions higher than they did in June. That exception is New York; but which, at the same time, has been diminished only about four hundred thousand dollars, and still retains an excess beyond her proportion, and mostly in her commercial capital, of over six and one fourth millions of dollars.

If, looking to the whole amount in the Treasury when the deposit act passed, and to the proportions then on deposit within the several States, and to the proportions of it they were then entitled to receive, on the principles of the two acts, provided all excesses had then at once been reduced and all deficiencies supplied, it will be seen that they did not then vary over one million and a half from what is still to be accomplished in the present state of things; and consequently, that, during the six months which have since elapsed, the operation of equalisation among the States has not been begun or consummated; because not found easy and convenient, while carrying on the other imperative operations under the law, beyond the small extent of less than two millions of dollars.

But however difficult the apportionment among the States must be when it all goes into final effect, merely from the collection and paying over such immense sums into new hands, and however widely and with what embarrassment some of the money must, in the end, depart from the usual channels of commerce and of our fiscal operations, the directions of the act in this respect, as stated in my annual report, could not, with propriety, be neglected by the Department, and are in the course of completion at the proper periods within the ensuing year.

Thus, among the transfers already ordered, but not to take effect till 1837, it will be seen, by the table annexed, that a portion of them will in a few months somewhat reduce these excesses, and a portion of the existing deficiencies will, by the same transfers, be further filled up or supplied. But considerable parts of the excesses in several States, after leaving a due proportion of the five millions continuing in the Treasury to meet the current expenditures there, are now so situated that they will not be actually put under transfer till the beginning of each quarter in 1837, and will then, in general, be made directly to the agent of the State to which they are to be paid, as the banks in which they now are can, by law, hold them till wanted for the several State treasuries. Care, however, will be taken to give a suitable general notice of the time and place of all these subsequent transfers, as has been done concerning the preceding ones. Indeed, as long ago as the 1st of last November, the Department addressed a circular to almost every deposit bank, notifying it of the probable amounts, times, and places, of all future transfers or payments which were expected to be made from it to the several States, in the course of the ensuing year.

These banks will thus enjoy a longer time than usual to make preparation for completing most of these last transfers to the States themselves, by having sixty days' notice in all cases, and in all others an additional time of three, six, and nine months.

The necessity for further explanations upon this subject is not perceived, except to remark that, in all cases where the amount transferred was not required for expenditure, the transfers which were made exclusively for division of the money among the banks have been arranged to the nearest practicable and convenient points where public money was either collected or disbursed, and banks could be selected agreeably to the provisions of the law under which they were ordered. The practice, which had heretofore prevailed, of transferring chiefly from one great section of the country to another, according to the course of the commercial operations between them, was prohibited by the 12th section of that law, except for the purpose of facilitating expenditures, or except, as under the supplemental act, it has in few cases, and may hereafter in many, become necessary and permissible in transfers made either principally or wholly with a view to begin to execute in some cases, and in others to complete the execution of that part of the law apportioning the deposits in ratable proportions among the different States. When attempting either of those objects, independent of the others, the former practice has been strictly adhered to, and the whole operations under the act have been rendered as easy as possible to the banks making the transfers, and as little inconvenient or injurious to the money market and the commercial community as was practicable, without departing from the express enactments of Congress.

Respectfully, yours,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

HON. MARTIN VAN BUREN,
President of the Senate.

REDUCTION OF THE REVENUE.

Report of the Committee of Ways and Means.

The Committee of Ways and Means, to which was referred the message of the President recommending a reduction of the revenue to the wants of the Government, the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the finances, a memorial praying for a distribution of the surplus revenue, and many memorials praying for a repeal of the duties on foreign merchandise, submit the following report.

The balance in the Treasury on the 1st of January last, as near as it can be now ascertained, of available funds, was $42,468,859 97. There was probably placed to the credit of the Treasurer before that date, of which no account had been received, about one million in addition, and the Government held on public account $6,244,600, par value, of stock in the Bank of the United States, which, at 114 per cent., amounts to $7,106,304. The aggregate amount of money and other means possessed by Government on the 1st of January was upwards of fifty millions five hundred thousand dollars. The appropriations unexpended at the close of the year, and required to complete the service of 1836, amounted to $13,561,373 35. Of this amount, but $6,000,000 can be properly charged against the surplus, as about seven to eight millions remain unexpended at the end of almost every year. The surplus of means, on the 1st of January, may therefore be estimated at $44,500,000.

The revenue of the past year, as nearly as it can be ascertained and estimated at the Treasury, was $23,000,000 from customs, and $24,500,000 from public lands, and from all other sources $620,000, making an aggregate of $48,120,000.

The excess of revenue beyond the proper wants of Government, though now assuming greater importance than it did formerly, has existed for some years past, and originated in the policy of revising our tariff so frequently since our war with Great Britain, without regard to the condition of the Treasury. High rates of duty were levied to protect particular branches of industry, and a very large revenue was raised, which was absorbed in our public debt till that was extinguished.

Other causes have, however, combined to produce our present redundant revenue, and to give an impulse to trade generally. The sudden and rapid increase during the last five years may be ascribed, in a measure, to British and American legislation. The former, after prohibiting them for a century, authorized the unlimited creation of joint-stock banks, not redeeming their notes in gold or silver, but in the notes of the Bank of England, which were made a lawful tender. On our side, we have added, since 1829, $45,093,207 to our metallic currency; and since 1830 we have increased our banking capital from $110,000,000 to about $330,000,000; thus extending our paper circulation probably $60,000,000. The currency of no country can be so suddenly increased, without encouraging general speculation, and producing a very considerable expansion of commercial credits. Trade and revenue have been accordingly affected by it. Our exports, which were at fifty millions in 1828, rose in 1835 to one hundred and one millions; and those of 1836 were more than one hundred and twenty millions. Our imports, deducting the amount exported, and excluding coin and bullion, were in 1829 $49,500,000, and in 1835 $123,000,000, and in the past year probably $150,000,000.

The annual receipts from the sales of the public lands in 1830 were less than two millions and a half, and in 1836 $24,500,000; and a much larger increase would have occurred in our revenue from customs, had not the duty on nearly one half of our imports been repealed. The produce of our agriculture, and one half in value, if not in extent, of the whole territory of the country, have become objects of speculation, contributing to enlarge very considerably the mass of commercial contracts and credits.

The revenue of forty-seven millions and a half from customs and public lands in the past year is obviously not to be relied upon as our permanent income. The spirit of speculation is already checked, and the probable embarrassments of the winter will sensibly affect the receipts in the present and the next year. But in the actual condition of our country, sustained as its prosperity is by powerful and permanent causes, we are not authorized to anticipate the extraordinary decline in our revenue which occurred after the disastrous revulsion in 1819—the consequences of a sudden transition from war to peace. In adjusting our revenue to the future wants of Government, we should reflect that this is the first opportunity we have had, since the adoption of our constitution, to enlarge our foreign trade, and develop the resources of our extensive confederacy. At the outset, we had had but four years of uninterrupted commerce. In the second period but seven, from 1800 to 1807; and even after the close of the war in 1815, the trade of the country was convulsed for six years by the change from war to peace, the sudden increase of State banks, and the fluctuating operations of the Bank of the United States. The speculations of 1825 were very much confined in this country to one branch of trade, and were of British, not American origin. No general prostration of our trade, internal and external, has occurred for sixteen years; and to this, more than to any temporary or legislative cause, the existing prosperity of the country ought to be ascribed.

Our revenue from customs is sustained by permanent causes; and although it will fall off during the present and in the next year, it must increase with the growing foreign trade of the country. The cotton manufactures of Europe are steadily increasing. In Great Britain, the average increase from 1834 to 1836 was twenty per cent. In this country, the crop of cotton in the past year is estimated at 1,570,000 bales; being 210,000 more than was produced in 1835. It must also be observed, that while the spirit of speculation has raised other commodities to extravagant prices, cotton, other articles of export, and foreign merchandise generally, the sources of our revenue, have not been much higher than usual. A crisis in commercial affairs could not, therefore, as in 1819, cause any very considerable reduction, and any decline would be but temporary. The rapid growth, too, of our wealth and population, and the extension of our settled territory, enlarge the demand for foreign supplies; and in any prospective adjustment of the tariff, the permanent increase of our foreign commerce should be more regarded than the temporary depression resulting from over-trading.

We may anticipate a great decline in our revenue from public lands, though not to the extent which has been estimated. The receipts in the last quarter, notwithstanding the extraordinary demand for money, were, as nearly as they can be ascertained, four millions and a half. The revenue for the present and the next year will fall far below that of 1836; but, in estimating our future income from our public lands, we must not be governed by the annual receipts in former years. Many causes exist now, which must considerably enlarge this source of revenue. We have within six years purchased of the Indians ninety millions of acres within our settled boundaries, and removed the tribes beyond the Mississippi. This must accelerate the sale and settlement of these lands. We have, too, within a few years, rapidly multiplied our internal improvements in the interior, in every direction, and in many instances through large tracts of the public lands. It is as easy for the emigrant to reach Illinois at this time as it was to go to Utica, in New York, twenty years ago. The area of settlement is thus enlarged, in the South and in the West, to an extent very far beyond its former boundaries. The States in the Northwest are growing with astonishing rapidity, while the laboring population of Maryland, Virginia, and North Carolina, is rapidly moving off to the South-western States.

Should the sales of our public lands be limited to actual settlers, as is proposed by the Committee on Public Lands, some, though not a very considerable, reduction in the revenue may be anticipated. Nothing short of suspending the sales, a policy which this Government never would adopt, can prevent us from receiving a large income from this source.

One and not the least of the evils resulting from a surplus revenue, is an extraordinary increase of our federal expenses. A part of this increase has been caused by extinguishing Indian titles and removing the tribes. We have appropriated for these objects, since the 4th of March, 1829, $26,982,068; and our Indian wars have and will cost us not less than $13,000,000, making an aggregate of about $40,000,000. Such heavy expenditures, for similar objects, cannot be anticipated hereafter, and our federal expenses for all purposes ought not to be estimated at more than twenty millions of dollars. Even that amount is much more than we have hitherto deemed compatible with the necessary wants of an economical Government; and a just regard to economy should prevent us at least from making provision, in anticipation, for a larger Government expenditure.

Unless, however, prompt measures are taken to reduce our revenue, we may anticipate a rapid increase of our expenses, and the recurrence, in a few years, of another surplus for deposit or distribution. To avoid these evils, the only safe and prudent course is to diminish the income of the Government. The committee are of opinion that some unnecessary taxes, not yielding much revenue, may be repealed, and that a general reduction should be made in one or the other sources of our income, to the extent of seven millions of dollars. The actual condition of our finances does not warrant a less reduction.

Without arresting the progress of the settlement of the country, this reduction cannot be made in our receipts from public lands. But even if such an unwise and unjust proposition were made, and the question should be presented, whether we should relinquish our income from this source, or reduce our revenue from customs, there are great considerations, involving even the stability of our confederacy, why the latter should be preferred to the former.

Our public lands are the common property of the Union in the ratio to representation. No tax can ever be imposed, the burden of which will, in the spirit of our federal constitution, fall in the like ratio among the States. On the contrary, the revenue from customs is the most unequal and unjust plan of taxation that could have been devised; and the design of our constitution will never be fulfilled until it is wholly reformed. The agricultural States should never permit a common fund to be destroyed, or permanently distributed, in order that, by perpetuating our taxes upon manufactures, the chief burden of supporting the Federal Government should be thrown upon them.

In justice to the new as well as to the old States, the sales of the public lands ought not to be suspended, nor should they be converted into a fund for annual distribution among the States. Whatever reduction is made should fall upon our revenue from customs. In examining the various articles upon which duties are now levied, the committee find very few remaining that do not directly or indirectly come in competition with some branches of our own industry. Those which are exclusively foreign do not yield an aggregate amount of duty exceeding one hundred thousand dollars. Many others, which have been heretofore classed among the non-protected articles, might be included in the favored list, with quite as much justice as those which have been so considered ever since it has been the policy of the Government to make any such distinction. But if the duties on all that are classed with the non-protected were repealed, it would not reduce the revenue one million of dollars. An adequate reduction cannot be made without diminishing or repealing the duties on what are denominated protected articles; in other words, without modifying the act of the 2d of March, 1833, commonly called the compromise act.

In approaching this question, the committee are fully aware of the importance of the interests involved, and of the anxiety of capitalists who are extensively engaged in the manufacture or production of commodities which may be affected by any reduction of our taxes. But the question whether we shall continue to sustain their income by our laws, must yield to the indispensable necessity of reducing our revenue to the wants of the Government. The actual condition of our finances demands this, and makes it our duty to examine thoroughly the foundation upon which the claims of our capitalists to exclusive and perpetual protection rest, and to exhibit the very unjust operation of the compromise act upon the people and States of the confederacy.

Prior to 1816, the primary object of every duty was to support Government and pay the public debt; every tariff and every tax originated in a want of money. The duties were levied on imports generally, and the encouragement of manufactures was wholly incidental to the power of collecting a revenue from customs. There was no distinction, then, between protected and non-protected articles; for the latter were generally taxed at the highest rates. When a duty was proposed as a tax, and defended as an incidental encouragement to some branch of industry at home, it was uniformly advocated as a temporary burden upon the consumer, for which he would be indemnified in a few years by a cheaper domestic supply. The Government wanted money, the taxes were moderate, and the consumers seldom troubled themselves to inquire into the wisdom of the discriminations or the soundness of the principles of Congress.

At the close of the war with Great Britain, the manufactures of the country had been protected for eight years by an almost total prohibition of foreign merchandise, and by the sacrifices of agriculture and commerce. When peace returned, the latter interests were destined again to prosper, and there was danger that the sudden renewal of our intercourse with foreign nations, with whom we exchanged productions, would give a blow to manufactures from which they would not recover in many years. There was a general desire to moderate the shock, and the duties levied by the tariff of 1816 were in some instances higher than would have been otherwise adopted, and necessarily much higher than they were before the war, owing to its heavy expenses. From that time a struggle occurred at almost every session, for more protection, and the duties were continually raised, till they reached their maximum in 1828. Various expedients were resorted to, to sustain them. Our expenditures were rapidly increased, without the least regard to economy, to create a necessity for revenue. The duties on merchandise exclusively of foreign origin were repealed, to preserve our protecting duties; and now, when all these expedients have failed, an attempt is made not only to perpetuate but to increase them, by annually distributing the proceeds of our public lands.

The system was modified by the acts of the 14th July, 1832, and the 2d of March, 1833. This last act, though proposing a reduction of duty, contains some provisions to take effect in 1842, which will probably be repealed. To exact cash duties, and to deny to our foreign trade the privilege of deposit, is a policy which has never yet been introduced into any other civilized commercial country; and to assess the duty on the market value of foreign merchandise, at every port in the United States, would give us as many rates of duty as we have ports, in direct violation of the constitution. But the committee do not propose to anticipate the discussion of these questions, or any of the provisions of the act of 1833, which do not interfere with the proposed reduction of the revenue. They deem it, however, important to examine the principle of the compromise act, and to expose its unjust operation, at this time.

The modern innovation upon our ancient plan of levying duties on foreign merchandise generally, by collecting our revenue exclusively from that portion which comes in competition with our own industry, reverses the whole design of the constitution, which certainly contemplated that our taxes for federal purposes should be levied in a ratio to representation as nearly as it was practicable.

The previous acts, repealing duties on non-protected articles, and the act of March, 1833, are calculated to make our taxes as unequal as possible. There is a wide difference between the operation of a tariff on merchandise similar to our own and on that which is exclusively foreign. When we collect twenty millions on the latter, the duties are general through the Union, and the price of no corresponding commodity at home is raised by it. The tariff operates as a tax to that extent, and no further; and the whole amount goes into the Treasury, for the support of Government. No man gains any advantage over another, and no State is made tributary to any capitalist or corporation. But when twenty millions are collected on protected articles, the tax indirectly extends to the whole mass of our own productions and manufactures, which are raised in price, and a much greater amount is levied upon the consumers of the country, in addition to the twenty millions for the support of Government. In 1835, the merchandise imported for consumption, liable to duty, deducting the value exported, amounted to about sixty-six millions, and yielded a duty of twenty millions. The value of similar merchandise of domestic origin, in that year, may be estimated at about two hundred and fifty millions. Some of these branches, especially those beyond the mountains, are not so much affected by our duties; but the prices of far the largest proportion are regulated in a great measure by the tax we impose. Assuming that articles of the value of only one hundred and fifty millions were so affected, and to the extent of twenty-five per cent.; which is less than the actual duty on imported merchandise, the internal tax on the consumers in 1835 amounted to thirty-seven millions five hundred thousand dollars, in addition to the twenty millions which went into the Treasury. It is impossible to ascertain what amount of tax these protected branches of industry have for their own profit, and to pay the difference between American and European labor, thus indirectly collected from the consumers since 1789. But we know that the latter have paid on foreign merchandise, from 1789 to 1836, inclusive, (A) more than six hundred and eighty-two millions of dollars, besides probably thirty millions for the expenses of collection. More than one half of this aggregate has been levied on protected articles. Although we cannot ascertain the amount of this internal tax upon the consumers for the last forty-eight years, we can form some estimate of it in late years. At the manufacturers' convention in New York, in 1831, they estimated the annual product of that industry, omitting some branches, at more than two hundred millions. From their great and uninterrupted prosperity since then, the annual value of their products at the present time ought probably to be estimated at three hundred millions. If the larger proportion of this amount is not raised in value by duties on foreign merchandise, then are they, as protecting duties, wholly inoperative and unnecessary. This indirect tax upon the consumption of our own productions cannot be estimated at less than twice the amount of duty collected on similar foreign merchandise, or forty millions annually.

The prices of protected produce and manufactures, at home and abroad, are regulated by the industry of those countries where labor is uniformly cheaper than it is in the United States. Until our population resembles that of Europe, and our climate is as genial as that of the sugar islands, our consumers must pay, for both foreign and domestic merchandise, a price equal to the cost abroad, the charges of importation, the duty, and the merchants' profit upon all. How much the aggregate of all these amount to, in the progress of near half a century, it is impossible to calculate. We know, however, that one of the items amounts to more than three hundred and fifty millions of dollars; and the princely establishments scattered over the United States, and the fact that the annual produce of their industry may be estimated at three hundred millions of dollars, afford ample evidence that other treasuries than that of the Government have drawn a much larger amount from the labor of the consumers.

Such is the operation of those protecting duties, which it is proposed to continue, for the purpose of dividing our surplus revenue hereafter. Such the system of taxation which the compromise act, as it is called, makes perpetual in a confederacy of States, three fourths of which are not engaged to any extent in these protected branches of industry. According to the provisions and indirect operation of that act, we must levy sixty millions annually upon the consumption of the country, in order to collect twenty for the use of Government. The entire population of most, and a large majority of all the States, must be forever compelled, by our laws, to sustain immense and powerful establishments, which are overshadowing all other branches of industry, while our privileged capitalists and corporations are alone to be, in effect, exempt from taxation, well satisfied with a reciprocity of duties, so long as they are ultimately indemnified by an indirect tax upon the other interests of the country.

In other countries, with a crowded population and a consolidated Government, this system is less expensive, though manifestly unjust and impolitic, wherever it is adopted. But whatever may be its operation elsewhere, it is wholly inconsistent with the equal, just, and free basis of our institutions, and can never be perpetuated in a confederacy of States, spread over a vast continent, differing in employments, interests, soil, and climate.

It is impossible to make a protecting tax equal among the States. It is, as such, wholly inconsistent with the constitutional and political rights of the members of our confederacy. We cannot permanently make twenty of the States of the Union tributary, not to the other six, but to a small portion of their population. The produce of the labor of one State should, by law, enjoy no advantages over the produce of labor in another, whatever may be the character of its industry; nor should the foreign trade of any one State in the Union be restricted, except from political necessity.

The commerce of a confederacy, internal and external, should be wholly free. The manufactures of Europe, as well as of the United States, require the produce of our agriculture, and we have no constitutional right to restrict the mutual exchange of our commodities exclusively for the purpose of increasing the profits of individuals in other States. The planter of the South and the farmer of the interior or of the West cannot be effectually and perpetually compelled by our laws to purchase his supplies from the manufacturer or producer in some distant State, on terms which give the latter an advantage of thirty, forty, or fifty per cent., and in some instances more. This plan of taxation is unjust in any form and to any extent; but to collect, as is proposed, millions beyond the wants of Government, merely for the purpose of distribution, would render its inequality and oppression intolerable.

These protecting duties can be no longer defended as temporary taxes upon consumption, for which the country will be indemnified by a cheap and abundant supply of domestic produce and manufactures. It will be seen, by examining the statement B, how utterly fallacious have been all such predictions and speculations, from the date of the report of our first Secretary of the Treasury, in 1790, down to the present day. That statement exhibits the quantity and value of the most important protected merchandise imported in fifteen years, to September, 1835, and some for the year ending 30th June last.

Previous to 1821, our laws did not require regular returns, and little reliance can be placed on estimates. So far from redeeming the pledges, so repeatedly given to the country, that foreign merchandise would be excluded, our importations have always been and are now steadily increasing, and almost uniformly in a ratio even greater than our rapid increase of population. Our manufactures, however prosperous, cannot more than keep pace with the growth of the country, so long as our boundaries of settlement continue to be enlarged, and our agricultural population spreads in the South and West. We have never had an adequate supply of labor, and even that is comparatively diminishing, as the spirit and facility of emigration increase and the theatre of settlement enlarges. Such is the existing demand for labor for our modern improvements and enlarged industry—for our mines, factories, railroads, and canals—that we can scarce procure sufficient to cultivate the soil. Besides, so long as we supply all Europe with raw materials, and our exports continue to increase, as they will do, we must take her manufactures in return. While peace continues, nations will exchange their surplus productions; and that commerce will constantly increase, in defiance of all our revenue laws. The consumers of this country can expect no relief from the protecting system till this continent shall have become settled, and a dense and impoverished population reduces the price of labor to the European standard. Till then, they must pay an annual tribute of millions, to add to the number, wealth, and power, of our capitalists and corporations.

Statement B gives the importations for each year ending the 30th September, from 1821 to 1835. The returns are not complete for 1836, though a few are stated for the year ending the 30th June last. The aggregate imports for that year, including coin and bullion, were $185,631,410. Had the importations for 1836 been taken into the comparison, a much larger increase would have been exhibited; but the trade of that year was augmented by extraordinary causes, and is therefore excluded. The comparison made is between the seven years ending in 1821 and in 1835, the first and the last seven of the fifteen years. The real increase is much larger than the apparent, in consequence of constant improvements in machinery and the competition among nations. The value of imports at the present day represents, in many instances, more than double the quantity the same amount would have represented twenty years ago.

In the last seven years, to 1835, the average increase over the first seven—that is, in seven years—is, on the following articles, viz:

Brass manufactures	-	-	-	26 per cent.
Glass ware	-	-	-	60
China ware	-	-	-	150
Earthen and stone ware	-	-	-	25
Steel	-	-	-	87

Leather manufactures, the last five over the first five years, from 1826 to 1835 62½

The only article the importation of which has not increased is hemp; and for the very unsatisfactory reason, that the laws of other countries are more friendly to our navigation than our own, and our ships are supplied abroad.

Woolen manufactures.—Stuff goods have been admitted free of duty for three years past. Other manufactures of wool have been protected by a high duty; and, more effectually to diminish importations, cash duties are exacted, to take effect from the date of importation. The aggregate increase of worsted and woollens is, in the last, over the first seven years, about $1,700,000, being 22 per cent. in seven years. The greatest amount imported in any one year of the first seven was $11,752,595, and in the last $16,881,557; being $4,000,000 more than had been imported in any one year since these returns were ordered. If the quantities, instead of the values, could be compared, it would exhibit a greater increase. The worsted goods imported in the year ending the 30th of June, 1836, amounted to $7,099,370; woollens, $13,614,643—making an aggregate of $20,714,013.

Cotton manufactures.—This branch was protected by a heavy square-yard duty in 1816, which has been subsequently increased. The average increase annually in the last over the first seven years is more than a million. The highest amount imported in any one of the first seven years was $12,509,516; in the last, $16,090,224. The first year of the sixteen was $7,788,514, and the last $15,367,585. When it is considered how much the price of this fabric has been reduced in every country in the last twenty years, and that the same value now generally represents twice the quantity it did formerly, some idea may be formed of the immense increase in this branch of our importations. The amount imported in the year ending the 30th June last was $18,927,250.

Iron and steel manufactures.—By adopting specific rates of duty on many of these manufactures, the consumers are taxed much more heavily than they are aware of; besides which, the heavy charges of transportation give our own manufactures a great advantage. The importations, notwithstanding, have increased very rapidly. The aggregate amount imported in the first seven years was $19,141,183; in the last, $27,824,141; being an increase in seven years of 45 per cent. The highest annual importation in the first term was $3,525,433; in the last, $4,827,461; and in the first year of the sixteen, $1,630,129; in the last, $4,827,461. The amount imported in the year ending the 30th June last was $7,717,910.

Bar iron.—The aggregate quantity imported in the first seven years was 3,998,021, and in the last 7,106,381 hundred weight, or about 200,000 tons in the former period, and 355,000 tons in the latter; being an increase of 77½ per cent. in seven years. The consumption of iron was rapidly increasing in every country, owing to the application of it to a variety of new purposes. But another and much more important source of consumption has recently grown out of the improvement in railroads, which promises to give ample employment, for years to come, to iron works at home and abroad. The demand for this new use cannot even be now supplied, and the price of railroad iron has consequently risen very considerably. By devoting labor to this new and increasing branch of the iron manufacture, other branches have advanced in price. Although our ironmasters find the latter more profitable than railroad iron, the British, by going largely into this new branch, have given an impulse to all others in every country. There will undoubtedly be a rapid increase of railroads in Europe and America, which must very much enlarge the demand. Whatever may have been the motives, heretofore, for imposing a protecting duty, none is now required; for this modern improvement has created a market for it which affords it a protection far more permanent and effectual than thrice the amount of our existing duty. As a protection, our duty is rendered wholly abortive; for all the ironmasters of Europe and America cannot, taking a series of years together, supply the demand for railroads and all other purposes.

Sugar.—This is also charged with a specific duty equal to sixty or seventy per cent. on the estimated cost of production abroad. The aggregate quantity imported in the first seven years of the statement was 536,363,592 pounds, and in the last 664,371,508 pounds, being an increase of about 24 per cent. in seven years. The highest importation in the first term was 94,378,814, and in the last 126,039,239 pounds. The importation of molasses has also increased near 20 per cent. in seven years. The greatest quantity imported in the first seven years was 13,843,045, and in the last 18,971,603 gallons. The culture of sugar is very uncertain in our climate. If the estimate made by the convention in New York be correct, there has been no increase in this branch since 1831. They estimated the crop at 40,000 hogsheads in 1823, and at 100,000 in 1831. The crop of the present year has been estimated at 90,000, but, in consequence of an early frost, it is said, will not produce over 75,000 hogsheads. Since the acquisition of Louisiana, the consumers have paid about $76,000,000, for the protecting duty on sugar and molasses, besides about $30,000,000, probably, in the increased price of our domestic sugar. The quantity imported in the year ending the 30th of June last was 174,607,506 pounds.

Salt.—The duty on salt was first laid by the tariff of 1789, was afterwards increased, but subsequently repealed by the act of the 3d of March, 1807, when we had an overflowing Treasury. It was renewed during the war, as a war duty. The aggregate quantity imported in the first seven years of the fifteen was 32,019,575, and in the last, 38,779,371 bushels; being an increase of about twenty-one per cent. in seven years. Salt has been protected from 1789 to the present time; for although the duty was repealed from 1808 to 1814, our embargo, other restrictions, and war, were much more efficient than the duty. After near half a century, we import about as much as is manufactured in the United States, even including those establishments in the interior with which foreign salt cannot interfere.

Coal.—The duty on coal commenced with the tariff of 1789, at two cents a bushel. The statement referred to exhibits the importation of coal for fifteen years. The aggregate quantity imported in the first seven years was 6,038,027, and in the last, 12,251,642 bushels; being an increase of more than one hundred per cent. in seven years. It is not practicable to obtain a statement of the produce of all the mines in the United States; but it will be sufficient to show the immense increase in the consumption of coal, by referring to the progress of three mines of anthracite coal. The annual produce, in 1820, was 365, and in 1836, 682,429 tons. The increase of all the mines in the same neighborhood, for the present year, is estimated at 250,000 tons. While our importations of foreign coal have increased in seven years, ending in September, 1835, over the seven years ending in 1827, more than one hundred per cent., a new branch of the coal trade has grown up from nothing to 682,429 tons. The whole amount of coal imported in 1821 was but 17,000 tons; and in 1836 it was about 60,000, and has been more. The increased consumption in these branches alone—but a small proportion of the coal trade of the United States—since 1820, is from about 17,000 to 750,000 tons; and, as a writer in defence of the coal duty informs us, we are in the present year to add 250,000, making a million of tons. Without this, however, the consumption in these branches has increased to forty-four times the quantity consumed sixteen years ago. It is very evident that our coal companies have a much more powerful protection than any which the duty affords them. Causes far more effectual and controlling than all our revenue laws have, within a few years, created an extraordinary demand for coal, which must increase permanently. The destruction of our forests, the increase of our population, and the enlarged application of coal to manufacturing and other purposes, must enable the producers, taking a series of years together, not only to regulate the quantity, but the price of this commodity. With such evidence of the rapid and permanent increase of the consumption of coal, the continuance of the duty as a protection cannot be justified. The whole duty in 1835 was but about $100,000; and although that imported now is more than three times the quantity in 1821, the whole does not equal twice the annual consumption of the town of Wheeling, in Virginia. The statement below, though relating to other countries, will show the immense product of coal, and its various uses, and proves how utterly insignificant our importation of 60,000 tons is, when compared with the aggregate consumption of the United States. The following is the estimated annual produce of the coal mines in England and Wales, under the different heads of consumption:

By the population	-	-	20,804,570 tons.
Iron furnaces	-	-	3,000,000
Manufactories	-	-	4,550,000
Steamboats	-	-	3,000,000
Exported	-	-	615,925
Total	-	-	31,970,495

Wheat.—A duty of 25 cents a bushel was imposed on wheat in 1824. Notice is taken of this item in this report, merely for the purpose of proving its insignificance as a protecting duty. It is an insult to the agricultural interest to attach any importance to it as a measure of protection. Statement D shows that the whole quantity of wheat imported into all our Atlantic ports, from the time the duty was laid, in 1824, to the 30th of September, 1835, embracing a term of eleven years, was but 4,832 bushels—about 440 bushels a year. Notwithstanding the extraordinary state of trade, and the display made about Black sea, Baltic, and German wheat, during 1836, the whole quantity imported in the year ending the 30th September last, at all the ports on the seaboard, (except the third quarter of the year, at Boston,) was but 317,883 bushels, paying less than $80,000 duty. In an agricultural country like this, remote as it is from other grain-growing countries, our farmers have nothing to apprehend from importations. There are but two causes that can bring wheat from abroad: a failure of crops, when importations would be desired by all; and the occasional recurrence of a redundant currency.

The importations of wheat in 1836 were not owing to the former cause. Although our crops have partially failed in some of the States, there is no famine, and the deficiency is not the sole cause of the present high price. We have had a redundant currency, which encouraged speculation, and raised the prices of commodities generally so high as to produce importations in 1836, without regard to the actual wants of the country. A sudden and large addition to our metallic and paper currency has made us importers of wheat; and had it been practicable, the same cause might have made us importers of the soil which produced it.

The duty on wheat is of no consequence in our trade with Europe, or any other branch of our commerce abroad. By referring to the table D, it will be seen that its operation is almost entirely confined to our Canadian frontier. But even there, the importations were of very little consequence till 1835; then the duty did not amount to sixty thousand dollars, and the imports for 1836 were not half the quantity. The duty on wheat operates very injuriously on our trade with Upper Canada. When it was laid, in 1824, we were the millers and exporters of the Canadians. By imposing a duty of twenty-five cents, and refusing the drawback on exportation on that frontier, we have destroyed this branch of trade, as far as the law could be executed. That, however, could not be effected on the St. Lawrence and the Niagara. The most serious objection to this duty is, that it enables the British Government to carry out a policy which it wisely adopted some years ago. The produce of the United States is not only admitted into Canada free of duty, but enjoys all the advantages of Canadian produce in the consumption of Great Britain. She thus secures the carrying of our produce, while we, by our own laws, deny ourselves the profit of exporting the produce of Upper Canada, and of furnishing that country with supplies. We force trade through the St. Lawrence, instead of encouraging it through our canals, rivers, and lakes; into which channels it would have long since flowed, but for our own laws. Such is the whole operation of our duty on wheat; it affords no protection whatever to agriculture, while, with the aid of other laws equally unwise, it almost destroys our commerce with Upper Canada, and increases the navigation of Great Britain.

Such is the present condition and the operation of protecting duties on some of the most prominent branches of our industry. The enlargement and the prosperity of our manufactures, and the existence of these duties for near half a century, no longer warrant a continuance of these heavy charges upon the consumption of the country, under the pretended necessity of sustaining against foreign competition capitalists and corporations, the annual produce of whose mines, factories, and plantations, is estimated at three hundred millions of dollars. The agricultural and commercial interests might, with more justice, claim the protection of Government; and, as an indemnity for the sacrifices of half a century, ask for a tax upon that capital, nineteen twentieths of which has been drawn from their labor. With a surplus of fifty millions in money and stock, and an income from customs and public lands beyond the wants of Government, they have at least a right to demand that the whole burden of supporting Government, and sustaining our capitalists and corporations, should not be thrown upon them. If our protected industry, great, growing, and profitable as it is, cannot now protect itself, it never will; and it is time for every consumer to determine whether he will submit to perpetual taxation for any such purpose. The statements appended to this report prove conclusively, that notwithstanding the extraordinary increase of our own manufactures, our supplies from abroad, through natural and uncontrollable causes, are constantly increasing. We cannot apologize for the continuance of these taxes, by holding out any prospect of relief, now or hereafter. It is time, therefore, that the system, as such, should be gradually reformed; that all branches of our industry should be placed on the same footing; and that our taxes should give no advantage to one man over another. No State nor section of this confederacy should hereafter be made permanently tributary to another by the operation of our revenue laws.

Unequal and unjust as our taxes are, it is not proposed to remove them in a mode which might shock any branch of industry. The immense increase of the consumption of coal, and the comparatively insignificant quantity imported from abroad, clearly show that the prosperity of this branch is wholly independent of the duty. It is required neither for protection nor revenue, and the committee recommend its repeal. They also propose to repeal the duty remaining on salt; one half was repealed by the act of July 14, 1832, without destroying our salt works, as was predicted; and the remainder may be taken off, with little injury to them and great benefit to the country. Such a tax ought not to be continued with an overflowing Treasury. The committee further recommend a general reduction of our imposts, to the extent of seven millions. For the reasons stated in this report, they have not endeavored to select articles which would not affect our industry; the duties upon all these, of any importance whatever, have already been repealed. Nor were they disposed to repeal the duties upon articles paying a less duty than twenty per cent., while other branches of industry, with no higher claims, were protected by duties of 30, 50, and upwards of 100 per cent. So long as the principle of protection is continued, justice requires that they should at least be equalised. That is the basis of the adjustment in the act of the 2d March, 1833. By that act, all duties over twenty per cent. were to be gradually abolished. The committee propose the same measure, but recommend a different process of reduction. By the tariff of 1833, the excess of duties over 20 per cent. was to be reduced one tenth on the 31st of December, 1833; one tenth the 31st of December, 1835; one tenth the 31st of December, 1837; and one tenth the 31st of December, 1839; the remainder of the excess was to be taken off, one half on the 31st of December, 1841, and the other on the 30th of June, 1842. Of these, the first two reductions have already been made. In estimating the excess for future years, 1834 is considered a better criterion than 1835 or 1836, when the importations were unusually large. The excess of duty on the gross revenue accruing in the year ending the 30th September, 1834, (see statement E,) was $9,400,000; from this is to be deducted the drawback on the quantity exported, which would probably leave the excess of duty over 20 per cent. on the quantity remaining for consumption at seven millions. Assuming that as the net excess, and that the same amount of importations should continue till 1842, the following would be the prospective operation of the act of the 2d March, 1833:

Excess	$7,000,000
Deduct one tenth 31st Dec. 1837	700,000
	6,300,000
Deduct one tenth 31st Dec. 1839	630,000
	5,670,000
Deduct one half 31st Dec. 1841	2,835,000
	2,835,000
Deduct one half 30th June, 1842	2,835,000

Thus the act proposes to reduce the excess 1,330,000 dollars in five years, and 5,670,000 dollars in six months. If the state of our finances did not oblige us to anticipate this reduction of our revenue, motives of policy should induce us to change this extraordinary and unequal process of reduction. With a foreign trade constantly and permanently increasing, our manufactures will be as much affected in 1842 as they will be in 1838. If they can, as is proposed, stand a reduction of near six millions of this excess in six months, they will certainly be little affected by taking off the third of seven millions every six for eighteen months. The committee, therefore, propose that one third of the excess should be reduced on the 30th September next; one half of the remainder on the 31st of March, 1838; and the other half on the 30th September, 1838. Assuming an excess of seven millions, the reduction would be, viz:

	$7,000,000
One third, September 30, 1837	2,333,333
	4,666,667
One half, March 31, 1838	2,333,333
One half, September 30 1838	2,333,333

Such a reduction would increase and diminish with the rise and fall of importations, and could not materially affect these branches of industry, producing annually, as is estimated, three hundred millions, and distributed, as this reduction would be, among them all. Besides, even after these high duties are reduced to twenty per cent., they will still, with the charges of importation, cash duties, and short credits, enjoy a protection of forty to fifty per cent., and on heavy and cheap merchandise much more. As to the proprietors of our salt works, iron works, and coal mines beyond the mountains, our imposts do not affect them, as they enjoy a natural monopoly, and regulate both the price and the quantity of their productions.

It is the vice of our plan of levying taxes for the support of Government, that we can make no change in our revenue laws without affecting some interest. In the progress of our legislation, and of our intercourse with foreign nations for the last half century, with our tariffs, embargoes, non-intercourse, and war, the burden and sacrifices have fallen on the non-protected, the profits on the protected, branches of our industry. A period has arrived when a measure of an opposite character is demanded by the highest considerations. It is the duty of all interests to yield to the paramount necessity of reducing the revenue of the United States to the wants of the Government; and the committee report a bill for that purpose.

SPECIE CIRCULAR.

Circular from the Secretary of the Treasury to Receivers of Public Money and to the Deposit Banks.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

July 11, 1836.

In consequence of complaints which have been made of frauds, speculations, and monopolies, in the purchase of the public lands, and the aid which is said to be given to effect these objects by excessive bank credits, and dangerous if not partial facilities, through bank drafts and bank deposits, and the general evil influence likely to result to the public interests, and especially the safety of the great amount of money in the Treasury, and the sound condition of the currency of the country from the further exchange of the national domain in this manner, and chiefly for bank credits and paper money, the President of the United States has given directions, and you are hereby instructed, after the 15th day of August next, to receive in payment of the public lands nothing except what is directed by the existing laws, viz: gold and silver, and, in the proper cases, Virginia land scrip; provided that, till the 15th of December next, the same indulgences heretofore extended, as to the kind of money received, may be continued for any quantity of land not exceeding 320 acres to each purchaser who is an actual settler, or bonafide resident in the State where the sales are made.

In order to insure the faithful execution of these instructions, all receivers are strictly prohibited from accepting, for land sold, any draft, certificate, or other evidence of money, or deposits, though for specie, unless signed by the Treasurer of the United States, in conformity to the act of April 24, 1820. And each of those officers is required to annex to his monthly returns to this Department the amount of gold and of silver, respectively, as well as the bills, received under the foregoing exception; and each deposit bank is required to annex to every certificate given upon a deposit of money, the proportions of it actually paid in gold, in silver, and in bank notes. All former instructions on these subjects, except as now modified, will be considered as remaining in full force.

The principal objects of the President in adopting this measure being to repress alleged frauds, and to withhold any countenance or facilities in the power of the Government from the monopoly of the public lands in the hands of speculators and capitalists, to the injury of the actual settlers in the new States, and of emigrants in search of new homes, as well as to discourage the ruinous extension of bank issues and bank credits, by which those results are generally supposed to be promoted, your utmost vigilance is required, and relied on, to carry this order into complete execution.

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

APPORTIONMENT OF THE SURPLUS.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
January 3, 1837.

SIR: I seize the earliest occasion to inform Congress of the measures adopted by this Department since the 1st instant, in compliance with the 13th section of the act regulating "the deposits of the public money."

The balance in the Treasury on that day, which was subject to be apportioned among the different States, has, on the principles of the act, as construed by the Attorney General, and explained in my last annual report, been ascertained to be $37,468,859 97.

The division of this sum, in detail, among the several States, may be seen in the document annexed, and, including Michigan, equals $127,445 10 to each electoral vote.

In consequence of the proceedings of the last convention in Michigan, and the views expressed concerning them by the President of the United States, in his recent message communicating those proceedings to Congress, together with the provisions of the bill now pending in one House on this question, the Department has supposed her situation so far changed since November as to justify the assignment to her of a share of the public deposits, subject, however, entirely to the future decision of Congress upon the propriety of this step.

The payment of the share assigned to Michigan will, therefore, be postponed till some expression of opinion shall be given by Congress, which may either sanction its being made to her in the same manner as to the other States, or require its division among the other States in addition to the sums which have already been apportioned to them.

Twelve of the States have communicated their acceptance of the terms of the act, and accordingly transfers, equal in amount to the first quarterly deposits required under the law, are now issuing in favor of their respective agents. Which is respectfully submitted.

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

CLAIM OF UNITED STATES ON U. S. BANK.

Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the subject of the claim of the United States against the United States Bank, &c.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

January 30, 1837.

SIR: In conformity with the suggestion contained in my last annual report, I proceed to submit a statement of the further proceedings which have been had for a settlement of the claims of the United States against the Bank of the United States chartered by Congress.

At that time, this Department flattered itself with hopes that the gentlemen engaged in this business, on the part of the Government, would be able to induce the committee, acting on the part of the bank, to agree with them as to the value of the stock owned by the United States on the 3d of March last, as well as the proper periods for paying into the Treasury what was then due the United States, on account of its large share in the capital stock of the bank, with the rate of interest and kind of security proper under all the circumstances of the case.

But it is greatly to be regretted that these hopes have been disappointed.

The detailed report of the agents or commissioners appointed by this Department, with the documents annexed, is herewith submitted to Congress. It presents a clear and succinct history of the efforts made by them, first to procure a payment in part of the amount due to the United States before the 1st of January, 1837, (the just extent of which they considered to have been about four millions of dollars,) and afterwards to be continued by payments in such other instalments, at subsequent periods, as the collections and assets of the bank might appear to justify. But, as will be seen, the payment of any sum whatever, in 1836, was declined by the bank. The alleged grounds on which the refusal rested, with the opinions of the commissioners as to their insufficiency, are fully exhibited in the documents before named.

The efforts which were next made to agree with the committee of the bank, as to the actual value of its stock on the 3d of March, 1836, with a view to a settlement on the basis of that value, it will be further seen, have proved altogether ineffectual.

The first committee appointed by the bank had estimated the value at only \$111 47 $\frac{1801}{10000}$ per share.

But errors were discovered in their statements and estimates, which induced the second committee of the bank to agree to raise the valuation to $111 87 per share.

The commissioners on the part of the Government, however, were satisfied that, upon the materials furnished by the bank, and on the data and reasoning which they have so ably presented in their report, the true valuation ought to be at least $118 53 per share.

Taking former estimates, as exhibited on other occasions by the bank itself, with the subsequent profits, the value would now be computed to equal $130 per share.

This latter sum would be higher than the views of the present committee of the bank, by an amount on the stock of the United States alone, of more than $1,000,000; and exceeds the sum which the commissioners proposed to accept, on the part of the United States, quite $788,585. The commissioners also differ from the present committee as to the whole value of the stock of the United States, nearly $242,000, independent of the claim about the dividends withheld on account of the bill of exchange drawn on France.

Under such a disparity of opinions, little prospect of an amicable arrangement seemed to remain, though further efforts were made to effect one, by propositions to extend the time of payment by several instalments; and to fix the interest at a lower and different rate from that which had been allowed to the bank itself, in computing the value of its own securities, and much lower than any market rate of interest in this country at the present period. The bank itself, in selling out its branches some time since, had never given credit at so low a rate; and paid, in addition, commissions for collection and guaranty, as was proposed to be done in the present instance by the United States. The committee of the bank evinced a willingness to allow a larger amount upon each share, approaching the sum fixed by the commissioners, if the payments were long delayed, and the rate of interest was reduced from six to five per cent.; while the commissioners contended, and justly, that if the rate of interest was reduced, the gross value of each share should be increased still further, or any commissions for collection and guaranty should be relinquished, as had been required by the bank itself to be done in the sales of its branches.

Being unable to arrive at any conclusion mutually satisfactory, in which the value of the shares to be paid by instalments with 6 per cent. interest did not differ from the offers made by the committee of the bank by about $242,000 upon the amount of the stock held by the United States, besides the dividends withheld, and not being willing to recommend so large a sacrifice as that, the commissioners have reported the result of their whole proceedings to this Department.

For the reasons assigned by the commissioners, in connexion with their high character and capacity for forming a correct opinion on this subject, and considering the thorough investigation which they have made of all the facts and principles of the case, this Department feels no hesitancy in approving the course they have pursued and the opinions they have expressed.

Anxious as this Department has been to obtain early payments in part of the amount due from the bank, and, after failing in that, to obtain specific offers for an arrangement which might be just to the United States, and, at the same time, not hard or embarrassing towards the bank, the undersigned feels much disappointment that no further prospect appears of being able to effect any adjustment with the bank, which shall not require the relinquishment of either principal or interest, amounting to something like $242,000, besides four fifths of the dividends withheld by the bank on account of the bill of exchange on the French Government, equal to about $136,000 more.

It is much regretted that neither the bank nor its trustee has yet communicated the information which this Department has twice requested under the act of Congress passed at the last session, in order that the Government might be better enabled to decide upon the true value of the stock, as well as what portion ought, before this time, to have been paid over to the United States, and to know the manner in which the trust has been conducted in relation to the assets, in which the Government is so deeply interested. The difficulties in making a satisfactory estimate have been increased by the course adopted by the bank, in not closing its concerns on the 3d of March last, at the expiration of its charter, in the customary manner; or, at least, in not requiring new books and accounts to be opened by its trustee, and in not retaining or cancelling its redeemed circulation, instead of reissuing it after the transactions of the bank chartered by Congress had ceased, and those owning one fifth part of its whole stock had been expressly excluded from any participation in the new corporation, to which its assets had been transferred.

Under these circumstances, without going into further details, this Department would respectfully represent to Congress, that, under the act of the 23d June last, relating to this subject, every step has been promptly taken which seemed to bid fair to obtain offers and estimates, as well as the necessary information for acting on them, which might lead to an amicable adjustment of all the claims of the United States. But the probabilities of effecting any such adjustment, without the loss or sacrifice of nearly $378,000, have ceased; and, without the express direction of Congress, after the consideration of the facts and inferences contained in the report of the commissioners and the accompanying documents, it does not feel justified in acceding hereafter to any adjustment materially different in principle or amount from that recommended by them.

Unless, therefore, Congress shall think proper to give some direction, or the bank at an early day make some such offer, this Department can perceive no other course to be pursued, with justice to the United States, or consistent with its public duty, except to place the whole subject in charge of the proper officers of the Government, for prosecuting the public rights before the proper legal tribunals, with respect to the matters in controversy and the several claims existing against the bank.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

HON. JAMES K. POLK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Report on the debts and effects of the Bank of the United States, and the value of its capital stock on the 3d March, 1836.

WASHINGTON, January 25, 1837.

SIR: In pursuance of your letter of the 21st September, 1836, (see Appendix, No. 8,) enclosing the report of the joint committees of the late and present Bank of the United States, relative to the debts and effects of the bank on the 3d March, 1836, and requesting us to examine the materials on which that report is founded, and to make inquiry on the additional topics pointed out by you, the undersigned, and Mr. Lawrence, of New York, assembled in Philadelphia on the 30th of that month. Mr. Lawrence continued to act with us until the 1st November, when he conceived it expedient, in reference to his nomination as an elector of President and Vice President of the United States, to relinquish the present appointment.

On the 1st October we were met by Messrs. Caleb Cope, Richard Price, and Robert Toland, a committee on behalf of the bank. We informed them that, in conformity with the suggestions of the Secretary of the Treasury, in his letter of the 19th September, 1836, to the president of the bank, we had been appointed to make the investigation therein referred to, so as to arrive at the proper basis of a settlement between the Government and the bank; and that we were desirous, after mutual consultation, to agree, if practicable, in one view of the subject, or of any important parts of it, and report to the Department accordingly. This letter, and the correspondence accompanying it, (Appendix, Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7,) were read at our first meeting, in order that the views entertained by the Treasury Department, and the nature, character, and extent of the inquiries which it was contemplated mutually to make, might be fully understood at the outset.

In pursuing this object, it was considered proper, in the first place, to examine the details of the statement furnished of the debts and effects of the bank on the 3d March, 1836, in order to know, as far as could be, the actual amount of its property and its liabilities on that day; in the second place, to ascertain how much of that property had been since collected, and what portion of those liabilities had been since paid; and, in the third place, to determine whether it would be most expedient that periodical payments on the share of the United States should be made to the Treasury, to the extent of the nett collections which had accrued since the 3d March, and might in future accrue; or that a specific amount should be fixed upon as the estimated value of the whole property on that day, with an arrangement for the payment of the share of the United States in such proportions, at such future times, on such rates of interest, and with such security, as might be agreed on.

In this course the committee acquiesced; and, for the purpose of pursuing it, several conferences took place between us at the Bank of the United States, where the books and papers were submitted to our inspection, and the aid of the officers of the institution was afforded. On those points of inquiry about which information could not be furnished at the time, a memorandum was left with the committee, and replies were subsequently communicated. (Appendix, No. 13.)

1. In proceeding to examine the report, we compared the state of the bank on which that report had been founded, (Appendix, No. 35,) with the balances of the accounts on the general ledger, and with the several office statements which had been selected by the committee on the part of the bank, in forming the report, on account, as they alleged, of their proximity to the 3d March. The latest semi-annual estimates of losses on suspended debt, on real estate, and upon banking-houses, made up at the bank and at its offices, were submitted to our inspection; and, also, some of the previous periodical returns, for the satisfaction of a comparative view. After this investigation, we found ourselves under the necessity of applying for various explanations of matter of account, which were furnished to us by the committee and the officers of the bank. They form part of the documents annexed to this report. It will be seen that they present a number of errors, to amounts of considerable magnitude, in the accounts of suspended debts, real estate, losses chargeable to the contingent fund, and in relation to the banking-houses. (Appendix, Nos. 27, 28, 43, 44, 45.) We are not, however, aware that these errors materially affect the value of the stock, except in the account of banking-houses, which will be afterwards adverted to.

2. At a very early period of our investigations, it became apparent to us that the principal object of our inquiry ought to be to ascertain accurately how much of the effects of the bank, on the 3d March, 1836, had been since that time actually realized, and how much of its liabilities paid. As a period of seven months had elapsed since that day, it was evident that an accurate knowledge of the amount which must have been, and had been actually, collected out of personal securities, domestic bills, and other assets on hand at the expiration of the charter, and immediately or shortly available; of the deposits then held by the bank, which had been since paid; of the notes then in circulation, which had been since redeemed; of the expenses that had been since incurred; and of any other claims which had been since actually paid by the institution, would have exhibited, in the plainest and simplest manner, the proportional share of the funds collected, which ought to be paid into the Treasury.

Of the total amount of assets on that day, being $76,570,393 08, it appears that $5,595,077 25 consisted of specie on hand; $7,188,181 80 of notes and debts of State banks, which the committee considered as already paid; $5,353,469 43 of notes discounted on bank stock and other securities, which were, of course, immediately available, and about the value of which there could be no doubt; of the residue of the total assets, $33,572,966 46 were bills discounted and domestic bills of exchange, which were considered in the report as falling due, on an average, in forty-four days and a half after the 3d March. To these sums we added $5,436,083 09 of loans drawing interest, in consequence of their being stated, in the report, to be either "payable on demand," or "when due immaterial." (Appendix, Nos. 34, 40.) Thus, of the aggregate assets of the bank, a sum of $57,145,778 03 we consider to be actually due, according to the report of the bank, and a very large proportion of it was evidently of a nature to have been easily collected.

In forming, therefore, the proper basis of a settlement between the Government and the bank, it appeared to us most proper, as a first step, to ascertain the portion of the funds, actually collected, which belonged to the United States. This course, too, seemed to be most in accordance with the views of the Secretary of the Treasury, in his letter to the president of the bank on the 19th September, as well as in the instructions to ourselves, in which he frequently expresses his anxiety for an early payment or dividend on account.

It was our first desire to direct our examination to this object, but the books of the bank did not furnish us with this information. It appeared that the bank had, on the 2d March, made a transfer of all its funds to the Bank of the United States chartered by the State of Pennsylvania. (Appendix, No. 33.) No accounts of the bank were subsequently kept; the old books had never been posted up since the 3d March; the usual monthly statements of its affairs were not made out; and no existing accounts of the institution enabled us to ascertain what amounts of notes and bills belonging to it on that day had been since paid, renewed, or protested. (Appendix, Nos. 18, 20.) Nor was this all: the bank was not in fact closed when its charter terminated; no winding up of its business took place on the 3d March; its accounts were carried on, without interruption, previously and subsequently to that day; and its semi-annual settlement on the 1st July, 1836, embraced the entire transactions from the 1st January preceding, without reference to the change that had occurred in the mean time. We were informed by the committee that it would be possible to trace the business of the bank through the books of the new corporation, to which it had been transferred, though it would require the labor of some months; but as it was apparent that this business had not been wound up, but, on the contrary, had been blended with the affairs of the new institution, such a course, independent of the necessary delay, could not have furnished the requisite information.

Though an exact ascertainment of the sum due at this time was thus rendered impossible, yet a payment of the dividend belonging to the United States, after deducting the disbursements from the receipts of the last seven months, was a preliminary step in our proceedings, so obvious, as well as so much in accordance with the views heretofore communicated by the Secretary of the Treasury to the bank, that we proposed it to the committee, and asked from them a payment into the Treasury, to that extent, at the earliest convenient day. It appeared to us that a sum little short of four millions of dollars might have been paid into the Treasury by the 1st of January, 1837. We have already seen that, of the aggregate assets of the bank, a sum of $57,145,778 03 appeared to be due, according to its own report. By the same document, it will be seen that the total amount of its liabilities on that day amounted to only $29,253,610 27. Of this, the sum of $21,109,352 23 consisted of notes in circulation; $6,220,829 43 of deposits and debts to State banks and foreign bankers; $120,621 87 of funds for the redemption of public debt; and $253,937 43 of dividends unclaimed. These, together, make an aggregate of liabilities, on 3d March, of $27,704,740 96; which, after retaining a sum sufficient to cover the entire amount of the outstanding notes in circulation, deposits, and debts paid or unpaid, would leave a surplus of $29,441,037 07 for distribution. If a further deduction be made of the sum of $1,548,869 31, stated to be due from the bank and its offices to themselves, of which explanation had not then been furnished, and it be included among the actual debts of the bank, there would still be left a surplus of $27,892,167 76. From this surplus we struck off the sum of $7,892,167 76, in order to make the fullest allowance for omissions or mis-calculations, and alleged, as we think most reasonably, that twenty millions of dollars ought to be estimated to have been collected from the assets of the bank in the course of seven months.

Under these circumstances, we thought that the Treasury Department, representing about one fifth of the capital stock of the late bank, was entitled to have received a dividend of nearly four millions of dollars before the 1st January, 1837. But when the nature of the allowances taken into this calculation is considered, when the actual payments and probable collections of the bank since the 3d March are examined, such an expectation is seen to be still more reasonable. In estimating that the surplus on hand should have been $27,892,167 76, the bank was allowed to retain the whole amount of its liabilities, of every kind, although, even supposing the entire amount of its deposits and other debts had been paid, it is yet admitted that $10,573,737 of its circulation and dividends remained unredeemed and unclaimed, and that, therefore, its actual payments since the 3d March were not, by one third, so much as we allowed. On the other hand, in estimating the surplus as we did, we excluded entirely from the receipts of the bank all its collections on account of its suspended debts, real estate, and banking-houses, though these had been considerable during the intervening period, and confined ourselves to those sources which were certain and immediately available. (Appendix, No. 19.)

To have made a payment of four millions, then, on the 1st of January, out of assets of such a nature, would certainly have required no extraordinary rapidity of collection during the interval that had elapsed since the termination of the charter. Out of the seventy-six millions of assets, (estimated by the bank itself, after every allowance for loss, guaranty, and expenses, as worth sixty-eight millions,) it was necessary to collect thirty-eight millions, or fifty per cent.; and, of this thirty-eight millions, the bank had on hand cash, consisting of specie, notes, and debts of State banks, which the committee consider as paid, to the amount of twelve millions eight hundred thousand dollars.

Our impression that such a dividend might have been made, under such circumstances, was strengthened by the fact that the former Bank of the United States paid over to its stockholders seventy per cent. of its capital within fifteen months from the expiration of the charter, besides meeting all the intermediate claims arising from its outstanding liabilities. The case of that institution, too, was one of actual collection and dividend to the whole amount, while in this instance they would have been merely nominal beyond the four millions belonging to the United States, since all the funds, debts, securities, and business of the bank, were transferred to and continued by the new institution.

To our proposal, made under these circumstances, that the bank should make a payment into the Treasury on account, the committee replied, that the aggregate collections since the 3d March had been only $22,727,579 60, including the specie on hand; and as their liabilities, for which they held themselves responsible on demand, amounted to $26,998,606 49, they had only to say that the amount collected not being enough to pay the charges, they had no surplus to divide. (Appendix, No. 20.) The amount stated to be collected did not appear, however, to be presented by the committee as a sum actually ascertained, but as a matter of estimate or calculation. The committee entered into an elaborate argument to show that it would have been impossible, without great hazard, to make collections, since the expiration of the charter, to an amount sufficient to pay any dividend into the Treasury. Our reasons for coming to a different conclusion have been stated: they are founded on the character of the assets and liabilities of the bank, as given in its own report; and the Secretary of the Treasury will be enabled to judge of their force.

3. The committee having finally and explicitly informed us that not enough had been collected, since the expiration of the charter, to pay the charges, and that therefore, as yet, there was no surplus to divide, we were of course obliged to forego our wish to make the actual receipts the bases of settlement, and resort to what alone was left—an examination of the estimated value of the shares of the bank on the 3d of March, 1836. (Appendix, Nos. 21 and 22.)

This value was estimated by the committee, according to the report of the bank, to be $111 47 per share. They estimated the net value of the assets on the 3d of March at $68,268,740 63, and the debts due on that day at $29,253,610 27, leaving a difference of $39,015,130 36; which, divided among the 350,000 shares constituting the capital stock, makes the value of each share, on the 3d of March, $111 47. The whole amount due on the 68,752 shares belonging to the United States was, therefore, estimated at $7,663,909 26. Of this sum, $80,210 67 had already been passed to their credit; leaving to be still paid, or secured to the Government, the further sum of $7,583,698 59.

The estimate thus made on behalf of the bank was founded on the following principles:

The total amount of assets, which was $76,570,393 08, consisted of the following items:

1. Specie	$5,595,077 25
2. Bonds and mortgages	56,037 67
3. Foreign bills of exchange	1,303 95
4. Cash notes of State banks	2,229,947 05
5. Debts of State banks	4,958,234 75
6. Domestic bills of exchange	16,413,144 26
7. Notes discounted on personal security	17,159,822 20
8. Notes discounted on bank stock	1,291,915 72
9. Notes discounted on other securities	4,061,553 71
10. Loans on bank stock	1,761,100 00
11. Loans on other securities	13,222,567 37
12. Debt of navy agent at Norfolk	40,144 17
13. Cost of banking-houses	729,170 58
14. Suspended debt and real estate	4,413,338 80
15. Bad debts, disallowances, and deficiencies	4,470,187 44
16. Expenses	166,803 16
	$76,570,393 08

From this aggregate sum, it was proposed, in the first place, to deduct all those allowances which were considered necessary in order to ascertain the fair and actual value of each of these items on the 3d of March.

It was not proposed to deduct any thing from the specie, bonds and mortgages, foreign bills of exchange, and notes and debts of State banks. From the domestic bills of exchange, and the notes discounted, the committee deducted the discount for the average unexpired time—namely, forty-four days and a half—making, altogether, a sum of $288,704 31. As all the loans on bank stock and other securities drew interest at different rates, and were payable at different times, they added to the principal $152,380 21, the interest which had accrued and was unpaid on the 3d of March, and deducted $296,110 01, being the difference between the amount and the par value of those bearing an interest less than 6 per cent.; so as to make the whole equivalent to a six per cent. loan, with the interest paid up to the 3d of March. The sum thus deducted, being the difference between them, amounted, altogether, to $143,729 80. From the debt of the navy agent at Norfolk they deducted 50 per cent., as the estimated loss thereon, amounting to $20,072 09. From the cost of the banking-houses they deducted, as the estimated loss, $254,513 51. On the suspended debt and other real estate an average deduction has been made, to the amount of $1,389,479 12, founded, as the committee state, on the estimates of the last semi-annual periods, namely, of June and July, 1836, which apply exclusively to debts suspended and real estate acquired before the 3d March, 1836. For the bad debts, disallowances, deficiencies, and expenses, amounting to $4,636,990 60, they claimed a deduction to their whole amount.

It thus appeared that, in order to reduce the assets to what was estimated to be their fair actual value on the 3d of March, exclusive of guaranty and expenses of collection, they proposed a reduction of $6,733,489 43, viz:

Discount for unexpired time	- $288,704 31
Less interest accrued on loans	- 152,380 21
	$136,324 10
Difference between amount and par value of loans, to bring them to 6 per ct. interest	296,110 01
Loss on debt of navy agent	- 20,072 09
Loss on banking-houses	- 254,513 51
Loss on suspended debt and real estate	- 1,389,479 12
Loss on bad debts, &c., and expenses	- 4,636,990 60
	$6,733,489 43

This would leave the actual value of the assets on the 3d of March, $69,836,903 65.

The total amount of the liabilities, which were $29,253,610 27, consisted of the following items:

1. Notes in circulation	$21,109,352 23
2. Dividends unclaimed	253,937 43
3. Debt to foreign bankers	371,777 40
4. Deposit for redemption of public debt	120,621 87
5. Deposits of public officers	203,629 91
6. Deposits of individuals	3,390,418 34
7. Debt to State banks	2,255,003 78
8. Due to the Bank United States and offices in account	1,548,869 31
	$29,253,610 27

Deducting these liabilities from the estimated actual value of the assets, which has been stated above, it leaves the estimated value of the capital stock, independent of expenses and guaranty for the risk of collection, $40,583,293 38.

For these expenses and guaranty, a further deduction has been made in the report of the bank. On the specie, bonds and mortgages, and foreign bills of exchange, no charge was made. For the collection of the cash, notes, and debts of State banks, they deducted a commission of one per cent. on the whole sum, amounting to $71,881 81. For the collection of domestic bills of exchange, and notes discounted on personal security, they deducted two and a half per cent. on the total actual amount, being $839,324 15. For the collection of the notes discounted, and loans on bank stock and other securities, they deducted one per cent. on the total actual amount, being $203,371 36. For the collection of the suspended debts and real estate, they deducted fifteen per cent. on the estimated value which remained after the previous deduction of the estimated loss, being $453,585 70.

It thus appeared that, as an allowance for collecting the amount of assets which remained after all estimated losses were deducted, a further reduction was proposed of $1,568,163 02, viz:

1 per cent. on State bank debts and notes	- $71,881 81
2½ per cent. on domestic bills and notes discounted on personal security	- 839,324 15

1 per cent. on discounts and loans on bank stock and other securities	-	-	$203,371 36
15 per cent. on the estimated value of the suspended debt and real estate	-	-	453,585 70
			$1,568,163 02

This sum, claimed for expenses and risk of collection, being deducted from the value of the capital stock, as above stated, viz: $40,583,293 38, leaves the nett amount for division among the stockholders, on the 3d of March, 1836, $39,015,130 36—equal to, $111 47 per share.

In examining the various items which we have detailed as forming the basis of this estimate, the great disadvantage, already alluded to, arising from the manner adopted in the collection of the assets, becomes still more apparent; at least so far as a correct ascertainment of their value is concerned. Much must be left to conjecture which ought to be matter of certainty, and would have been so if the affairs of the institution had been closed, and a winding up of its business had taken place.

We have endeavored, however, by means of the examinations of the books and accounts of the bank which were afforded us by the committee, as well as by frequent conference and exchange of opinion with them, to arrive at such an estimate as we consider, on the whole, reasonable. We have also obtained a variety of documents, in much detail, which not only present the views of the committee on various points connected with the valuation, but also afford information useful, and indeed necessary, in making an estimate or forming an opinion as to the proper mode and terms of settlement. These we annex to this report.

Having explained the grounds of deduction and allowance adopted in the estimate of the bank, we shall proceed to state those which formed the basis of our estimate, so that a comparison of the two may enable the Secretary of the Treasury to decide on their relative correctness. (Appendix, No. 1.)

Taking the total amount of assets at the sum stated in the report of the bank, viz: $76,570,393 08, we shall point out the deductions and allowances which we consider fair, and even liberal. From this aggregate amount, we think there should be deducted a sum of $6,463,608 91, which consists of the reductions necessary in order to fix the fair value of the assets on the 3d of March, 1836.

Under this class, nothing has been claimed, nor of course is it necessary to make any deduction from the specie, foreign bills of exchange, or notes and debts of State banks.

From the domestic bills of exchange and notes discounted we allowed, as the committee had done, the discount for the unexpired time, amounting to $288,704 31. From this sum must be deducted the amount of interest accrued on loans up to the 3d of March, stated by the committee at $152,380 21, but found, on examination, to amount to $159,649 62, (Appendix, No 42,) leaving the sum of $129,054 69 to be deducted.

From the loans on bank stock and other securities the committee proposed, it has been seen, an allowance of $296,110 01, the difference between the amount and the par value of all loans under six per cent. interest.

We approved of this principle, which the committee (as is seen by their report) had been directed to adopt, of fixing the personal effects and real estate of the bank at a cash valuation on the 3d of March, 1836. Though it appeared to us just to make this allowance on loans due at no very distant period, yet we did not think it ought to be made in one case included amongst the loans in question; this was an investment in bonds of the Ohio Life and Trust Company, to the amount of $1,000,000, at five per cent., redeemable on the 1st of December, 1855, nearly twenty years subsequently. This investment having been evidently made, as was admitted by the committee, with the expectation that the bonds of this company would be shortly saleable at par, we suggested (although this expectation may not be realized for some years) that ninety-four per cent., in place of eighty-eight and a half per cent., might be a more equitable valuation. This would allow a deduction of $60,000, instead of $114,790 44. Nevertheless, being desirous to make our general valuation on the most liberal principles, we concluded to assent, as you will perceive, to the entire deduction proposed by the committee on this class of all allowances which they claim.

We had no means of judging of the correctness of the estimated loss on the debt of the navy agent at Norfolk; we therefore took it, as stated in the report, at $20,072 09.

The estimated loss on the banking-houses, in the report of the committee, is, we have seen, $254,513 51. We have already stated that the committee were guided, in their estimates of suspended debts and other real estate, by the periodical valuations; but, in this case, we find that they departed from that course, and increased the amount of loss beyond these semi-annual statements to the amount of $57,169 45. We also discovered, in the progress of our investigations, that there were material errors in this account, as will be seen by a corrected exhibit of it among the documents annexed. The cost of the banking-houses ought to have been stated at $780,331 27, instead of $729,170 58. Their valuation should have been $665,695 44, instead of $474,657 07; which, it will be perceived, reduces the committee's estimate of loss from $254,513 51 to $114,635 83, the amount which is now to be deducted. (Appendix, No. 43.)

The loss on the suspended debts and real estate, as fixed in the report, was $1,389,479 12. It appears from the explanatory and corrected statements which we obtained in the progress of our examinations, and which are among the documents annexed, to have been adjusted subsequently to the semi-annual settlement of July, 1836, and rendered applicable to the state of their accounts of the 3d of March preceding, in the following manner: The report of the committee states the suspended debts and foreign bills protested at the amount of $2,930,164 59; as corrected, it is $2,881,285 30. It states the real estate at $1,483,219 21; as corrected, it is $1,480,937 81. These explanatory accounts also show the amount of loss estimated on suspended debts and foreign bills protested at, difficulty in forming any satisfactory valuation of these effects.

Another source of difficulty arose from the nature of the debts themselves. They consisted of bills discounted, and domestic and foreign bills of exchange protested, as stated in the report, and of real estate taken by the bank and its offices in payment of debts. Of these debts four fifths, and of the real estate three fourths, were held at nineteen remote departments of the bank. Thus scattered over the whole country, they were utterly insusceptible of any thing like a regular or detailed estimate and examination by us. To ascertain, in the city of Philadelphia, the probable means of payment possessed by numerous debtors residing all over the Union; or to fix the value of innumerable pieces of real estate, large and small, in every part of the country where the institution had dealings, was manifestly impossible; nor, if the delay were justifiable, would even such a personal inspection and inquiry as it was alone in our power to make have proved satisfactory. We could, therefore, do nothing but adopt the valuation of the bank. It appeared that examinations had been regularly made, at the bank and all the offices, at intervals of six months, by committees appointed for the purpose; that, in these examinations, each of the debts, and also portions of the real estate, were separately valued, and a specific sum affixed to each; and that every one was estimated at the amount which it was supposed would be realized from it, after an ample allowance had been made for probable loss and expense. These periodical reports, therefore, appeared to furnish the best attainable information; and, as they formed the basis of the report of the bank, no other course was left us than to adopt the same estimate of the probable loss. We assumed it, therefore, at the sum stated by them, $1,389,479 12. From this, however, we deducted the interest on debts estimated by the various committees as good; which amounted at the bank, and at the offices at Baltimore, Richmond, and Cincinnati, and its agency, to the sum of $122,733 43. (Appendix, Nos. 46, 47, 48, 49, 50.) This leaves the deduction for loss on the suspended debts and real estate, $1,265,745 69, instead of the sum stated in the report.

In regard to the large deduction for bad debts, deficiencies, and disallowances, amounting to $4,636,990 60, the same observations may be made as on the subject of the suspended debt and real estate. The bad debts, stated to be $4,315,123 18 of this sum, are in general of the same sort, and constitute those from which the periodical committees have supposed nothing will ever be realized; as we have no means of confirming, so we have none of contradicting, their opinions, we must take them, at their estimate, as altogether worthless. The deficiencies, amounting to $149,796 94, are defalcations and losses, mostly of very long standing. We have obtained a statement of them, from which their character may be seen, and their value judged of. They are, like the bad debts, considered as worthless. (Appendix, No. 30.) The disallowance being a debt alleged to be due from the United States, amounting to $5,267 32, consists of interest of seven per cent. stock redeemed, and a charge for expenses attending the collection of the special deposit. (Appendix, No. 32.)

Of the expenses, stated to be $166,803 16, we have not been furnished with any particular account, but were informed by the committee that they consisted of the salaries and other charges and expenditures incident to the business of the institution and its offices. (Appendix, No. 32.)

It will thus appear that, in forming our estimate of the actual value of the assets on the 3d of March, we have made a deduction of $6,463,608 91, viz:

Discount for unexpired time, less interest
due on loans up to the 3d March	$129,054 69
Difference between amount and par value of loans, to bring them to 6 per cent. interest	$296,110 01

Loss on debt of navy agent at Norfolk	20,072 09
Loss on banking-houses	114,635 83
Loss on suspended debt and real estate	1,266,745 69
Loss on bad debts and expenses	4,636,990 60
	$6,463,608 91

This leaves the actual value of the assets, on the 3d March, $70,106,784 17.

Having thus stated our opinion of the fair actual value of the assets on the 3d March, 1836, we proceed to show what we consider the actual liabilities to have been on that day.

The total amount of liabilities, as stated by the bank committee in their report, was, as has been seen, $29,253,610 27.

With regard to the circulation we would remark, that in this statement no allowance has been made for the probable gain on the destruction of its notes. The amount of nett circulation is, of course, the proper basis of this estimate. This nett amount we find to be variously given by the committee. In the report, it will be perceived it is set down at $21,109,352; in the statement handed to us subsequently, it is alleged to be $20,680,435. In order to ascertain more satisfactorily this important matter, we procured from the committee a statement of the accounts of the bank, as they actually appeared on its books upon the 3d March; a view of its affairs which would have presented, in our opinion, a more desirable basis for the general valuation of the assets.

By this statement it appears that the amount of circulation, as it actually stood on the books, was $23,494,799 56, from which we deduct the amount of notes in transitu, $3,380,572 00; which shows the nett amount of notes outstanding and unredeemed on the 3d of March, at $20,114,227 56. (Appendix, Nos. 18, 34, 36, and 37.)

We are of opinion that a very large amount of profit will finally arise from the destruction of notes, which compose this immense amount of circulation. The committee were strongly of opinion that no allowance ought to be made, on the grounds, both that such gain would not probably be very considerable, and that the rate at which it was proposed to collect the assets was so low as to be a full equivalent to the United States for not participating in such gain, if it accrued. We dissented from the committee on both grounds. As to the latter, not only were we of opinion that the charges for collection were far more than adequate; but, had they not been so, it would still have been proper, in a valuation of the assets, to assign to each item its real value, rather than make the increase of one an equivalent for the deficiency of the other. That the gain from the destruction of the notes and drafts will be very considerable appears to us too plain to be argued. The immense extent of country through which they have been diffused, the great number that has been issued, and the vast proportion of those of smaller denominations, are circumstances which render it certain. We endeavored to ascertain the denomination of the notes and drafts comprising the circulation, but were unable to do so. The committee informed us that the manner in which the books of the banks were originally opened, and the forms of the returns required from the officers, made it impossible to furnish us with that information. The fact that $10,142,038 had been redeemed, in the interval which elapsed between the termination of the charter and the 12th of October, afforded us no guide by which to form an opinion; because the Bank of the United States chartered by the State of Pennsylvania, and charged with the redemption of the circulation, continued, during that time, to pay out the notes originally issued by the Bank of the United States chartered by Congress. (Appendix, No. 26.) The only evidence on the subject, derived from the bank, was the allowance made by the committee of six directors appointed to make the valuation of the debts and effects of the institution. They fixed the probable gain from this cause at $300,000, about one and a half per cent. on the nett circulation on the 3d March. This voluntary admission, on the part of the bank, so clearly establishes the justice and propriety of a large allowance on the outstanding circulation, that no difference of opinion can exist, except in reference to the amount at which this gain ought to be estimated.

We consider the sum of $300,000, proposed at first by the committee, so entirely inadequate, that we thought it expedient to procure for our better guidance the experience of the first national bank. Through the politeness of its agent, we ascertained that, exclusive of post notes used as bills of exchange, the notes of that institution, in circulation at the expiration of its charter, amounted to $6,552,791; and that, on the close of its concerns by order of a court of chancery, in the year 1822, there still remained outstanding and unredeemed $203,591, equal to a nett gain of three and one tenth per cent. (Appendix, No. 54.) The much smaller circulation of that institution; the fact that it refrained from issuing any notes of a less denomination than ten dollars, except for a very short period; and the greatly less extensive range of country over which they were diffused, would make a similar allowance for the bank less liberal, perhaps, than it ought to be. We should, upon this point, as well as upon others, have abated to some extent our valuations, in order to have arrived at a mutual agreement; but we should have consented most reluctantly to estimate the gain on the circulation at less than $600,000. We accordingly deduct this amount from the liabilities.

The unclaimed dividends also form a probable source of gain, which, though small in comparison as to amount, is equally probable, according to experience, with that on the loss of bank notes. On the 3d March, 1836, the amount on hand was $253,937 43. We were unable to obtain a statement of the payments that had been since made on account of these dividends. The returns from the offices appeared not to distinguish between those and the subsequent dividends. According to an estimate furnished to us by the committee, about $218,597 43 have been paid since the 3d March. (Appendix, No. 18.) We therefore take their statements, and make a deduction of $35,000 from the liabilities for gain from this source.

It will thus appear that, in forming an estimate of the actual liabilities on the 3d March, we have made a deduction for gain from the destruction of bank notes $600,000
Gain from dividends remaining unclaimed - 35,000

In all - $635,000

This leaves the actual amount of the liabilities on the 3d March, 1836, $28,618,610 27. Deducting these liabilities from the estimated actual value of the assets, which has been stated above, viz: $70,106,784 17, it leaves the estimated value of the capital stock $41,488,173 90, equal to $118 53 per share on the 3d March, 1836.

The only point that remained was, what allowance was to be considered as proper for the risk and expense of the bank in making the collections.

It has already been seen that such deductions have been made from the amount of the assets, which bear different rates of interest, and are payable at different times, as make them equal to cash on the 3d March, 1836; and, of course, the amount to be collected ought to bear six per cent. interest from that day, after allowing to the institution a fair commission for the risk and expenses of collection. It has also been seen that deductions have been made to the full amount of the probable loss, where it could be estimated upon any reasonable grounds; of course, the commissions for risk and expenses of collection ought to be regulated accordingly.

There are two modes of making this allowance, both of which we suggested to the committee, and either may be adopted. A specific estimate may be made of such commission, on the several items to be collected, as will afford a reasonable compensation for risk and expense; which, we have seen, is the course adopted in the report of the bank; or an extension of the time of paying over the assets to the United States, with a reduction of the rate of interest below six per cent., equivalent to a reasonable compensation, may be allowed.

If the first course be adopted, we are of opinion that the bank ought to allowed a sum of $1,034,005 40, for the risk and expenses of collection.

It has been seen that it claimed nothing on the specie, bonds and mortgages, foreign bills of exchange, and debt due from the navy agent at Norfolk.

For the collection of the cash notes and debts of the State banks, a charge was made of one per cent. on the whole amount held by the bank, viz: $7,188,181 80; although it was, at the same time, indebted to the State banks in the sum of $2,255,003 78, which reduced the amount to be actually collected to $4,933,178 02.

We cannot see the propriety of any allowance for the collection of debts of this sort. They were equal to cash; and, indeed, the committee stated to us, as will be seen by the documents annexed, (Appendix, No. 18,) that they had been all assumed by the new bank, and were to be considered as collected and paid.

The charges made by the bank for the guaranty and expenses of collecting loans and bills discounted on personal security, and on stocks and domestic bills of exchange, were, as has been stated, $1,042,695 51. On examining and classifying these debts, the following arrangement seems to us more correct than that stated in the report of the committee:

1. Loans on stocks and other securities, and bank obligations, (Appendix, Nos. 20 and 29:)
On bank stock -	$3,053,015 72
On other securities and bank obligations -	17,210,567 90
Add this part of Ohio Life and Trust bonds, subsequently received -	600,000 00
	20,863,583 62
Deduct amount of contingent interest, (Appendix, No. 51;) account alleged to be included in the above -	526,446 82

Amount stated in the report -	$20,337,136 80
Deduct this amount, which we find to be on personal security, taken in sale of debts at the office -	768,468 63
	19,568,668 17

To this amount we add the sales of the active debts at New Orleans and Mobile, not completed on 3d March, 1836 -	4,516,332 60
Which makes these loans amount to -	$24,085,000 77

2. Bills discounted on personal security are stated at -	$17,159,822 20
To this amount we add the personal security, deducted as above -	768,468 63
Which makes -	17,928,290 83

24th Cong. 2d Sess.]

Claim of United States on U. S. Bank.

And from this we deduct the bank securities subsequently received, for sales of the active debt at New Orleans and Mobile, as above, (Appendix, No. 20) $4,516,332 60

Which makes the amount of bills discounted on personal security - $13,411,958 23

3. Bills of exchange, as stated, amount to $16,413,144 26

Our views as to an allowance for risk and expenses of collecting these sums we now proceed to state :

1. Loans on stock and other securities, and bank obligations, $24,085,000 77. With every disposition to make a suitable allowance for any responsibility incurred or agency rendered in collecting the assets of the bank, we cannot perceive that any demand exists, worth appreciating, in the case of these loans.

More than three millions of this amount are secured by stock of the Bank of the United States, and, additionally, by the responsibility of the borrowers. Twelve millions of these loans are debts of respectable banking institutions, equally secure as their notes in circulation. For the residue the bank holds personal liabilities, with collateral pledges of stock and other securities; of these, four millions were payable in forty-four days and a half from the 3d of March, 1836; and the solidity of the remainder may be inferred from the fact that nearly two millions of it are loaned at the low rate of five per cent. interest. (Appendix, Nos. 20, 38, 39.)

If any loans can be characterized as secure, these must be of that description; and, in regard to the trouble of collecting such debts, it is well known to be in the ordinary course of banking business, and always cheerfully rendered gratuitously. We therefore cannot think that any claim for guaranty and collection exists; but if it could be reasonably alleged, it will be seen that the whole allowances which we consider justly due amount to $1,034,005 40, while the abatement in interest to which we were willing to assent was equal to $1,244,645 31; leaving an excess of allowance, to cover this and all other claims, of $210,639 91.

2. Discounts on personal security, $13,411,958 23. We are of opinion that two and a half per cent. on the amount of these debts, for guaranty and collection, ought to be allowed, in the manner adopted by the bank in its sales of similar debts at its offices; that is to say, by an equivalent deduction in the rate of interest. This allowance will amount to $335,298 96. (Appendix, No. 41.)

3. Domestic bills of exchange, $16,413,144 26. It is believed that inland bills are estimated by banks to involve less risk than any other business paper; we therefore think that the guaranty should be much lower than on discounted notes; but, as a small portion of these bills may have been paid at inconvenient places, we suggest an allowance of two per cent. for guaranty and collection, to be adjusted on the principle already mentioned in the case of discounted notes. This allowance will amount to $328,262 88.

The charge made by the committee, of $453,585 70, for the collection of suspended debt and real estate, we consider too high. We have, however, already stated the difficulties in which these subjects are involved, and we are therefore disposed, under such peculiar circumstances, to accede to the rate of commission proposed by the committee, and to allow fifteen per cent. for guaranty and expenses of collection on the amount of suspended debt and real estate, the value of which yet depends upon estimates. These assets are estimated by the committee at $3,023,904 68, which valuation has been reduced, as already noticed, by the transfer of $51,160 69 to banking-houses, to the sum of $2,972,743 99. We have ascertained that, of the amount of real estate estimated, there has been realized by sales the sum of $628,290 85, which is of course to be deducted, and reduces the value of the amount to be collected to $2,344,453 14. Upon this sum it is proposed to allow fifteen per cent., or $351,667 96; on the amount sold, though partly for cash, as well as on the interest on good debts, heretofore noticed, amounting to $122,733 43, it is proposed to allow two and a half per cent., or $18,775 60; making the allowance under this head amount to the sum of $370,443 56.

The liberality of these allowances will be made more manifest, if reference be had to the view taken by the committee in their report of the whole amount of the several classes of doubtful and desperate debts. These amount, in the aggregate, to $8,832,410 55, which the committee bring down to the comparatively small value of $2,570,318 98. Although, for the reasons already assigned, we are unable to form an opinion on satisfactory grounds, yet we cannot avoid thinking that debts of such variety and magnitude must eventually realize a larger proportion.

It thus appears that, as an allowance for collecting the amount of assets remaining, after all estimated losses were deducted, we propose the sum of $1,034,005 40, viz:

2 per cent. on domestic bills	$328,262 88
2½ per cent. on discounts on personal security	335,298 96
15 per cent. on suspended debt and real estate on hand	351,667 96
2½ per cent. on sales of real estate and interest on good debts	18,775 60

If, therefore, a full allowance be made to the bank to this amount, for all charges and expenses of collection, and the same is deducted from the ascertained nett value of the assets, viz: $41,488,173 90, or $118 53 per share, it will fix the cash value of the assets of the bank, on the 3d of March, 1836, at $40,454,168 50, equal to $115 58 per share, subject to six per cent. interest from that time until paid.

Should the other mode of making the allowance be adopted, (that is, the time of payment extended, and the rate of interest diminished,) this deduction proposed, of $1,034,005 40, would not be made from the assets, but its equivalent given on the cash valuation of $118 53, in a credit of one, two, three, and four years from the 3d of March last, at the reduced rate of interest of five per cent.

4. Having thus given our views on the subject of valuation, we proceed to the only remaining point, the terms and mode of payment. We remarked to the committee, that their report fixed the cash value of the share, on the 3d of March, 1836, at $111 47 each, but it did not state the terms of settlement; and we wished to know the period of payment contemplated, the rate of interest, and the security which it was their intention to propose. They were desirous that no payment should be required earlier than the year 1838; but, on our objecting to this long postponement, they finally stated that it would not be convenient for the bank to commence payments till September next; and that they would give $111 47, with forty cents additional, per share, for the error in the valuation of banking-houses, in all $111 87, in four equal payments: in September, 1837, 1838, 1839, and 1840, with five per cent. interest, to be secured by the bonds of the Bank of the United States chartered by Pennsylvania. They did, indeed, subsequently inform us that the bank would be willing (if preferred) to transfer portions of its property in actual payment, to a greater or less extent; as, for instance, the bonds of the Ohio Life and Trust Company, already referred to, and the suspended debts and real estate, at their respective valuations, as given in the report. In regard to these proposals we stated:

1st. As to the security, it was a matter which must be left entirely to the Secretary of the Treasury.

2d. As to the credit, it was unusually long, being equal to three years; yet, in consideration of its convenience to the bank and the commercial community, it might be agreed to.

3d. As to the interest of five per cent. proposed, it was under the lowest market rate, and, if acceded to, it must, of course, to that extent influence the valuation of the stock. In the present state of money matters, the use of money, at the established and usually current rate of six per cent., could not fail to be profitable. In bringing all the loans of the bank, on the 3d of March, to six per cent., by a deduction of $296,110, 01, the inference was obvious and reasonable that the Treasury was justly entitled to the like interest.

The principle and practice of the bank, as evinced in the sale of its important branches, had been to make no other allowance for guaranty and collection than the advantage found in the credit and rate of interest. (See Appendix, No. 41.) The debts at these offices, amounting to more than fifteen millions of dollars, had been sold by the bank at their par value, without any actual deduction for the risk and expense of collection. Nearly six millions had been disposed of to respectable banks, on a credit of one, two, three, and four years, at six per cent. interest; five millions had been disposed of on the like security and credit, at five per cent. interest, equal to an allowance of two and a half per cent.; and it will be seen that the average of these entire sales did not exceed an abatement of one and two fifths per cent., equal to a credit of one year and two fifths at five per cent.

It will not be pretended that the active debts remaining, and which chiefly depend at Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, are of an inferior character to the debts adverted to at the various offices, which rested exclusively on personal security. It may, therefore, be presumed that the debts on which we have consented to make such liberal allowance for the risk and expense of collection might have been sold on equally favorable conditions at that period. Is it not reasonable that their adjustment now should conform to the course pursued at those numerous sales? It therefore results in this case, which is strictly analogous, that no abatement below the lowest current rate of six per cent. interest ought to be granted, unless it be applied to liquidate the various allowances proposed for the collection of the assets.

The deductions recommended amount, as has been stated, to $1,034, 005 40, which is about two and a half per cent. on $41,488,173 90, the estimated value of the assets. This is equivalent, in the mode suggested, to a credit of two and a half years, or $118 53 per share, (Appendix, Nos. 1, 53,) payable in one, two, three, and four years from the 3d of March, 1836, with five per cent. interest. It will be seen that the terms proposed by the committee, of eighteen, thirty, forty-two, and fifty-four months, being an average credit of three years at five per cent., are equal to three per cent. abatement, instead of two and a half. This would authorize an increase of one half of one per cent., or fifty-nine cents, making the shares worth $119 13; but it was so desirable to produce a mutual agreement as to price and terms, that this addition would not have been insisted upon.

The committee would not consent that this abatement from the current rate of interest should be thus estimated and appropriated. They were, however, unable to suggest the slightest objection to our views, other than by alleging that the bonds of the Bank of the United States chartered by Pennsylvania, bearing five per cent. interest, could be easily disposed of at par; an opinion in which we could not concur, and which was strikingly at variance with the estimate of the committee themselves, of eighty-eight and a half per cent. as the value of the bonds of the Ohio Life and Trust Company, with the like interest of five per cent.

Our best efforts were used, ineffectually, to induce the committee to assent to this equitable arrangement, which was conceived to be liberal in reference to the existing state and prospects of the money market, and just and reasonable from its conformity to the practice of the bank. Their acquiescence on this point would, in all probability, have produced an agreement as to a fixed price and terms for the shares belonging to the Government. The only other important difference, the gain on the notes in circulation, might have been settled in the equitable mode suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury; that is, to estimate all notes not redeemed on the 3d of March, 1836, as lost, and settle accordingly, with an obligation on the part of the Government to contribute proportionally to subsequent demands.

Having thus, in the progress of our various conferences, submitted to the committee the views on the whole subject which have been herein so fully explained, we regretted to find them immovable, and apparently resolved not to depart in any degree from the deductions, charges, and valuations, set forth in their report, in regard to matters wherein accuracy was, according to our conception, evidently unattainable; and, consequently, that it was not practicable for us to agree with them in one detailed view of the subject. It is proper, however, to add, that the committee, at our last interview, offered the arbitrary sum of $113 44 per share, and gave such intimations as induced us to think that they would have advanced to $115 per share, on an average credit of three years, with five per cent. interest from the 3d of March, 1836, if such a proposition would have induced our concurrence. We could not feel ourselves justified in this great concession, though disposed to have yielded much, even against our own judgment, from an earnest desire to be instrumental in effecting a satisfactory arrangement, and in adjusting all unsettled accounts between the Government and the late Bank of the United States.

The committee were informed, at our first interview, and also at our last meeting, that, preliminary to a final adjustment of this interest, the Treasury Department would require that the bank should pay that portion of the dividend on the stock of the United States which had been withheld for damages on the draft drawn upon the French Government, retaining only the actual expenses incurred. The fact that we had been unsuccessful in arranging the important object of our conferences precluded us from ascertaining very distinctly the views of the committee, which, as far as communicated, were, in substance, that the sum had already been passed into the profit and loss account of the bank, and must there remain.

It was understood that the interest of the Government in the late Bank of Columbia, and in the special deposits held by the Bank of the United States, of which an account is among the documents annexed, might be easily adjusted. (Appendix, No. 55.)

The circumstances under which the affairs of the late bank have been presented to our consideration; the variety, extent, and dispersed nature of many of its concerns; the necessity of conjectural estimates of effects, great in magnitude and value, in place of their simple and easy ascertainment from actual results, involved difficulties which would seem to render material errors in valuations altogether inevitable.

It is obvious, if the report of the committee (transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury on the 10th September, 1836) had been accompanied with a statement of the accounts of the late bank, brought up to the same period, that the valuations and various allowances might have been adopted and regulated with comparative ease, satisfaction, and accuracy. Adjusted accounts of the transactions of the bank, for six months subsequent to the 3d March, would have corrected many errors, and precluded the necessity of the explanatory statements required. The immense balances existing under the title of "debts due to and from the bank and offices to each other," and constituting a liability to a large amount to be deducted from the assets, would have entirely disappeared, or have been so materially reduced as to be susceptible of convenient explanation. The amount of dividends likely to remain unclaimed might have been more satisfactorily ascertained; and the chief part of the entire effects of the bank having been sold or matured, no difficulty or discordance would have been experienced in fixing their true value. The amounts of real estate and of suspended debts since realized would have been a useful guide whereby to test the correctness of the periodical estimates; and the expenses thereon would have indicated the amount of commissions suitable for collecting the residue. The notes discounted on personal security, the domestic bills of exchange, and a considerable amount of the loans at interest, having reached maturity, regular accounts would have shown the portion of these debts which it was impracticable to collect, the conditions of renewal, and the prospects of final payment; thereby exhibiting clearly the value of the risk involved, and the deductions consequently appropriate for the collection of these obligations.

It is also evident, that if the books of the late bank had been posted up since the 3d March, the debts to it settled as they became due, the claims upon it paid, and the business wound up, without being mixed with that of the new institution, its accounts would have clearly shown what portion of the property outstanding on the 3d March, of which the United States own nearly one fifth, had been since received, and what portion of the liabilities then existing had been since paid; an adjustment of the sum which the Government ought to receive by way of dividend, and an arrangement, relative to future payments, might have been made with scarcely any difficulty; and there would, in such case, have been no necessity either for the committee or ourselves to make that matter of argument, which should have been simply matter of examination and fact.

We have not failed to advert to the valuations of the stock of the bank made on other occasions, and to which the Secretary of the Treasury particularly invited our attention; (Appendix, No. 12;) and we also submitted these estimates to the consideration of the committee of the bank. It appears, by the report of the special agent of the Treasury, on the 2d November, 1832, that the value of the stock of the bank was more than 20 per cent. above par; (Appendix, No. 56;) and according to the estimate of a committee of the bank, on the 2d January, 1833, its value was 23 per cent. (Appendix, No. 57.) The surplus profits realized since January, 1833, appear to exceed two and a half millions of dollars, or 7 per cent., (Appendix, No. 58,) which would increase the first estimate to 27 per cent., and make the valuation of the committee of the bank, in 1833, equal, at this time, to 30 per cent., or $130 per share.

Very respectfully, &c.

H. D. GILPIN.
JOHN WHITE.Hon. LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

SIR: I enclose, herewith, a copy of an act of Congress, approved on the 23d instant, entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to act as agent of the United States in all matters relating to their stock in the Bank of the United States," and will thank you to furnish me now, and monthly hereafter, the information on all the points required to be given by the second section of the said act. If any of the effects of the bank have been assigned in trust, you are requested to transmit copies of the assignments. If any of the information required by the section above named be not in your possession, but in that of your trustees, I desire you to procure and communicate it to me, as the agent authorized by the act to receive the same. You will confer a favor, also, by informing me when it is expected that the capital stock in said bank, or any part thereof, owned by the Government, will be paid over; what advance will probably be paid on the par value of the same account of surplus, profit, interest, &c.; and what mode is contemplated by the bank to ascertain the just amount payable to the United States, in order that the Department may be enabled to test the accuracy of the calculation, and the true sum to which the Government may be entitled.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

M. L. BEVAN, Esq.,
President Bank United States.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES,

July 25, 1836.

SIR: Your favor of the 25th ultimo, with its enclosure, was submitted to the board of directors at their meeting this day, being the first meeting held since the receipt of your letter. In reply thereto, I have the pleasure of enclosing to you a certified copy of the resolution adopted by the board, which is so explicit as to leave nothing to add, except the assurance of respect of your obedient servant,

MATTHEW L. BEVAN, President.

Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

No. 4.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES,

July 25, 1836.

At a meeting of the board of directors, held this day, the following resolution was, on motion, adopted:

Resolved, That the president of the bank is hereby requested to inform the Secretary of the Treasury that, on the 2d day of March last, a transfer was made of all the funds of the institution to the Bank of the United States chartered by the State of Pennsylvania; which bank at the same time assumed all the obligations of this institution, and especially the settlement of the share of the assets due to the Government of the United States; that, in order to ascertain the value of said share, a joint committee of both boards is now engaged in making an investigation, which, it is understood, will result in an early communication to the Secretary; and that his letter will be transmitted to the board of directors of the Bank of the United States chartered by the State of Pennsylvania, from which it will doubtless receive a prompt and respectful consideration.

Extract from the minutes.

J. COWPERTHWAIT,
Acting Cashier.

No. 5.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES,

September 10, 1836.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit to you the report of the joint committee composed of directors of the late and present Bank of the United States, and of all the arbitrators selected by them in conformity to the resolutions of the board of directors of the late Bank of the United States, which have been already communicated to you.

The report will sufficiently show the course and the result of the inquiry.

All the materials on which it is founded will, of course, be submitted to any examination which you may desire to make, either in person or in any other mode more acceptable to you; and I shall have great satisfaction in affording every facility for the most detailed investigation.

I shall be equally ready to adopt any mode which may be deemed expedient for making such a division of the assets of the bank as may assure to the Government its just and ample proportion of them.

In the mean time, I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

N. BIDDLE, President.

Hon. LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

No. 6.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

September 19, 1836.

SIR: Since your communication of the 25th of July last, I have not had the honor to receive from the bank over which you preside any further information on the subject-matter of my inquiries, made the month previous; nor has any such information been received from any other quarter, except what is contained in a letter that reached me the 12th instant, from the president of the institution, officiating as your trustee, and in an accompanying report, which he enclosed. A copy of that report, it is presumed, has already been placed in your possession by the committee who prepared it, as they appear to have been acting partly in your behalf. It is not, therefore, deemed necessary to forward it; but from its contents, and from the letter before named, (a copy of which is herewith transmitted,) you will perceive that most of my former inquiries still remain unanswered; though, according to the resolutions of your board, enclosed to me in your former communication, I was led to suppose that they all had been referred to your trustee, with a view of having the desired information speedily communicated to me. At the time of those inquiries, I particularly wished, and am still solicitous, to obtain "monthly statements," since March last, of "information on all the points required to be given by the second section of the act of Congress," a copy of which was forwarded to you as a guide on those points. All that information would probably be useful to me in the discharge of my agency for the United States, and some of it is now very material for the purpose of ascertaining the progress made since March last in the collection of the demands in favor of the bank chartered by the United States; and also the prospect of an early dividend being paid to the United States on its stock, as well as the probable amount of such dividend. "Copies of the assignment were likewise desired," if any of the effects of the bank had been transferred in trust; these have not been received; but the omission to forward them has been less material, as the Treasury Department has been apprized, by you, of the fact of an assignment having been made, and has been advised of its contents by one of the United States directors, so that its character is supposed to be correctly understood. I am unable, however, to use his communications as official documents, and copies of such assignments are, therefore, still desired from the bank. You were further requested to inform me when it was "expected that the capital stock in said bank, or in any part thereof, owned by the Government, will be paid over." Nothing definitive has yet been communicated by you or your trustee on this point, so very interesting, if we look to the large sum probably due to the United States, or to the financial estimates for the ensuing year, which must soon be prepared by this Department for Congress; and to the important apportionment of a large part of the receipts of the present year, which is to be made on the 1st of January next, and afterwards placed in deposit with the different States. The before-mentioned report of the committee, just forwarded to me, removes none of the difficulties on this point, though the question as to the time of payment seems to have been a material part of the subject referred to them. The report merely recommends that it be settled by subsequent negotiation between the parties; and Mr. Biddle, in forwarding that report so recently, though purporting to be made as long ago as last July, speaks only of his readiness to "adopt any mode which may be deemed expedient for making such a division of the assets of the bank as may assure to the Government its just and ample proportion of them," without saying any thing as to the time contemplated by him for making that division, or paying over that proportion; nor does he propose any time for such division or payment which he wishes to be negotiated about. I am, accordingly, without any intimation, from any quarter, as to the time when any payment to the United States is either contemplated or desired by the bank. The disappointment in relation to this particular is greater, because, independently of the fact before mentioned, that information on this subject was specially requested by this Department some months ago, and is very material to a correct performance of some of its duties, it was presumed to have been the corporate obligation of the bank (when the United States had entered into no different arrangement, nor had been desired to unite in making one) to proceed immediately after the 3d of March last, and cause its various claims to be diligently collected, and the nett proceeds, to any considerable amount, either to be divided as fast as practicable among those entitled to receive them, or at least a due share of them to be paid to the Government, which had been excluded from any participation in any new business or partnership contemplated by the rest of the stockholders. The adoption and continuance of the above course was therefore expected, until a different one should be agreed on by all the parties in interest.

In the absence of the information desired, concerning the present state of the funds of the bank, it is obviously not possible for me to decide, with certainty, whether suitable means have yet been obtained for making any dividends; but it was supposed that ere this most of the assets in possession of the bank on the 3d of March last, which did not consist of money, or mere real estate, or obligations for the sales of some branches, on long credit, had been collected. The usual length of bank credit must have expired two or three months ago; and the money received, with what was before on hand, it was hoped (though on conjectural grounds, without the information asked) would greatly exceed any intervening disbursements proper and necessary on account of the bank chartered by the United States. In this condition of things, it therefore was anticipated either that notice would have been received before this period of the actual making of a dividend to the United States, to some extent, on the capital stock, (whether the residue was left to be paid upon subsequent arrangements as to its full value, or otherwise,) or at least that some intimation would have been given of the time when it was intended or expected to make some payment to the United States towards its share, leaving the entire value of that share to be hereafter ascertained by mutual agreement, or by the final result of the whole collections and sales of the assets. For these reasons, and others before mentioned, as to the estimates for 1837, and the apportionment of the public deposits to be made next January, you will perceive that I must still be exceedingly anxious to have an early reply to my former inquiries on this part of the subject. At the same time, I feel happy to acknowledge that the report furnishes some valuable information in answer to another portion of my inquiries, concerning "what mode is contemplated by the bank to ascertain the just amount payable to the United States," and what "advance will probably be paid on the stocks on account of surplus profits, interest," &c.

From the report and some of the stipulations cited from the assignment, I infer that the mode preferred by the bank has not been the usual mode when the charter of a bank expires. The last I understand to be, for the bank itself to proceed seasonably to collect the debts due to it; sell its real estate; arrange all its outstanding concerns within the period allowed by law; and, from time to time, though as early as possible, make dividends to its stockholders of what it realizes, after deducting all necessary expenses; and, at the expiration of the period permitted for closing its affairs, to place whatever may be unfinished in the hands of trustees, for the benefit of the stockholders, or divide among them the assets remaining. This ordinary and natural mode appears to be that best calculated to do exact justice to all parties, both with regard to the times and the amounts of the respective dividends; and also obviates the numerous and embarrassing questions concerning guaranties, deductions, depreciations, securities, &c., which seem inseparably connected with the course thus far pursued by the bank in preparation to extinguish the interest of the United States in its capital stock. The usual mode appears likewise to have been that contemplated by Congress in granting in the charter two years after its expiration to collect and pay over the corporate funds to the stockholders. With regard to the interest of the other stockholders, the reasons may have been sufficient for adopting a different and novel mode, and that without previously consulting the United States, the only retiring partner from the concern. I understand, from the report, that the actual course of the bank has been to resort to an immediate assignment of all personal property to a trustee; to appoint committees on the part of the principal and trustee alone, though their interest, independent of the United States, were identical; to estimate the value of the personal property and real estate on the 3d of March last, and to obtain this estimate, not for the adjustment of claims between the only parties to it, but to be used, as the committee say, to show "what ought to be paid or secured to the United States;" or, as you say in your resolution of July 25, to ascertain the value of said shares of the United States, or to be used like the doings of "arbitrators" on that subject, as Mr. Biddle seems to consider the committee, or a portion of them. But it is to be remembered, that no members of that committee, however respectable and intelligent, were selected by the Government, the value of whose large claim of seven or eight millions of dollars was thus to be fixed. Nor were any of them chosen by the Secretary of the Treasury, or by any persons deputed by either the United States or him for that purpose. Nor is it known that any body on behalf of the bank has ever, in any way or at any time, consulted the United States, or their agent, as to joining this committee with an equal number on their part, or as to their willingness to approve any exclusive mode of proceeding by one party alone for settling the value of their share in the funds which belonged to them in common, or in a certain ratio, as fully as to the other stockholders; or as to their views, during the progress of the subject since last March, on any of the principles adopted in valuing the property of the bank in which the Government was jointly and so largely interested. But the reasons for this unusual course, if supposed sufficient, not having been communicated to me, cannot properly be weighed. In their absence, the course pursued appears to me objectionable in behalf of the United States. It looks unequal, and has an apparent tendency to produce not only delay, but a valuation too low, and altogether unfavorable to the interests of the Government. But the materials on which that report purports to be based having been since offered by the trustee to be submitted to any examination I may desire, removes, in some degree, a portion of these objections, and renders it a duty, in the exercise of proper vigilance and care over the interests of the United States, to avail myself of the offer, as well for the purpose of detecting any possible inaccuracy of figures, as of testing the principles assumed in the report, and which might otherwise be considered as acquiesced in by the agent of the United States. But the effect of appointing committees, however reputable, by only one party, for the purpose of making an ex parte statement, intended in any way to operate on the interests of others, though the materials be afterwards offered for re-examination, still seems to be to procrastinate a final adjustment, to produce dissatisfaction, and to forestall opinion upon such points as may have been decided. Hence, I feel sensibly, and regret, the awkward and unfavorable attitude in which the Government is thus placed, but shall, notwithstanding, endeavor as soon as practicable to procure three gentlemen of high respectability and competent qualifications to investigate those materials, and report to me their views upon them, and also upon the proper basis of a settlement. Whether any essential error in computations, or in the principles assumed by the committee, has occurred or not, and whether the amount estimated in the report be or be not too small, if seasonably paid, with proper interest, it is important for the Government, representing the interests of the people of the United States in this claim, to have as full, fair, and satisfactory evidence in relation to its true condition as is practicable. It is highly proper, also, that a thorough scrutiny of its value be made by some agent on their part, before any consent is given to a course of settlement different from the usual one in similar cases, and before a decision is made on any offer of payment in full by the bank, provided it should hereafter propose to make one at any time of the amount reported by the committee, or of any other amount supposed to correspond nearer to the real value of the share of the United States. But as no specific sum has yet been offered by the bank, to be paid either in full or in part, at an early or remote day, no occasion has yet arisen for any such decision. Due efforts, however, will be continued to procure the proper information to act on, whenever the bank is ready to make or propose payments of any kind, so that nothing may be wanting on the part of the Government to insure due dispatch in disposing of this embarrassing subject in the usual mode, or by a final arrangement, as soon as the bank is prepared for either course.

The great pressure of other official duties at the seat of Government will prevent my personal attention so fully as is desirable to many branches of this laborious inquiry, and I shall therefore request those gentlemen to report, among other things, besides the state of the before-named materials, their views on the correctness of the principles adopted by the former committee in coming to some of their conclusions, as well as their views about the best mode of now adjusting the amount to which the United States may be entitled in the assets of the bank; what in their judgment that amount is likely to be, if ascertained in the usual mode, and the proper amount, times of payment, rates of interest, and security to be now given, in the event that the bank shall be unwilling to proceed; and have dividends and payments promptly made to the United States, from time to time, as collections may warrant, until the whole concern be closed in the manner before mentioned, as most customary and most agreeable to this Department. Allow me to suggest, also, as a course which seems fair and eligible, both to produce a more rapid progress in closing this business, and to give fuller satisfaction as well to the bank as the Government, that an equal number of disinterested gentlemen be designated by the bank, to unite in the re-examination of the materials, and in an inquiry on the additional topics which will be suggested by me to the gentlemen selected by this Department, and, after mutual consultation, that they agree, if practicable, in one view of the subject, or of any important parts of it, and report accordingly. Such union of opinion would doubtless be calculated to have much weight with all parties, and, though not binding on either, would probably be decisive where the strongest reasons did not happen to exist to overrule it. In the mean time, as the agent of the United States, I beg leave to assure the bank of my readiness at all times, and indeed my anxiety, to receive, early as practicable, on account of the stock owned by the Government, any dividend or payment the bank or its trustee may be prepared to make towards the portion to which the Government shall in the end in any mode appear to be justly entitled. And if no other course can, during the two years allowed by the charter, be agreed on for settlement, except prompt periodical payments to the extent of the nett collections, the Secretary of the Treasury for the time being will doubtless be willing, as to all which shall remain uncollected and unpaid at the end of that period, to enter into a still further arrangement to divide ratably the assets remaining, or receive afterwards, as collected, a due portion of what shall be then outstanding. It may be proper to explain that this letter is addressed to yourself rather than your trustee, in consequence of the failure to obtain from you or any other person most of the material information requested last June, under the act of Congress passed in that month, and in consequence of the claim of the United States being in the first instance wholly on the bank over which you preside. The United States, as a stockholder, is likewise excluded from all interest in the institution which has been selected as your trustee, and, as a stockholder, is no party to either that selection or the assignment. Under the above act of Congress, the Secretary of the Treasury is also appointed agent to represent the United States as a stockholder only, and in that capacity commenced the correspondence with you of which this constitutes a part. But a copy of this letter will, for convenience and comity to all concerned on the part of the bank, be forwarded to the president of the institution to which your assets have been conveyed.

I am, &c.

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.MATTHEW L. BEVAN, Esq., President Bank U. S. Philad.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
September 20, 1836.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 10th instant, enclosing a report upon the affairs of the bank chartered by the United States, as those affairs existed on or near the 3d of March last.

I have cheerfully accepted your offer, as trustee of that bank, and in actual possession of its assets and books, to permit an examination to be made of the materials upon which that report is founded, in any mode most agreeable to me. For the manner in which it is proposed to conduct that examination, I beg leave to refer you to the enclosed copy of my letter of the 19th instant, addressed to the president of that bank, the principal in this case, and containing also some views in continuation of the correspondence heretofore commenced between him and myself in relation to the condition of the bank, to the information desired as to some of its concerns, and the time as well as the mode and amount contemplated for payment to the United States on account of their share in its capital stock, and in the surplus profits which have accrued thereon.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

NICHOLAS BIDDLE, Esq.,
President of the Bank of the United States chartered by Pennsylvania, Philadelphia.

No. 8.
TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
September 21, 1836.

GENTLEMEN: As you have been selected to act on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury, for the purpose, among other things, of examining the materials on which the enclosed report (A) is founded, I wish that your inquiries may be commenced at the earliest convenient day.

Independent of the rights conferred on me by the 2d section of the act of Congress, passed June 23, 1836, in certain cases to "inspect and examine, or cause to be inspected and examined," certain accounts of the United States Bank, or "any trust" relating to them, the proffer has been voluntarily made to me to allow the examination of all those materials before mentioned, in any way most agreeable to this Department. This proffer is contained in a letter from the president of the Bank of the United States chartered by the State of Pennsylvania; a copy of which is enclosed. (B.) Copies of my reply thereto, and of another communication from me to the president of the United States Bank chartered by Congress, and relating to this and other topics, are herewith forwarded for your perusal and use. (C and D.)

In order that you may be acquainted with the whole correspondence since the passage of the above act of Congress, I also annex copies of my letter to the president of the bank in June last, and of his only reply thereto, dated in July following. (E and F.) In making that examination, and a report on the result, as well as on certain other matters hereafter enumerated, there may be associated with you another committee, selected by the old bank. It has been invited to do this, and, if acceding to the suggestion, it is hoped that you may be able to agree in a report on some if not all the points submitted to your consideration; otherwise it is desired that you will proceed alone, and present a separate report of your own views.

1. I wish, first, in the examination of those materials which form the basis of the enclosed report, to invite your attention to the following particulars, without intending to exclude thereby your researches, so far as may appear proper, into the whole of them. What portion of the assets of the bank on the 3d of March last consisted of obligations for the sales of its branches, and what was the length of credit given on them? What amounts of the personal securities and domestic bills on hand on the 3d of March, 1836, have since been collected, and what have since been received for the sales of real estate and banking-houses? Whether all the sums since received, with the money then on hand in bills of the other banks, specie, and balances due from other banks, have not exceeded the payments since made of balances due to other banks on the 3d of March, the amount of notes then outstanding and since redeemed, the deposits since paid, and the actual expenses incurred in transacting this portion of the business? If the receipts have exceeded the payments, I wish you to report the amount, and the reasons, if any, why a due portion of the balance should not immediately be paid over to the United States, towards its share in the capital stock. You are further desired to examine, as carefully as may be, the character of the demands returned as loans and bills on the 3d of March, to see if any guarantee, or commissions for guarantee, as recommended by the report, are necessary and proper; and if so, on how many of them, and at what rate on any of them; and whether all doubtful debts had not been previously withdrawn and arranged under some different head, so as to render unnecessary any guarantee whatever. If any guarantee were ever proper on a part of them, you are requested to report if that part has not since been chiefly converted into money, so as to render a subsequent agreement to pay it improper on the part of the United States. The value of the real estate and banking-houses is an item on which a large deduction has been made in the report; and the ground for it, if any, considering that real estate has generally risen of late so much in value, I wish specially investigated. Some inquiry may be found expedient to ascertain if this property will not probably produce more than the cost; and, in connexion with this, an item for a fund to extinguish the cost of banking-houses requires fuller explanation. All these particulars might be satisfactorily arranged in any recommendation for settlement, by agreements to sell within two years, and pay over our rightful portion of the nett proceeds. The suspended or doubtful debts, under whatever heads, need a close scrutiny; and I would suggest whether any fair test of their true value can be fixed, except prompt and diligent collections, in full or in part, were practicable; and, in case of any arrangement hereafter, a covenant to pay to the United States its just ratio of what is afterwards actually obtained on them. From the item of outstanding notes or circulation on the 3d of March, only a small deduction has been proposed by any of the committee for such as may have been lost or destroyed during the past twenty years. Any materials to justify this ought to be specified, as the amount in circulation has generally been large, a long time has elapsed since they have been circulating, and the range of circulation has been very wide and unusually exposed to losses. A great deduction for losses would therefore seem to be proper, unless facts exist on this point now unknown to me.

In case of no immediate arrangement, except to pay over to the United States its share of the nett collections from time to time, during the two years allowed by the charter to close up the concerns of the institution, the most safe and just rule on this subject of the outstanding circulation which has occurred to me is, that the parties, at the end of the two years, should presume all the old notes unrepresented to be lost, and settle accordingly, with an obligation on the part of the Government to contribute proportionally towards the reimbursement for the redemption of any bills subsequently presented. The unclaimed dividends can then be equitably adjusted in the same manner; or, if an estimate be now made of their character, it is probable that, on a careful inquiry into their large amount and situation, it will appear that a considerable deduction ought to be made for such as may never be claimed. The large item of profit and loss will require a close analysis as well as that of the contingent fund, contingent interest, and deficiencies.

Though the former committee may have dissected and placed a proper estimate on all of these, and the materials on which they rest, yet the details do not appear in so full and satisfactory a manner as is desirable. On the item of the contingent fund, it may further be proper so far to examine retrospectively into the materials as to ascertain that no mistake has been inadvertently made in the application of any part of it to subjects connected in any way with the new institution chartered by the State of Pennsylvania, and in which, as the United States have no interest, they should of course, on account of it, suffer no charge or loss. A careful inquiry of the same kind, and with the same and other legitimate views, might properly be carried into some other items, such as profit and loss, and discount, exchange, and interest. In the next place, the nett balance due to the Bank of the United States and offices from its branches, amounting to about one million and a half, is charged by the committee among the sums to be deducted. The propriety of this seems to be very questionable, without further explanation. The apparent value of the stock, on the statement of the condition of the bank in March last, is so much greater than the estimate made by the committee, the sales in the market have often been so much higher, and the opportunities enjoyed to dispose advantageously of most of the branches and to collect the debts due to the others have been so unusual and great, that particular vigilance seems necessary to ascertain if some essential error does not exist in a number of the data which constitute the basis of that report, and which reduce so low the estimated value of the stock.

2. After a proper scrutiny of all the materials and items relating to this subject, whether before enumerated or not, you are requested to inquire into the principles applied to them by the committee, and especially those of charging a large sum for a guarantee on all or any of the demands, whether since collected or not, and whether clearly good or doubtful, and other large sums also for commissions. It seems questionable whether either of them, under the circumstances of this case, be proper: the first, for reasons before named; and the last, because the actual expense of collecting these demands, during two years, would seem to have been intended by the charter to be incurred by the old bank, and to be performed by its officers for their usual compensations or salaries, and who are now supposed to be left almost destitute of employment of any kind. Whether performed by the old bank or its trustee, the sum actually expended on this business, or a fair portion of the whole actual expenses of the institution while engaged in it, seem to be the proper ones, and appear to me not likely to amount, with demands so peculiarly situated and secured as most of them are, to more than a small fraction of the gross amount of from one to two millions, proposed in the report.

After the two years, any bank acting as trustee would really incur but a small trouble or expense in aiding to collect what might then be outstanding, and, it is presumed, would be willing to make only a moderate charge therefor.

3. You are next desired to report on what, in your opinion, is the best mode of adjusting the proper amount due to the United States—whether by immediate payment of our share of the nett actual collections, and by subsequent dividends as collections accumulate, from time to time, till the charter expires, and then by an equitable division of the remaining assets, or a sale of them with covenants as to certain items before named; or by an estimate made now of the value of the whole assets on the 3d March last, and an agreement to receive payment of our share of that estimated value at such times and on such interest since the 3d March, and in such instalments and with such security as may seem to you reasonable. On these points I have nothing more to suggest for your consideration than what has before been expressed in this letter, and more in detail in that to the president of the bank on the 19th instant.

Should you recommend the last course, or not, it is still desirable that your views, and the reasons on which they are founded, should appear in your report, so far as regards the whole proper amount, the times of payment, rates of interest, and the security to be given, in case that course be eventually adopted.

4. It is further wished that, in forming an opinion of the value of the assets of the bank on the 3d of March, you should take into consideration the amount of dividends due to the United States which has been withheld and applied by the bank in payment of a claim for damages on the draft or order drawn by the Department on the French Government. Under all the circumstances of that case, this Department cannot recognise the right of the bank to any thing except the actual expenses incurred by it in consequence of the failure by the French Government to pay the draft, with the usual interest thereon, while the bank had not the use of the money, provided it did not have the use of it during the whole period till its formal repayment. For further particulars on this question, reference can be had to the printed opinions of the Attorney General, and the views of this Department in the annual reports to Congress, December, 1834. It would therefore seem proper, and it is submitted to your consideration, and that of any committee uniting with you on the part of the bank, whether the claim for constructive damages had not better be relinquished by the bank, and only a full indemnity for any actual loss be received, and the value of the stock be estimated on that basis, the bank in the mean time paying over the dividends to the United States which were withheld in 1834.

5. All the special deposits on the part of the United States, it is supposed, will of course be understood (in any detailed arrangement proposed) as proper to be returned or accounted for, independent of the share to which the United States are entitled in the capital stock and the profits made thereon. So of all funds or demands held under special contract with the United States, as in case of the Columbia Bank of Georgetown, District of Columbia. I make suggestions on these topics of the dividends withheld, and the special deposits and special contracts, in order to prevent, if possible, any future misapprehension or litigation concerning them, should they not be expressly provided for in any arrangement proposed. I take the liberty to designate the 20th instant as the day of your meeting at Philadelphia, and forward this to Mr. Gilpin, the resident in that city, for your joint use, with a request that he will apprise the other gentlemen of the time and place designated, as well as the two banks; and, if not convenient to all, that he make arrangements, mutually agreeable, as to some other early day on which to commence your inquiries.

I am, gentlemen, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

PHILADELPHIA, September 29, 1836.

GENTLEMEN: Having been selected by the Secretary of the Treasury, in conjunction with Messrs. C. W. Lawrence, of New York, and John White, of Baltimore, to examine the materials on which was founded the report of the joint committee of directors of the late and present Banks of the United States, transmitted to him on the 10th instant, I am requested by him to inform you of the time and place designated for our meeting, in order that, if not convenient to all, such as are so may be fixed upon. We propose to meet at 10 o'clock, on Saturday morning next, the 1st October, at the North American Hotel.

The letter of the Secretary of the Treasury of the 19th instant, communicated to the president of both banks, explains his views of the course he deems most eligible. It is therefore only necessary to add, that we are desirous to make, with as little delay as possible, arrangements mutually suitable to all parties.

Very respectfully, &c.

H. D. GILPIN.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
October 6, 1836.

GENTLEMEN: In my letter to you of the 21st ultimo allusion was made to the sales and valuation of the stock of the Bank of the United States at a price much greater than the estimate in the report of the committee of the bank, fixing its value per share at only $111 47. This topic was alluded to as furnishing a circumstance which indicated that the estimate made in the report was much too low. In addition to that circumstance, and what was before suggested in connexion with it, I would now invite your attention to the report of the special agent of this Department, as to the actual value of the stock of the bank in 1832, and the report of the Committee of Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, founded upon that report, and upon the oaths of the directors of the bank, as to the true value of the stock in January, 1832. The first of these reports, as understood by me, made the real value of the stock of the bank to be at that time more than 20 per cent. above par, and the latter report more than 23 per cent. above par. For the particular grounds upon which these valuations were made, you are respectfully referred to the reports themselves.

I am, gentlemen, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

GENTLEMEN: I am duly in the receipt of your communication addressed to the committee of the Bank of the United States, appointed to meet you in the existing examination of the subject-matter of their late report.

I regret that an indisposition in Mr. Cowperthwait's family (who promised to give his personal attention to the matter) has prevented an earlier compliance with your request. I did not suppose, however, that the tenor of my note to Mr. Gilpin conveyed an impression that the answers to your inquiries would be furnished at any other place than at the bank.

It is only within the last few minutes that I have received the enclosed document; and, anxious that you should have it at the earliest possible moment, I have concluded to send it to you without conference with my colleagues.

JOHN WHITE,

No. 18.

I. The amount of the sales of the debts, &c. at the offices, was $14,839,034 71. Some of the sales were not finally closed until after the 3d of March, although the negotiations had commenced, and in some cases agreements had been concluded, before that time. The credit may be stated, generally, at one, two, three, and four years, with five per cent. interest. In one case, four, five, six, and seven years were given on $250,000, and in another, twenty years on $1,000,000. Besides the long paper arising from these sales, loans for one or more years were made both at the bank and its offices, principally with a view to the employment of the funds during the process of winding up. These loans amounted at the parent bank (including those transferred from Baltimore and Charleston, and other offices which had closed their active business) to $12,111,774 52. At the office at New York, the amount of such loans is $1,673,480 08. The total amount of long loans is therefore $28,624,289 31, and there are others at some of the other offices which it would take time to ascertain.

II. The old books have not been posted up since the 3d of March, and therefore it would take some time to ascertain what amount of notes and bills have been paid since that date; but the materials for so doing are, of course, all in our hands, and this information can be furnished, if necessary. It may be proper to add, that, of the active debt on the 3d of March, at one office only, $405,280 37 have been protested for non-payment, and still remain in the suspended debt—being upwards of ten per cent. on the whole debt.

III. The sales of real estate, (other than banking-houses,) since March 3d, amount to $628,290 85. The usual terms of sale are, one fifth cash, and the balance in notes at one, two, three, and four years; but, in some cases, one, two, three, and four years are given, without any cash payment. Of the banking-houses which were in the statement of the 3d of March, sales have been completed to the gross amount of $450,600. To this must be added the banking-house at New York, (erroneously placed in the column of real estate,) which sold for $189,500.

IV. The State bank notes and balances may be considered as paid. If all the balances had been required to be remitted to Philadelphia, at the current rates of exchange, there would have been a large deduction from the amount, particularly of the Western balances—in some cases as much as 2½ per cent.

V. The balances due to State banks were all assumed by the new bank, and are or may be considered as paid. The same is the case as to all deposits, excepting the sum of $2,442 18, which remains to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States.

The nett circulation of the notes of the bank was, on the 3d of March	-	-	$20,680,435

And on the 12th of October	-	-	10,538,397

Showing the redemption of	-	-	$10,142,038
---------------------------	---	---	--------------

The expenses paid from the 3d March to the 1st October amount to $225,471 59. The precise portion which belongs to the business of the old bank it would take some time to ascertain; but we presume that the expenses of merely winding up the business of the old bank would have been four fifths of this amount.

VI. There are very few data in the bank on which to found an estimate of the notes that have been lost or destroyed. The nearest approach to any accurate statement is what is given by the circulation of the old offices at Cincinnati and Chillicothe. The total issues of notes at these offices was $1,050,000; of which $1,048,085 have been paid and cancelled; leaving still outstanding $1,915. What part of these will be presented for payment it is impossible to say; but if even one half should be supposed to be destroyed, the per centage of loss on the issues would be about one tenth of one per cent.

VII. Of the unclaimed dividends, amounting, on the 3d of March, to $253,937 43, the exact sum paid cannot be accurately stated, as the returns from the offices do not distinguish between those and the subsequent dividend; but the best estimate which we can make is, that $218,597 43 have been paid.

No. 19.

PHILADELPHIA, October 20, 1836.

GENTLEMEN: We received yesterday afternoon Mr. Cope's letter, enclosing a statement in reply to several inquiries suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury, which we left with you at our last interview on the 3d instant. It will be perceived that a principal object of those inquiries was to ascertain accurately what amount of personal securities and domestic bills on hand, when the charter expired, has since been collected; what amount of deposits then held by the bank has since been paid; and what amount of the notes then in circulation has been since redeemed. As this period now exceeds seven months, it is evident that an accurate knowledge of these facts would have enabled us not only completely to verify a very large proportion of what is matter of estimate in the report transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury of the value of the property of the bank on the 3d of March last, but would have exhibited, in the plainest manner, what sum the United States are now entitled to receive as their share of the funds collected.

We regret extremely that it has not been in your power to furnish this information, and that (as you state) the books of the bank have not been posted up during the last seven months. Had its accounts been so kept as to show what portion of its property outstanding on the 3d of March last has since been received, and what portion of its liabilities has since been paid, an adjustment of the sum which the United States ought now to receive, and an arrangement relative to future payments to them, might have been made with scarcely any difficulty. You are aware, from the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury to Mr. Bevan, the president of the bank, on the 19th September, that he has been anxious that payments should have been made, from time to time, towards the entire portion which belongs to the United States, and that he is particularly desirous now to receive their share of the collections, with a view to the approaching deposit of a large part of the receipts of the year with the different States. Besides, a payment of the dividend belonging to the United States, after deducting from the sums received during the last seven months the actual disbursements, seems to be the first step, and one equally usual, obvious, and correct.

In doing this, it would have undoubtedly been preferable to take the exact amount of such dividend from the books and accounts of the banks since the 3d of March, had it been in your power to furnish it. However, after the investigation we made with you, and an examination of such documents as we did receive, we believe this can be so ascertained that you will see the propriety of making a considerable payment on account.

Taking, as the basis of our calculations, the report made by the bank itself of the value of its property on the 3d of March last, we arrive at the following result as to its collections and disbursements since that day:

1. The active debt, estimated, in the report, to be due in 44½ days after the 3d March, 1836, is as follows:

Bills discounted on personal security	-	$17,159,822 20
Domestic bills of exchange	-	16,413,144 26
Notes discounted on bank stock	-	1,291,915 72
Notes discounted on other securities	-	4,061,553 71
		<hr/> $38,926,435 89

2. Loans drawing interest, as follows:

At 6 per cent. due 8th February, 1836	-	$466,300, 00
At 6 per cent. due 8th November, 1835	-	1,296,678 00
At 6 per cent. due 8th December, 1835	-	3,317,605 09
At 6 per cent. due 20th December, 1835	-	355,500 00
		<hr/> 5,436,083 09

3. Available funds.

Due by State banks	-	4,958,234 75
Notes of State banks	-	2,229,947 05
		<hr/> 7,188,181 80
Deduct due to State banks	-	2,255,003 78
Balance of available funds	-	4,933,178 02
4. Specie	-	5,595,077 25

Making a total of assets due shortly after the 3d of March - | 54,890,774 25 |

The liabilities of the bank on the 3d of March were as follows:

1. Notes in circulation	$21,109,352	23
2. Dividends unclaimed	253,937	43
3. Due Barings, &c.	371,777	40
4. Public debt	120,621	87
5. Deposites	3,594,048	25
		<hr/>
Making a total amount of liabilities on the 3d March, 1836	-	25,449,737 18
Deducting, therefore, the total liabilities of the bank from the above assets, it leaves a surplus of	-	<hr/> $29,441,037 07

It thus appears that the sum which has become due, after an allowance for the payment of the entire amount of deposits and the whole circulation outstanding on the 3d of March last, has been about twenty-nine millions of dollars, of which the United States are entitled to receive for their share upwards of five millions seven hundred thousand dollars.

Should even so large a portion as ten millions of the sum estimated in your report as due before the 1st of May last, be yet uncollected, it will still leave a sum little short of four millions of dollars that may be at once paid over to the United States.

The Secretary of the Treasury is, as we have remarked, particularly desirous that whatever dividend is due should be immediately ascertained and paid over, so as to be deposited in conformity with the act of Congress; and we may add, that it appears to us to be the most equitable and simple mode of proceeding.

In conclusion, therefore, we have to ask, through you, the payment by the bank, into the Treasury, of that portion of the funds collected since the 3d March last, which belongs to the United States. If it cannot be done forthwith, we shall be obliged by your naming the earliest day.

We are, very respectfully, your obedient servants,

H. D. GILPIN.

No. 20.

PHILADELPHIA, October 28, 1836.

GENTLEMEN: We are in receipt of your letter of the 20th instant. The views it presents are so new and unexpected, that it becomes necessary to recall your attention to the peculiar relations in which we stand to each other.

The Bank of the United States was anxious to settle with the Government, and for that purpose to adjust and pay its proportional share. But as the institution was not closed, but continued, on the retirement of a single partner, no winding up, technically speaking, could take place; and the obvious course of settlement was, to estimate the value of the shares at the time of separation, and let the bank pay it; collecting the debts afterwards, so as to press lightly on the community. This was accordingly done. A committee of the late and present bank, with the aid of another committee acting as arbitrators, made an estimate of the value of the stock, which they decided to be worth $111 47 per share. This estimate was forwarded on the 10th of September, by the president of the bank, to the Secretary of the Treasury, with a declaration that "all the materials on which it is founded will of course be submitted to any examination which you may desire to make." The Secretary answered, on the 20th of September, "I have cheerfully accepted your offer as trustee of that bank, and in actual possession of its assets and books, to permit an examination to be made of the materials upon which that report is founded in any mode most agreeable to me." And in the letter from the Secretary to the president of the late bank, dated the 19th of September, he says that he would appoint three gentlemen "to investigate those materials, and report to me their views upon them, and also the proper basis of a settlement;" and accordingly, in the letter to the bank of the 29th of September, announcing your appointment, you say that you had been selected "to examine the materials on which was founded the report of the joint committee of directors of the late and present Banks of the United States.

From courtesy, and a desire to facilitate that investigation, we were named to meet you. We did so; and have endeavored to explain to you our views in making our estimate. After a number of conferences, occupied exclusively with that subject, you withdrew, and, after an interval of some days, returned and addressed to us the letter we are now answering; in which, without any allusion to the subject of our past interviews, or any invitation to resume them, and without apprizing us whether your estimates differed from ours, so that we might discuss and perhaps reconcile them, you start an entirely new topic, and say that the bank has collected fifty-four millions of debt within the last seven months, and insist upon the immediate payment into the Treasury of $5,700,000.

24th Cong. 2d Sess.]

Now, supposing all this to be exactly as you state; the obvious answer to it, on our part, is, that this is not our affair; and that, if you wish to make any such claim upon the bank, we are not the proper channel for presenting it. We understood that you came here to examine our statement. We met you for that purpose, and for that purpose only; and if you do not wish to pursue the inquiry, we are quite willing to drop it. Lest, however, our silence should be misconstrued into an acquiescence in your statements, we think it right to make a few remarks on them:

First. The books of the late bank were not posted up to the present time, for the simple reason that it was wholly unnecessary to do so. The new bank was mainly interested in the old debts, and intended to collect them at the same time that it continued its own business. It saw no use in keeping up double accounts for the same debt; nevertheless, we apprized you that, if you wished, it should be done. You now express only regret that it was not done, but no wish to have it done.

Second. In our various conferences you distinctly intimated the belief that the Treasury Department did not wish for an immediate payment from the bank; that, on the contrary, the Secretary, looking forward to the probable wants of the Treasury, would prefer to postpone the payments till the years 1839, 1840, and 1841. We are surprised, therefore, now to learn from you the "particular desire" of the Secretary to receive immediate payments before the 1st of January next. This question not being within our competence, we offer no opinion of the probable consequences of withdrawing nearly six millions from the commercial business of the country at this moment; and we advert to it now merely to express our surprise at the change in your views.

Third. But the part of your letter which appears to us the most singular, is that in which you state the amount of the collections of the bank, and your plans for distributing them. Your letter, for instance, presents the following view:

The active debt of the bank on the 3d of
March last was	$54,890,774 25
The total liabilities of the bank on that day were	25,449,737 18

Leaving a balance of	$29,441,037 07

which, you say, "has become due," and you request that $5,700,000 be at once paid to the United States.

Now, this calculation is founded on the presumption that within the last seven months the whole of these fifty-four millions have been paid by the debtors to the bank. That such an event could occur during a period of pecuniary pressure almost unexampled in the history of the country, is not only improbable, but wholly incredible. The error seems to arise from this: for the purpose of reducing to their cash value the thirty-eight millions in the first class, they were assumed in the report to be due in 44½ days. But you make these debts not only due at that time, but as actually paid within that time; a difference on which it is superfluous to insist, with regard to the payment of such an amount in so short a time. This will be evident from an analysis of the very items on which your statement is founded:

1st. Thus, the first class amounts to	$38,926,435 89.
Now, the whole collections from this class amount to only	$13,299,324 33, as will be seen by taking up the items in the order in which you have presented them. The first item is "bills discounted on personal security, $17,159,822 20." Now, it has already been explained to you, that, of this sum, there were sales of some of the branches on credits of several years agreed to; but, owing to their distance, not finally completed until after the 3d of March. The sales of the branches at New Orleans and Mobile embraced, as you will see by the general statement, the sum of	$4,516,332 60
And there were also, as has been already explained to you, "long loans" at New York amounting to	1,673,480 08

Making	$6,189,812 68

besides other "long loans," which require more time than we have at this moment at our command to particularize, and which are therefore omitted. Deducting these two sums, there will remain of current debt $10,970,009 52. Looking to the long credits which it was deemed necessary to give on the sales of the branches, and to the ordinary course of the reductions in banking business, especially in the troubled state of the moneyed concerns and the removals of a considerable part of the loans, with a reduction of ten per cent. or less, it will be an ample allowance to place one fourth of this sum as actually paid, say

	$2,742,502 33
--	----------------

The receipts from sales of the branches must be added to this sum; they amount to	2,350,249 82
	$5,092,752 20

The second item consists of domestic bills, amounting to $16,413,144 26.

Of these, you were already informed that $405,280 87 were under protest at a single branch. At other offices, bills at long dates were taken in payment of doubtful debts, and are not yet at maturity. Taking into view these circumstances, in connexion with the course of business in direct renewals of bills, or in the discount of new bills to enable the parties to take them up, it is a moderate estimate to suppose that one half the amount remains still unpaid. This would leave, as actual payments, $8,206,572 13.

The third and fourth items, consisting of
loans on bank stock	$1,291,915 72
And on other securities	4,061,553 71

Amounting to	$5,353,469 43
--------------	----------------

have been, in fact, all renewed, with recently a small reduction. These, therefore, must of course be omitted. The whole actual collections from this class, then, are only $13,299,324 33.

2. Your second class is of loans drawing interest, amounting to $5,436,083 09.

In this you have mistaken the column of the report giving the date to which "interest has been paid," for the date of the maturity of the loans. These are, in fact, all "long loans," made in order to invest the funds during the two years of winding up; and they remain just as they were, on the 4th of March. Of course, these must be stricken from your list.

3. The third class is of State bank debts, amounting to $4,933,178 02.

Of this sum, the general statement submitted to you shows that $1,093,181 62 was due to Louisville. It arose from the collections of the discounted notes of the branch at Louisville, which were deposited with the Bank of Kentucky until the 4th of March; when this debt, now amounting to $1,100,000, was converted into the notes of that bank, at one, two, three, and four years. This, therefore, must be struck from your list of collections, leaving $3,833,178 02.

The whole of the collections, therefore, will be—
From bills discounted - $2,742,502 38
From sales of branches - 2,350,249 82
From domestic bills of exchange - 8,206,572 13

From State banks - - - $13,299,324 33
- - - 3,833,178 02

17,132,502 35
Add specie used in paying debts - 5,595,077 25

Making an aggregate of - $22,727,579 60

Against these collections you have placed as debts, for which the bank has to hold itself responsible on demand, the sum of - $25,449,737 18

But you have omitted one item in the general statement, namely, the balance due by Banks United States and offices in general account, amounting to - 1,548,869 31

Making an aggregate of - $26,998,606 49

From the view thus presented, it results that the bank has paid and is bound to pay - $26,998,606 49
It has collected for that purpose - 22,727,579 60

It has not, therefore, collected the amount of its liabilities by the sum of - $4,271,026 89

This will not surprise any one familiar with the great hazard of hastening collections from an embarrassed community.

The first Bank of the United States, which expired in 1811, made no dividend for fifteen months. More than four years elapsed before it divided its nominal capital; and the subsequent dividends were made at six, nine, and twelve or more years after the termination of its charter; so that the proposition to settle at the rate of $111 47 per share, (adding, of course, about forty cents per share to correct the error in the estimate of banking-houses,) should be regarded as highly reasonable and liberal; and if this were paid on the terms upon which the bank has sold its branches—say one, two, three, and four years—so as to collect it gently from the community, all parties would be benefited.

In conclusion, we repeat what we have already stated. We have formed an estimate of the value of the shares of the bank on the 4th of March. If you incline to form your own estimate, we are quite ready to resume the inquiry that has been interrupted. If you wish to make the actual receipts the basis of the settlement, we can only say that not enough has been collected to pay the charges; and that therefore, as yet, there is no surplus to divide.

No. 21.

PHILADELPHIA, November 4, 1836.

GENTLEMEN: We received your letter of the 28th of October. It is not necessary to discuss your views of the peculiar relations we stand in to each other. Being authorized, as you admit, "to investigate and report on the proper basis of a settlement" between the United States and the bank, our inquiry, whether the bank would pay into the Treasury that portion of the funds collected since the 3d of March last which belongs to the United States, was not merely usual and correct as a first step, but clearly within the scope of our mutual relations.

Your letter has two assertions which we must correct in the outset:

1st. You say our conferences were occupied exclusively in examining your estimate of the 3d of March last; that we then withdrew, and that on our return we started an entirely new topic. On the contrary, the transactions of the bank, and the result of its business since the 3d of March, were the first and principal subjects of our inquiry, and our adjournment was to give your officers the opportunity necessary for them to prepare the requisite information, which they could not furnish at the time. All this appears by your own letters of the 13th and 19th of October, and the paper enclosed in the latter. These allude explicitly to the causes of adjournment, and communicate, in reply to our inquiries, information which scarcely relates at all to your estimate, but almost entirely to the subsequent collections and disbursements of the bank.

2d. You say we intimated that the Secretary of the Treasury preferred postponing the payments by the bank. On the contrary, not only did we tell you repeatedly that our recommendation of the mode of settlement (whether by prompt payment of the amount collected, or by an estimate of the value of the assets) would depend on the investigation we were then making; but besides, at our first interview, we read you the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury of the 19th of September, as the basis of our action; and it was on the table and constantly referred to at all our conferences. In that letter he expressly and repeatedly states that anxiety for an early payment which you now inform us you are so surprised to learn.

We correct these erroneous assertions made by you, lest our silence should be misconstrued into an acquiescence in your statements.

We do not agree in your calculation of the assets that have become due since the 3d of March last, nor accede to your views of the course pursued by the bank in regard to them. As, however, you say, finally and explicitly, that not enough has been collected to pay the charges, and that therefore, as yet, there is no surplus to divide, we must, of course, forego our wish to make the actual receipts the basis of settlement, and resort to what alone is left—an examination of the estimated value of the shares of the bank on the 3d of March last. This we desire to do. The investigations already made, and documents furnished, lead us to the opinion that the valuation ought to be higher than that in the report of the bank. There are some points, however, on which our information may be more perfect. If you will furnish it, we will complete our valuation, and pursue with you, at an early day, such further examinations as will enable us to arrive at a satisfactory estimate.

We enclose a memorandum of the points to which we refer. Very respectfully, your obedient servants,

H. D. GILPIN.
JOHN WHITE.

I consider the above statement, made by Messrs. Gilpin and White, in regard to the proceedings and intercourse of the committee on behalf of the Secretary of the Treasury, with the committee on the part of the bank, to be perfectly correct.

ROBERT TOLAND,

Memorandum of points on which information is desired.
November 4, 1836.

I. LOSSES.

In the report on suspended debt and real estate, you say that you have been guided by the estimates of the last semi-annual period, viz: of June and July of this year. That estimate of total loss is $5,867,282 16; the estimate of the 3d of March is $5,968,735 07; making an over-estimate in March of $101,452 91. We desire an explanation of this difference, and of the particulars composing the $308,755 88 charged to losses chargeable between March and July.

24th Cong. 2d Sess.]

Claim of United States on U. S. Bank.

2. BANK NOTES.

What was the amount of notes of the bank and offices in transitu on the 3d of March, 1836?

What was the amount of State bank notes in transitu at that time? What denomination of notes composed the nett circulation of the bank at that time?

Have any of the notes of the bank been reissued since the 3d of March, 1836; and if so, to what amount?

Have the $13,324,917 of notes on hand on the 3d of March, 1836, and the $10,142,038 since redeemed, been cancelled?

3. BANK AND OFFICE BALANCES.

We are yet without a statement of the items which constituted the balance of this account, viz.: $1,548,869 01, on the 3d of March, 1836. We will thank you to furnish it.

4. DISCOUNTS, EXCHANGE, AND INTEREST.

We wish to know the amount of profits reported by the dividend committee at each semi-annual period since July, 1834, and the various appropriations thereof.

5. DEFICIENCIES.

We wish a statement of this account, and estimate of its value.

6. GENERAL STATEMENT OF THE BANK AND OFFICES.

We wish a copy of this account, as it stood on the books of the bank on the 3d of March last.

No. 23.

PHILADELPHIA, November 16, 1836.

GENTLEMEN: We duly received your letter of the 4th instant, and as we find that it will be some time before replies can be furnished to the queries which you have proposed, we deem it proper at once to reaffirm the contents of our letter of the 28th October, especially in reference to the "two assertions" which you have undertaken to "correct."

1. We must repeat most distinctly our understanding "that you came here to examine our statement;" and that "we met you for that purpose, and for that purpose only." It was stated in the plainest manner by the officers of the bank, before we commenced the examination, that if a settlement on the basis of winding up the affairs of the bank were insisted on, the examination must be postponed until the old books could be posted up; but that if you were disposed to settle upon the basis of a valuation, we could at once proceed. We concurred in this statement, and you acquiesced in it, and accordingly proceeded with the examination of the estimate of the value of the stock, and the documents upon which it was founded. The object, therefore, we must believe, was to make a valuation, and not to ascertain whether the affairs of the bank had so far been wound up as to entitle the stockholders to a dividend.

2. We must repeat, also, that you distinctly expressed the opinion that the Secretary of the Treasury, "looking forward to the probable wants of the Treasury, would prefer to postpone the payments till the years 1839, 1840, and 1841," on the ground that a serious decrease in the revenue might be apprehended from the operations of the tariff laws in the first and last named of those years, which the payments from the bank would serve to make up.

Having thus stated, as concisely as possible, what we consider necessary to vindicate ourselves from the charge of having made "erroneous assertions," we have only to add, that it will give us great pleasure to resume with you "such further examination as will enable us [you] to arrive at a satisfactory estimate."

The answers to your queries will be transmitted to you as soon as they can be prepared.

No. 26.

Answer to the "memorandum of points on which information is desired" by Messrs. Gilpin, White, and Lawrence, which "memorandum" was enclosed in their letter of November 4, 1836.

1. The difference of $101,652 91, between the estimated losses in March and July, is explained in the accompanying statement, (marked A,) by which it will be seen that this sum is made up of increased estimates of loss on sundry banking-houses, of deficiencies, counterfeits, &c. The statement marked B explains the charge of $308,755 88 to the account of "losses chargeable, &c.," the principal item being the losses at Charleston, which were accidentally omitted in the March statement, amounting to $205,129 10; another large item is the loss on sale of the suspended debt of the office at Cincinnati, amounting to $140,846; and a third is the loss of $85,657 34 on the banking-house at Baltimore.

2. The amount of the notes of the bank and offices in transitu, on the 3d of March, 1836, as shown by the general statement, was $3,380,572.

The amount of the State bank notes in transitu, at that date, cannot be ascertained without writing to all the offices. Such information was of no importance for the general purposes of the bank, and such statements were, therefore, never made or required. The denomination of the notes composing the nett circulation of the bank cannot be ascertained; the manner in which the books of the bank were originally opened, and the forms of the returns required from the offices, render it impossible to make such a statement. No notes of the bank have been reissued since the 3d of March, 1836, because none have been paid in to the bank. The Bank of the United States chartered by the State of Pennsylvania has, it is understood, done as other banks have done—paid out the notes of the Bank of the United States; but of this, the Bank of the United States has no official knowledge; nor has it any concern in the matter, as the new bank is bound to redeem all the notes of the old bank.

Since the 3d of March, $4,475,493 26 of the old issues have been burnt; and $3,076,590 have been cancelled, and will be burnt shortly; making a total of $7,552,083 26 destroyed and cancelled.

3. To make a statement of the items which compose the $1,548,869 01, it would be necessary to get a copy of all the accounts of each office with every other, with a copy of the "reconciliation" of all these accounts, amounting to some 400 or 500 copies of accounts; and all these would have to be examined and compared, so as to extract from the aggregate debit balances of $30,894,499 99, and the aggregate credit balances of $29,345,630 68, the resulting balance of $1,548,869 31. It would seem to be sufficient to state, what must be well known to at least one member of your committee, that the items composing this balance are of precisely the same sort as those which compose the balance due by State banks, viz: bills of exchange, notes, and checks. The accounts of the parent bank with its offices, showing the general nature of all the accounts, may be seen by an examination of the general ledger of the bank at any time; and as a specimen of the "reconcilements" of the accounts of the bank and offices with each other, showing the outstanding items charged or credited at each, but not received and entered at the other, we transmit the document marked C, which is a copy of the "reconciliation" of the account of the parent bank with its office at New Orleans, on the 1st of February, 1836.

4. The amount of profits, and the appropriations thereof, since July, 1834, have been as follows:

	Nett profits.	Appropriations.		Banking-house fund.	Profit and loss.
		Dividend.	Contingent fund.

This is also shown by the copies of the profit and loss accounts, which have been regularly transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury.

5. The statement herewith, marked D, contains a list of the "deficiencies," which are mostly of very long standing, and are considered a total loss.

6. A copy of the general statement of the bank and offices, as made out at the bank on the 3d of March, and sent to the Treasury Department, is also furnished. The dates of the returns from several of the offices vary according to the time of the mail; and, for the sake of bringing all the accounts up as near as possible to the 3d of March, the general statement, which formed the basis of the report of the joint committee of valuation, was subsequently made; the latter statement has already been handed to you.

No. 27—(A.)

Statement of losses at the Bank of the United States, its offices and agencies, on the 3d of March and on the 1st of July, 1836.

The losses on "suspended debt and real estate," per semi-annual returns of July last, were as follows:

"Ascertained" losses, say "losses chargeable to the contingent fund"	-	$4,623,879 06
"Estimated" losses, exclusive of "cash deficiencies"	-	$1,080,723 24
"Cash deficiencies"	-	105,313 48
		1,186,036 72
Total on the 1st of July	-	$5,809,915 78
In the general statement of the 25th of July, adapted to the 3d of March last, they stood thus:
"Ascertained" losses, say "losses chargeable to contingent fund"	-	$4,315,123 18
"Estimated" losses, exclusive of "cash deficiencies"	-	$1,389,479 12
"Cash deficiencies," included in "deficiencies"	-	105,197 48
		1,494,676 60
Total on the 3d of March	-	5,809,799 78

The amount in March being less than that in July, by which is composed of $15 counterfeit at Nashville, reported after March 3d, and $101 at Hartford, reported as "cash deficiencies" in the semi-annual returns of July, but not as such in the weekly statement containing the materials for the monthly statement of March 3d.

With this unimportant difference: the estimates for March 3d and for July 1st, of the losses on "suspended debt and real estate," are identical, as intimated in the report of the 25th of July.

But the general statement of that date contains other matters on which losses arise, and which are not included in "suspended debt and real estate."

The explanation desired by the Secretary's committee is given as follows:

1st. Banking-houses.—These have always been treated, in the statements of the bank, distinct from other real estate; and as the valuations affixed to them at the offices were known not to have been periodically revised with the care bestowed on the valuations of other real estate, the joint committee, therefore, in the report made by them on the 25th of July, availed themselves of the personal knowledge possessed by some of their own number, and by the officers of the bank, to affix such estimates as they believed would indicate their fair value.

The result was as follows:

The estimated loss, per the semi-annual returns, was - - - $57,366 38
The loss estimated by the joint committee was - - - 114,535 83

Showing an addition, by the committee, of - - - $57,169 45

2d. "Deficiencies."—Under this caption, in the weekly and monthly statements, are embraced cash deficiencies, counterfeits, over-drafts, &c., of which, from want of uniformity in the practice of the offices, a part only are reported in the semi-annual returns of suspended debt.

Thus, the "deficiencies," per monthly statement, March 3d, amount to - $149,796 94

While the "cash deficiencies," per semi-annual returns, July 1st, amount to - 105,313 48

Showing a difference of - - - 44,483 46

not reported in the semi-annual returns, and therefore not estimated in the losses of the 1st of July; and as the whole amount of "deficiencies" is considered totally lost, it was necessary to add this difference to the estimated losses, per the July returns - - - 44,483 46

Making, together, an addition, in the estimated losses, for March 3d, of - - - $101,652 91

Memorandum of final points of inquiry proposed to the committee.

I. Why is not the amount of $3,380,572, stated to be in transitu on the 3d March, 1836, deducted from the amount of $21,109,352 23, stated to be the circulation on that day in your report submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, as in the previous mode of estimating the circulation?

II. The "fund to extinguish the cost of banking-houses" is stated to be $1,104,223 09. It was in July, 1834, $976,019 59, to which it is stated there has been since added $242,375 84, and the loss on the Baltimore banking-house deducted, $85,657 34; leaving the fund of $1,132,738 09. What is the cause of this difference of $28,515?

III. What are the items that compose the expense account, stated to amount to $166,803 16?

IV. Of what does the sum stated to be "due from the United States" (disallowed) consist?

No. 32.

I. "Notes in transitu" are notes taken out of the cash of one office, immediately charged to the office which originally issued them, and sent to that office. Owing to distances, and the want of suitable opportunities of forwarding these notes, they frequently remain in transitu for months; and as the office to which they are sent can take no account of them until they are received, the debit which has been made at the first office has no corresponding credit at the other office, while these notes remain in transitu; but as soon as they are received, the proper credit is given.

Suppose, therefore, that three millions of notes were in transitu at the dates specified in the general statement upon which the report was founded, and that they were all received the next day, regularly entered, and a new statement made out—what would be the result? Simply this: the cash (i. e. the notes on hand) would have been charged, and the remitting offices would have been credited, with this amount. In other words, the notes on hand would have been increased three millions, and the apparent circulation would have been reduced to $18,109,352 23; and the debt due by the offices would of course have been augmented by the same sum to $4,548,869 31. The actual situation of the bank remains unchanged; it stands precisely where and as it did before. What was apparent circulation yesterday is an office debit to-day. The amount of notes in transitu has always been estimated from memoranda furnished by the offices, and it has been copied for some years upon the monthly statements sent to the Treasury, merely for the purpose of showing what we considered the net circulation of our notes.

Such estimates and memoranda formed no part of the accounts of the bank, and could not have the slightest influence upon any valuation of its property. It was totally unnecessary, therefore, to make an estimate of the notes in transitu, at the rates of the returns from which the general statement, forming the basis of the "report," was made; and none such has ever been made or thought of. It would be perfectly useless for any purposes of valuation.

II. The "fund for extinguishing the cost of banking-houses" amounted in July, 1834, to - $976,019 59
By an appropriation in July, 1835, of - 242,375 84

It was increased to - 1,218,395 43

This being the amount of the cost at that period of all the banking-houses.

From this has been deducted the loss on the sale of the banking-house at Baltimore

85,657 34

Leaving (as stated by Mr. White) a balance of - $1,132,738 09

But there were other banking-houses sold before the 3d of March, 1836, with the following results, viz:

Banking-house at Charleston-- loss on sale - $37,727 78

Banking-house at Lexington-- loss on sale - 12,180 23

49,908 01

Banking-house at Buffalo--gain
on sale - $12,412 85

Banking-house at Cincinnati--gain
on sale - 8,981 16

21,393 01

Balance of loss deducted from the fund, (being the amount of "the difference" notified by Mr. White) - 28,515 00

Leaving the balance of the "fund" on the 4th March, 1836 - 1,104,223 09

BANK OF UNITED STATES, January, 7, 1837.

III. The expense account consists of the salaries and other expenses incident to the business of the institution, at the parent bank and its offices.

IV. Of the following items, viz:

1. The charge of interest on the 7 per cent.
stock, redeemed on the 3d of November,
1817 - $2,153 52

2. The charge for expenses attending the collection of the special deposit - 3,113 80

Together - $5,267 32

JANUARY 13, 1837.

No. 33.

At a meeting of the president and directors of the Bank of the United States chartered by the State of Pennsylvania, March 2, 1836:

Resolutions of the president and directors of the Bank of the United States, adopted this day, were laid before the board, of which the following is a true copy, to wit:
